

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 470.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 1.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Sonnet.

When fleecy cloudlets float about the moon,
When dews fall—her pure tears—and her sweet breath

The night wind, like some pious Sabbath tune,
The passionate heart to peace attempereth,
Then in my quiet room I sit, and sing
Such songs as solitude and I love best;
Then evil's self seems a harmonious thing,
And life's sad cares resolve in tranquil rest.
Then do I feel that all are sanctified
To noble ends, and purely should aspire;
All, who in song's novitiate here are tried,
Ere they may join the immortal starry choir.
Then thrills of rapture through my being start,
As though the hand of God had touched my heart.

OPERA.

1830—1860.

The Revolution of July (1830) may be said to have taken place to the music of the duet in Masaniello, "Amour sacré de la patrie," and to the song la Parisienne, which Nourrit sang with such wonderful expression. After being closed fifteen days the theatre was opened again, Aug. 4, with Auber's la Muette, (Masaniello), a work fitted as if written for the occasion.

The following 18th of October, they gave Le Dieu et la Bayadere, another charming work of Auber, in which Marie Taglioni and Perrot, a pupil of Vestris, executed prodigies of grace and elegance.

March 1, 1831, Veron succeeded Lubbert in the direction of the opera, with a brilliant and profitable success. He gave successively Le Philtre, a new masterpiece of Auber, in a lighter style; Robert le Diable (Nov. 21), which produced a real revolution in the grand dramatic style; Le Serment and Gustave, by Scribe and Auber; Als Baba, the last production of the now old Cherubini; and then La Juive, the masterpiece of his pupil, Halévy, who may be well called the French Meyerbeer.

Robert the Devil really is the standard-bearer of the new romantic school. This immense work, to which all schools, melted together in the crucible of a patient, learned and eclectic genius, have contributed, will ever remain an imperishable monument of the second transformation of the art in the 19th century. The first was the work of Rossini.

The middle ages and chivalry, happily substituted for the thoroughly used up old clothes of the Greeks and Romans, the eternal contest of Right and Wrong, so admirably personified in the parts of Alice and Bertram, give to this marvellous poem all the attractions of a legend based upon the principle of Christianity. The fugued introduction which precedes the rising of the curtain is at once learned and melodious; the choruses of the Norman nobles, who emulate each other in the praises of pleasure and love, are of an infinite grace and freshness; the Fêtes of the tournament are of magic splendor; the scene of the nuns has a terrible and sombre effect; finally the closing trio in which the angel overthrows the demon and heavenly voices mingle with sad cries from the realm of darkness is sublime.

And then such execution! Nourrit, Levasseur, Madames Damoreau and Dorus! and Cornélie Falcon, who, after making the part of Alice her own, became the admirable personification of La Juive! Person, voice, action, dramatic enthusiasm, that great tragedienne united all the qualities so rare, which go to form the consummate lyric artist. What can we say of the orchestration of Meyerbeer? What vigor, sonority, picturesque coloring, exactness in the smallest details! On the other hand, what luxury in the decorations, the costume, the stage appointments! During the rehearsals of this splendid work, public opinion was utterly unfavorable to it; even the actors far from expecting success foresaw but its fall. Robert le Diable, that sublime manifestation of genius, was regarded as a labored and fantastic conception, with no melodic value, an opinion which very soon would be justified by the public.

After Rossini and Weber we have had Meyerbeer; after Meyerbeer and Auber we come to Halévy. This master, so profound in his science, so elevated in his inspirations, has continued the romantic movement of which we have been speaking, and which corresponds to that transformation in literature at the head of which Victor Hugo has been proclaimed chief actor. In the works of Halévy, to a great richness of orchestration are added a great knowledge of the voice and a perfect appreciation of prosody and dramatic truth. We know not what to praise most highly in La Juive, the pomp of the introduction, the solemn Te Deum, the magnificence of the processions, the energy of the choruses, or the beauty of single pieces. Can there be anything more pathetic than the sublime second act, in which the Jewish type is so finely sculptured! What touching simplicity in the scene of the Passover. What emotion in the romance "Il va ceder;" what passion in the final duet and trio! And then how grandly is the character of the Cardinal painted in the majestic air of the first act, the awful anathema of the third, and the dramatic duet of the fourth! What can be said of the air of Eleazar, "Rachel, quand du Seigneur," the text of which is by Nourrit, and in which palpitate all the sentiments of tenderness, love and religion which a paternal heart can contain. Is there not something in that funeral march of the penitents in the fifth act, which causes one to shiver with a sort of alarm and terror? That supplication of the young and beautiful Rachel, the sad decorations, the short notes of the executioner to the "Il est temps!" all combine to make this work one of the most touching exhibitions which can be offered to the sensibilities of an audience.

Veron alternated his operas with the most seductive ballets, as La Sylphide, par Mlle. Taglioni; La Tempête, L'Ile des Pirates and Le Diable Boiteux by Mlles. Therese and Fanny Ellsler.

Add to all this, reproductions of the Armida, La Vestale and Don Juan, and a troop perfectly balanced, and the prodigious success of the opera at that time is no longer astonishing.

Director Veron was succeeded by Duponchel, under whom we had Meyerbeer's second great work, Les Huguenots, Feb. 29, 1836.

Nothing new can be said upon the bacchic spirit of the chorus of the orgies, upon the grace of that of the bathers, upon the magnificent septette of the duel scene, upon the celebrated fourth act, in which the sombre conjuration precedes the sublime duet, which will never be surpassed upon the stage. What was there wanting to inspire such artists as Nourrit and Mlle. Falcon.

The fifth act finely closes these scenes of war and love. The ball at which Raoul presents himself dripping with blood; the scene in the convent in which the voices of the Huguenots die away by degrees; and the final tableau in which Marcel unites the two lovers and the choral of Luther, vigorously sung by the three martyrs, appals the ferocious assassins; then the marvellous stage scene in which the quays of Paris, strewn with the slain, appear in shadow, while the massive towers of Notre Dame are relieved in all their jagged outlines against the azure sky all sparkling with stars; nothing could so picturesquely close so bloody and terrible a drama. Reports of firearms mingle with the groans of the victims; the savage cries of the murderers resound from all sides; the curtain falls upon this scene of horror at the moment when Queen Marguerite reënters her palace, escorted by her pages and brilliantly lighted by the torches, which flame about her splendid litter.

The production of La Esmeralda, by Mlle. Bertini, and Stradella, by Niedermeyer and the retirement of Adolphe Nourrit from the stage before the debut of Gilbert Duprez were contemporaneous.

Duprez had an immense success as Arnold in William Tell, in Masaniello, Les Huguenots and La Juive. His large and noble style of recitative, the great strength of lung with which he gave the high C with the chest voice, filling the theatre with the tone, his neat and sonorous declamation, and his true and expressive method very soon gained him the suffrages of all. Unluckily, imitators, who had neither his genius or his physical powers, in their endeavors to copy him, very soon gave us cries in the place of singing and loudness instead of expression. This tendency to a false taste ruled alike in the provinces and in Paris, and the true vocal art would soon have disappeared among us but for the combined efforts of Bordogni, Banderali, Ponchard and Garcia.

After the appearance of Madame Stolz in Guido et Ginevra (March 5, 1838) the Grand Opera gave in succession, Benvenuto Cellini, by Berlioz; Le Lac des Fees, by Auber; La Xacarrilla, by Marliani; Le Drapier, by Halevy, and Les Martyrs, by Donizetti.

M. Leon Pillet, appointed Director June 6, 1840, put the theatre into thorough repair, and opened his administration brilliantly with La Favorite, in which Mad. Stolz, Baroilhet, Duprez and Levasseur gained great applause. In 1841, Mario, who had appeared in Robert with remarkable success, quitted the opera to join the Italian company. Baroilhet represented Don Juan with a tropical fire; Carlotta Grisi captivated the public in Giselle, a delicious ballet, by Adam; and La Reine de Chypre, by Halevy, gave new opportunities for triumph to Mad. Stolz, Duprez and Baroilhet. On the 15th of March, 1843, Charles VI., by the same master, added a new wreath to the laurels of the great French composer. Nobody can forget the well merited success of the air of the king, the dith of the cards, the popular chorus Guerre aux tyrans, the picturesque recitative of the man of the Forest du Mans and the entire part of Odette.

The Don Sebastian of Donizetti was given not long before the death of the famed and illustrious composer. But masterpieces became now more rare. The new works which followed in order were Le Lazzarone, Richard en Palestine, Marie Stuart, in which her touching farewell is remarkable, L'Etoile de Seville, in which Duprez played and sang the part of Edgar so finely, David by Mermet, L'Ame en peine by Flotow, and finally Robert Bruce, a feeble pasticcio after Rossini, which might have caused a smile of pity on the face of his marble statue, so unhappily placed behind the comptrollers of the theatre.

At length Madame Stolz,* who had created a void about her by causing the removal from the theatre of all who displeased her, even to the dancers, left the scene, Pillet at the same time giving up the direction and leaving debts to the amount of 400,000 francs to his successors, M. M. Duponchel and Roqueplan, (1847.) At this period, Cerrito and Saint-Leon gained a fine success in La Fille de Marbre, and Duprez raised himself to the level of Talma in the famous scene of the degradation of the Chevalier in Verdi's Jerusalem.

The Revolution of 1848 broke in upon the successful performances of Carlotta Grisi in Griselidis, a ballet by Adam, whose death is a loss to art. Nisida by Mlle. Plunkett, Da Vivandiere, by Pugn, and Jeanne la Folle, by Clapisson, complete the contingent of that year of political troubles.

At length, April 16, 1849, Le Prophète, the third great work of Meyerbeer, was given to the public under the auspices of Roger, the graceful deserter from the ranks of the Opera Comique. The pastorella was given by that singer with delicious taste; Madame Viardot Garcia created the part of Fides with a dramatic force of expression which raised the fourth act to an incomparable excellence; then Alboni, with her commanding voice, adding to a calm dignity a freedom and fullness of breadth, which transports us back to the days of Rubens and Teniers. The Arioso in the second act reminds us of Gluck, the air of Zacharie of the solidity of Handel; the hymn of triumph, the march of the coronation and the entire scene in the cathedral have a pomp and splendor almost supernatural; and finally, during the lovers' last embrace, amid fire and flame, and falling walls, the tableau, imitating the death of Sardanapalus, has an effect truly striking and marvellous. The chorus which opens the first act and almost rivals the first chorus of Rossini's Tell for its freshness and odor of the country, the call to arms so vigorous and martial in its rhythm the delightful ballet of the skaters, the air of Fides in the 5th act, the bacchanal song of John of Leyden, and above all the dream and chorus of children in the 4th act—all this has a surprising richness of melody and accompaniment. Without attaining the extreme popularity of those which preceded it, owing to the nature of the subject, still, this score of Meyerbeer, fully imbued with a German eclecticism, is perhaps the most interesting of all his works for the amateur and artist.

After the Prophet they produced L'Enfant prodigue of Auber, Dec. 6, 1859, and the Demon de la Nuit by Rosenhain. The Sappho of Gounod was both for the composer and for Madame Viardot-Garcia, the occasion of a success solid and honorable. La Corbeille d'oranges gave Alboni opportunity to exhibit her exquisite talents and Le Juif errant of Halevy showed in full contrast the beautiful voices of Massol and Mad. Tedesco.

Dec. 2, 1852 the Academie Nationale de Musique, again resumed the title of Academie Imperiale, and after the unsuccessful Orfa, gave Luisa Miller, composed by Verdi for Madame Bosio. To the La Fronde of Niedermeyer, succeeded Le Maître Chanteur of Limnander. Then followed the great success of Madame Rosati in Jo-vita, a ballet by Labarre; but this did not prevent M. Roqueplan from resigning the direction, June 30, 1850. Since this time the opera has been attached to the Emperor's household and under the same administration.

La Nonne Sanglante, by Gounod, in spite of the monotony of the poem, gave Mlle. Wertheimer and Gueymard passages worthy of their talents. Gounod, the last pupil of Lesueur, recalls the large style of his master. At times his melody is curtailed but the idea is never wanting in elevation and nobleness. His choruses and accompaniments are written with a master hand; the symphony of the 2d act of La Nonne is worthy of Weber for color and originality.

Since 1855 there has been nothing very remarkable, unless we except Les Vepres Siciliennes of Verdi, which gave Mlle. Cruvelli (Sophia Cruvel, a German) opportunity to display the varied resources of her fine organ. Marco Spada and Le Cheval de Bronze by Auber, passed from the Opera Comique to the Grand Opera. The bringing together in this manner, and, perhaps we may say, this confounding of the two grand classes of opera, let us hope will be but the step towards separating them hereafter with more exactness.

If we grant that vocal art has been sensibly declining for some years, this may perhaps be from two causes worth mentioning:

1. The elevation, gradually and constantly, of the normal pitch or diapason.
2. The augmentation of the orchestral forces, which numbered but fifteen in the time of Cambert, but now amount to more than a hundred.

The present director is Dietsch, successor of Girard.

Note: The Translator adds here a list of the Directors of the Grand Opera during the present century.

1800. Bonet, commissioner of the Government.

1801. Cellerier.

1802. The First Consul put the Opera under the charge of a prefect of the palace, with Morel as Director. Lemoyne directed it fifteen days during this year.

1803. Bonet again.

1807. Picard, Napoleon's first chamberlain.

1814 The Minister of the Royal household had the Opera added to his duties.

1815. Papillon de la Ferté, director-general for the ministry. Choron, manager. Pertuis, inspector of music.

1817. Courtien, administrator.

1818. Pertuis, director.

1819. Viotti, "

1821. Habeneck, "

1824. Duplantys, "

1828. Lubbert.

1831. Veron undertook the opera at his own risk

1835. Duponchel, director.

1840. Duponchel and Monnier.

1841. Leon Pillet.

1847. Duponchel and Nestor Roqueplan.

1848. Roqueplan.

1854. Nestor, Imperial administrator.

1854. Crosnier.

1856. Alphonse Royer.

The Life of Handel.

By Frederick Chrysander. Leipzig, Breitkopf and Hirtel.
From the Deutsche Musik Zeitung.

The Second Volume of Chrysander's book on Handel has recently appeared. The first was contemporaneous with the publication of the Leipzig Society's edition of Handel's Collected Works, and thus the foundations were simultaneously laid for two monuments in honor of the master, who had become a stranger in his native land; monuments which will not only hand down his memory to the remotest ages, but also, by their intellectual influence, be of indisputable importance for our own further progress in art. Both enterprises, Handel's Works and Chrysander's Biography, proceed hand in hand towards the same result, namely, to render the life and acts of one of our great masters, in all their truthfulness, the common good. Of his compositions only a few were really known, while some few more were known only by tradition to the larger portion of the public, so that merely indistinct notions of his all-comprehensive musical labors were floating about among the people. Just as, in the case of Bach, until about twenty or thirty years ago, we were contented with the limited side of his art, that is to say, his eminent technical excellence, and did not until very lately begin to penetrate to his really intellectual qualities; we shall, in a short time, change our inadequate notion of Handel's art for others more correct and complete, and, in the place of the few anecdotal narratives from which the large mass of public derived their ideas of his life and disposition, without attaining a truthful and definite picture of his character, we shall now acquire, thanks to Chrysander's work, a knowledge of the complete and mighty course of development pursued by the mind of one who was as elevated in morals as he was in art.

Both undertakings have come at the right time. It is an indisputable fact that the musical art of the present day possesses in itself, as a counterpoise to that extravagance and pretensions of mere technicality, of which it is generally the victim, a profound impulse to maintain what is true, and to return to what is primary. The attraction towards direct knowledge—a feeling that takes us back to those sources whence the art of our forefathers flowed in never turbid clearness, appears, indeed, to be of a firm basis for vigorous progress. Since the art of our own time does not appear to go further than the Past in achieving a result that may serve as a standard, and does not, moreover, possess in itself the productive power for the purpose, there is nothing better left for it to do than, by popularising the perfect work of certain definite periods, to lay down among the people the foundation for future structures. That is the great end which our editions of the works of Handel and Bach have to fulfil. Even at present, people have not as yet come to a clear understanding concerning their relative position. Our first wish in contemplating the work under consideration is that Bach and all our greatest masters may find such historians as Handel has found in Chrysander, or that the latter himself may be their historian.

* M. Poillot treats the matter very gingerly. The fact seems to be, as we have learned it from other sources, that Stolz was Pillet's mistress, and used her power as queen of his affections to retain her place as queen of the stage, by admitting no rival upon it.

The endeavor, by means of old art generally, to prepare a secure foundation for our vigorous development must not be misunderstood as a wish to return to antiquated forms and notions. As far as Handel is concerned, such a thing is entirely out of the question; though as a matter of course, certain works of his sprang up under the momentary influence of his age, it might very easily happen that, on examining our productions now-a-days, the question: What of ours had not originated under the same circumstances as the perishable portions of Bach and Handel's works, while, on the other hand, what had risen to such a height of ideality as their great works? would remain unanswered, if we were not sincere enough to own the true state of the case. We hope that our increasing appreciation of the past and its great masters will speedily put an end to complacent theory of the "surmounted point of view," and its two obnoxious aids, heaven-storming egotism and unthinking delight in its equal by birth, fashionable feebleness. No one, without rendering himself altogether ridiculous, can any longer give utterance to such opinions as those which recently appeared in a musical paper on Handel's Israel in Egypt.

There is now evident throughout Germany a great amount of zeal for the restoration of old masterpieces, not in the isolated cases of collectors and historians, but combined with the wish to place these treasures within the reach of the large mass of the public. Even in our own time the spirit of indefatigable progress towards something higher does not rest a single moment, although we may not be able to perceive its workings in violent revolutionary attempts, but rather in the effort to obtain a correct view of our progress. The task of making the riches bequeathed to us by our great forefathers in art the common intellectual property of all, secures, if it be rightly performed, an honorable position even for our own age. At all events, if the highest ideas of our particular epoch have become the free property of its posterity, and thus placed an entire nation in a higher position and rendered them capable of receiving what is new to them, fresh and more extensive views are opened up in the domain of the mind, until these views are themselves realised in the endless process of intellectual development, and become the foundation for further efforts.

As yet, however, we have absorbed and rightly worked out hardly a tenth part of what art offers; for this reason, putting all other considerations aside, the revivifications of Bach and Handel, on the extensive scale on which it is now practised, is of undoubted importance to us. The notions of church music and oratorios have, at present, disappeared, as much as it was possible, from among us. Consequently we require for both of them complete models, more defined in their form and ideas—models, such as Bach, Handel, and the older masters have bequeathed us—if these kinds of composition are not to give up their ideal empires and sink down into a mere semblance of life in consequence of a combination of subjects and means of expression negating each other. Church music, which finds its idea in man's relative position to the highest intellectual ideas, must fall a prey to a mere over-sensual poetastering of the feelings as little as to the non-independent playing of understanding with pure form. In our own age—which we cannot deny possesses an impulse to render clearer the views of religion, obscured by forms, although for the moment it has not got beyond a dim humanism—church music, when it has not altogether descended to a mere concert style, has been subjected to mere sentimental ecstasy quite as often as to abstract intellectual formalism. In the works of old church-music, up to its highest exponents, Bach and Handel, the matter and the expression constitute indivisible unity, while the form of expression although determined by the circumstances of the age, is always natural, and springs from the subject. On this account, the study of the old masters is the best invigorating means for the benefit of our own religious art, but only if we endeavor to discover, and, in conformity with the present view taken of things, to render evident in our works the inward relations between outward appearance and the living idea contained in it, and not content ourselves with the mere contemplation and imitation of outward form and peculiarities.

We are no better off now-a-days, with oratorios, whenever we happen to come across them. Our present music, based entirely upon subjective sensation, does not possess the strength to wed itself to a purely objective conception of the matter given it, and declines into coldness and outward painting. The discordance between the great historical figures of the Bible and our modern sentimentality is generally very great in modern oratorio. The purely historical character of the oratorio is entirely misunderstood—it was so even by Mendelssohn, who introduced into his oratorios the lyrical church elements, namely, the choral, certainly with Bach's Passions music as a model, but without perceiving that the latter was a series of special works for divine service, while oratorio is only more distantly related to the purely church view of things, or even has nothing at all to do with it. Mendelssohn wanted to invest oratorio with an additional religious signification, which was quite as foreign to him personally as to the whole polite world in which he lived.

Handel was born to create and carry out Oratorio. It is a sufficient proof of the greatness and importance of this highest form of musical art, that a man of such a mind as Handel had to live a long life of active employment in every way, in order, in his greatest strength and maturity, to complete, in his greatest works, that form in which the passing of idea into reality could be effected in a manner most appropriate to music, namely, the oratorio, in which the feelings enter with the epic view of matters into a compact for the purpose of representing a real action and definite characters, that is to say, in which the feelings become objective, while the action does not step forth outwardly into life, but remains ideal, so that there is nothing to disturb the music, as is not unfrequently the case with visible action.

American Composers.

W. H. FRY.

Among the appointments which, apart from party reasons, do honor to the new administration, as recognizing the claims of men of distinction in letters and art to honorable posts in the civil service of the country, is that of Mr. Fry, to be Secretary of Legation at Turin. Mr. Fry has been for many years one of the editors of the N. Y. Tribune, and is well known to our readers by his musical articles, often copied or quoted in these columns. He is also a composer of no small merit, and has a rare fortune among composers, to become a diplomatist. In the N. Y. Dispatch, "Timothy Trill" gives the following account of Mr. Fry and his works, among other "American composers."

First on this list comes by all right the name of Wm. H. Fry, Esq., whose opera, "Leonora," was the first and grandest work of that calibre ever composed by a man of American soil, and whose other works, especially for orchestra, entitle him to the most honorable and distinguished position among the hundreds of self-styled composers with which our country actually swarms, and who, alas! are continually publishing but never performing their works! ("Nor any other man!")

Mr. Fry's heaviest works are his opera, (composed when he was but 17 years old!) his Santa Claus Symphony, the Pastoral Overture "A Day in the Country," the romantic tone-poem "The Broken Heart," and his truly grand sacred work, the "Stabat Mater," a much larger and more serious Oratorio by far than that by Rossini on the same subject.

Besides these, Mr. Fry has been an earnest devotee to a class of composition for which he has rarely gotten any credit; namely, the Chamber Quartet. He has written over a dozen of these, one of which, (No. 11,) was produced several years ago by Mr. H. C. Cooper's efforts at one of Dr. Guilmette's Concerts, and one movement of which was encored, a very rare honor for this species of music.

Mr. Fry's music is characterized by marked melodic features, imaginative instrumental symbols, and predominance of climacteric force, more than by contrapuntal equilibrium, strictness of classic form, or breadth of orchestral treatment.

He believes with Berlioz, that no matter how nice the pudding may look, its appearance will not save the oaths of its eaters if it prove to contain nothing but ashes, or the dry chips of Albrechtberger's and Hauptman's strictures, while at the same time, no one could be more severe with himself than he is, to prove which, one need only glance at one of his fine-written, complicated, altered, interpolated, scratched and blotted scores, a Chinese puzzle to a Conductor, and the dread of the copyist.

This mention of Berlioz urges me on to remark how often I have been struck by the many points of resemblance between him and Mr. Fry in their peculiar views. They remind one of Bentham among philosophers, or of Fitch among inventors, and neither has had any chance of being influenced by the other, for they carry out each other's theories instinctively, while the weak practical points of each are the firmly sustained theories of the other.

Thus Fry's abundant flow of melody and the predominance given to it in all his works, are quite the reverse of Berlioz who might study for a lifetime without being able to supply a small barrel-organ with six or eight tunes. Then look at the position of the latter as the mighty King of the Orchestra, and the perfection of detail with which his scores are worked up, and the marvellous effects produced by the mere instrumentation alone, in which even the Germans confess themselves inferior. The points of similarity in these two original men, are a firm belief in the sacred truth of tone-painting, (which so many classicists scoff at,) and in the appropriateness of expression in the music of our churches. Liszt, Wagner, Berlioz and Fry have all created much and envenomed discussion on account of their peculiar views, scorn of established customs and contempt for the well-worn paths of science. And why? Because innovators are always the longest in being understood, and old ears are like old dogs, and cannot (soon) be "taught new tricks."

Was not Wagner's sublime overture to "Tannhauser" ten years in existence before "the notes ever had a 'resurrection into life from the death-white paper?'" Did not Beethoven actually die, having never heard his own Ninth Symphony? Did not Schubert die before the parts were even so much as drawn out from his Symphony in C minor, it having been left for the enthusiasm and devotion of a Schumann to give the work its first hearing?

A Whitfield or a William Pitt may address the applauding thousands of London, and yet fail to keep sleepy Hottentots awake, but are they not same shining oratorical lights in either case? How can we then despair at the dullness of appreciation which has hitherto marked the public presentation of certain musical works, of whose merit critics are agreed, and of whose genius fellow-composers stand confessors?

A NEW LIGHT IN MUSIC.—We have received the following circular which we give for the benefit of our readers who may never have heard of this great genius—

Eugene A. Wiener, No. 765 Broadway, (near 9th street)—up three pair of stairs—New York. (Portrait of Mr. Wiener).

According to editorial prints, of the first order, one of the greatest living pianists and musical writers! Without an equal as an extemporizer upon any given melody. Acknowledged by the public and the press of the Old and New World.

His method to develop any voice for "song" or "speech" and to remove any morbid obstructions of the voice, invariably surpassing any system known in musical art and science.

His method of teaching the Piano from the beginning to the highest perfection never failed to surround him with enthusiasts.

The effect—whenever imparting his musical knowledge and skill—always proved "instant" and "startling!"

The testimonials of the most competent critics and distinguished people here and abroad, express wonder, and the opinion that they never before have witnessed such a decided success!

Eugene A. Wiener approves of the "modern school" as far as represented in "some" productions of Richard Wagner, Hector Berlioz, Franz Liszt, Giacomo Meyerbeer or Henselt, Thalberg, Kullack, Taubert and others. It is a matter of course, that Wagner, the author of "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser" must prove correct in his leading idea, when pointing at a "Future of Music" inasmuch as the progress of each age being the natural law of expansion, leaving behind the imperfect formations of the past, however venerable they may be.

"Thought" is the creative Power of the Creator, above as well as "within us!" Speculative philosophical audacity is promotive for art and science, "if" the go-ahead principle is realized with that caution, neglected by the otherwise gigantic Robert Schumann, Mendelssohn Bartholdy and Nicolaus Lenau.

Friedrich von Schiller once exclaimed: "Give me a handful of earth, that I may go out of myself!" Eugene A. Wiener thinks, it is better to say within ourselves, avoiding the risk, to be shattered to atoms against rocky abstractions!

Eugene A. Wiener's "Charitable performances" in this Metropolis attracted large audiences and have been listened to with considerable popular favor, while the proceeds caused a great deal of relief to the distressed!

His splendid Musical Library includes his own writings! Free admission for ladies and children.

Church Music in New York.

The music at the Fifth Avenue Dutch Reformed Church (Rev. J. M. Macaulay's) has for many years been under the charge of our first musicians, and in consequence, noted for its excellence. It is at present directed by Dr. C. A. Guilmette, the renowned baritone singer, favorably known to the Boston public from his performances there in oratorio. The choir numbers about thirty: most of them are from Cooper Institute classes, where Dr. Guilmette is professor. It is very thoroughly drilled, and notwithstanding their numbers, they render the music with very delicate shades of expression. Mrs. H. Westervelt is the leading soprano singer. The style of music is varied, but always adapted to the sentiment of the words—whether grave or gay. Mr. W. H. Currie is the organist, and succeeded Wm. A. King in this capacity. He is a native of Dublin, Ireland, and has been in this country about ten years, of which four or five were passed at Chicago and the West. He is a wonderful executive organist, possessing correct taste, with great creative fancy, and plays with a force and sentiment which give the music far more than its individual effect.

Of the merits of the organ we cannot say much at present, as it is in an incomplete state; but it promises to be one of the first-class when finished and will contain forty-four stops, with two and one-half octaves of pedals. It is in the hands of Thomas Robjohn, to whom the contract was given four years ago. At present not more than one-half its intended complement of pipes and stops have been put in. The pneumatic action was tried upon this organ, for the first time in this country, but has proved defective and troublesome. A new hydraulic apparatus for supplying wind is about to be applied to it, and will soon be experimented with and tested.

Mr. Wm. Mason, a son of Dr. Lowell Mason of Boston, is one of our most talented organists. His merits as a pianist are well known and appreciated by all lovers of classical music; but it is not generally known that he also stands in the front ranks as a performer upon the organ. His playing belongs to the strict school of sacred music, and he ignores entirely the modern secular style, as inappropriate to the service of the church. He formerly played at the late Rev. Dr. Alexander's Church (Presbyterian) in Fifth Avenue, but is now temporarily engaged at the New Jerusalem Church in 35th street, of which Mr. Silver is pastor. The services of this Church do not admit largely of musical display, although more is perhaps attempted in this particular one than in many of the same denomination. The opening voluntary is always extemporized by Mr. Mason; then follows a motette, selected from the highest compositions of this class—sung by the quartette choir of amateurs; after which follow chants, at the close a hymn intended to be congregational. The congregation is dismissed without a closing voluntary. Of Mr. Mason's capabilities, the "Diarist," in Dwight's Journal of music, has thus spoken:

"Some two years since a small party remained in Dr. Alexander's church, in New York, after service, and William Mason extemporized upon the organ. That it impressed me strongly is clear from the fact that, notwithstanding all the great organ playing I have heard before and since, that half hour's performance remains fresh and vivid in my memory. In nine cases out of ten, you know beforehand what is to come next in an organ voluntary, just as you know how nine out of ten newspaper stories are to end—or, if your ear is disappointed, it is because the organ knows not where to go nor what to do next. But Mason's themes were so fresh, his episodes so unexpected yet so pleasing, the forms adopted so varied—now a solo with answering chorus from the vox celestis, now the full rolling masses of tone from the grand organ, and at last a fugue moving onward with stately steps—that the ear was constant and delightfully disappointed, the fancy continually excited, and the musical sense filled with enjoyment."

Of the many edifices erected for religious purposes in this city, the Tabernacle (Congregational) corner of Sixth Avenue and 34th street, is perhaps one of the finest and most substantial. The society worshipping here has been for many years under the pastoral charge of Rev. J. P. Thompson, widely known as an intelligent and able preacher. They formerly occupied the old building on Broadway, in the lower part of the city, known as the Broadway Tabernacle, which was used for concerts and other miscellaneous purposes; but, at length, in the march of improvement and the rapid growth of the city, the site of the old building was wanted for a block of stores, it was disposed of at a great advance on first cost, and with the proceeds of this sale, the building which they now occupy was erected and completed about two years since.

It contains a very fine organ, built by Stuart Brothers, after the design and under the superintendence of Mr. G. W. Morgan of Grace Church, with thirty stops, extending throughout its full compass, and two and a half octaves of pedals, which are arranged on Mr. Morgan's plan, described by a previous letter. It is played by Miss Marion McGregor of Rochester. As a general rule, ladies are considered inadequate to the control of a large organ, and seldom attempt it; but those who have succeeded rank high as performers. Among these may be mentioned Miss Tillinghast of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Chicago, and Mrs. Belknap of San Francisco, a pupil of William A. King. One of our first organists informs me that he generally has from three to six pupils. Miss McGregor is generally acknowledged to be second to none as a player of strictly sacred music; her style is of the Dr. Hodges school, so called. The soprano singer of this church, Mrs. Eliot (formerly Miss Anna Stone), is a native of Boston, and no doubt, well known to many of your readers. Miss Ellen Meyer sings alto, and the tenor and bass parts are sustained by Mr. George N. Seymour and J. T. Lewis respectively—the whole forming a quartette of great efficiency. The music is directed by Mr. H. Camp, who succeeds William B. Bradbury in this department.

Rev. Dr. E. H. Chapin's church, in Broadway, is a large and comfortable edifice, and is always crowded by a large and attentive audience, attracted by the eloquence of this distinguished preacher. The music is furnished by a choir of seventy-five children, chosen from the Sabbath school, numbering about three hundred and fifty. They are drilled in the singing school connected with the church every week, and sing, in good time, very plain hymns and tunes, with pleasing effect. Mr. Eickhom acts as superintendent of the Sunday school and director of the choir, Mr. Wilson as leader, and Mr. Anthony Davis (a native of Germany) as organist. The organ was built by the Messrs. Hook of Boston, has 34 stops, three ranks of keys, and is a very fair instrument.—Transcript.

GRELL'S SIXTEEN-PART MASS—THE SING-AKADEMIE.

Berlin, Feb. 21, 1861.

It is almost idle to date these letters. The experiences which they record accumulate so fast, with such full, strong current, never ceasing, each new novelty preoccupying the mind against the last before there is time to write about it, or hardly even to review it in the mind, that all that remains possible for me is to select from the portfolio of memory from time to time, as the painter does from his sketch-book, whatever one happens to feel in the humor for working up, or whatever there may seem to be a call for. Chronological sequence must be given up;—and what of that? The mind's ardor is of more importance than the almanac and has a right to turn it up-side down and supersede it. The music which I hear to-day is heard not always for to-day; but quite as likely for the supplying of a lost link far back in the chain of knowledge and experience, or to save up one against the time of need hereafter. The squirrel does not crack his nuts as fast as he finds them; it were a poor time to do that just as one has the chance (which may not come so soon again) to stuff his pockets. So henceforth we abandon all thought of sequence, as we already have done practically, with the best will to the contrary. The matter for the weekly letter shall be sometimes the last yield of to-day or yesterday, sometimes of an older vintage; whatever has survived unspoiled some weeks or months, will taste the better. This time I will speak of what last happened, while the impression of it is as fresh and fit for service as it probably ever will be.

A musical work was produced here for the first time last evening of a form and magnitude unexampled in these days, remarkable for any age, but more like one of the most earnest and ambitious products of the days of Palestrina and Orlando Lasso, and the learned Flemish and Italian masters of church music, than like anything that is wont to grow under our nineteenth century culture. It was a complete Mass for sixteen distinct voice-parts, composed by the grey-haired director of the Sing-Akademie, Professor GRELL, and sung by the Akademie, the composer himself conducting. The Mass is purely vocal, a capella; voices unsustained by any sort of accompaniment, except that the sub-director BLUMMER touched occasionally a bass note or a chord on the piano as a touchstone of true pitch. There were from three to four hundred singers, with a delegation of sixteen soli in front, who sang some movements wholly by themselves, and in other movements alternated with full chorus, with a view to vary, relieve and adorn the great, broad, curiously involved, slowly and majestically moving mass of harmony. The performance had been long expected and much talked of. The Mass was supposed to be the masterpiece of Grell in his peculiar sphere, that of the severe and learned old Italian church style, of which he is thought to be at the present day the foremost representative in Germany; devoted to it with a somewhat pedantic and one-sided life-long persistency (for indeed he seems to be a very dry old man), but with a mastery that entitles to respect in any real branch of Art. The rehearsals had been many and most careful; the Sing-Akademie lending themselves with a most patient loyal zeal to the work, resolved to do their best (and they never do anything that is not marvellously good), to make their director's work tell to the best advantage. The hall of course was completely filled by the most musically enlightened audience of Berlin, including a host of music-directors, professors and composers.

The impression which the work made upon me (and I should judge upon most listeners) was mixed and very curious. Many of the choral effects were positively sublime; and indeed all that was sung en masse by the whole choir, so greatly subdivided, sounded rich, full, wide-spread and majestic to a degree seldom realized. The mere sound of it, of such a broad, deep stream of tone, in which sixteen several streams were blended, was really a new, a glorious sensation, filling one now with awe and now with ecstasy. Some of the climaxes, where all the voices climb through modulations, as in the Gloria, the Quoniam tu solus, the Sanctus, and especially in Hosanna in excelsis, were enough to make one breathless with wonder. Of course literal sixteen-part harmony, simultaneous, realized in each instant, is impossible, within the range of all kinds of human voices. That is to say, vocal harmony in chords of sixteen notes is out of the question. The problem is solved only by the contrapuntal process of figuration, imitation, echoing and distributing about of little melodic phrases and fragments amongst the sixteen parts. Everything must be said more than once, in order that all may have a share in singing it. This has its inconveniences, its questionable consequences, to which we shall afterwards allude. But at times and for certain purposes it was exceedingly effective, used as it was with such consummate skill, so as to make a consistent, clear, euphonious whole out of the mingled risings and subsidings of so many little single waves, so many independent voices, each as it were eager to distinguish itself by some individual way of saying the same thing which all had to say. You felt it, for instance, when the whole air seemed cut up into little Amens, as fine as the words engraved all over the face of a bank bill. The Credo and Resurrexi found wondrous confirmation in all this answering of independent voices, this mastering and reconciling of differences and contrasts. Such words as visibillum omnium et invisibillum lent a beautiful occasion for this sort of treatment. There was once a passage where the contralto voices ran in triplets, varying the theme, whilst the general mass moved on in longer tones, which sounded exquisitely. On the other hand the yielding of the interwoven, figurative style now and then to a brief passage of soft, smoothly flowing harmony, as in propter nostram salutem descendit and in another intended to represent the lovely image of the Virgin (ex Maria virgine), produced a heavenly feeling. It was as when the ocean that has so long tossed in waves, becomes a mirror glassing the heavens' blue. Always had the composer adapted his music fitly to the thought and to the word of the Latin text. There was no such discrepancy as we find in so many of the more secular sorts of Catholic masses, even some of Haydn's in which the supplicating Kyrie eleison is made to revel in careless, florid bird-like warblings. Solemn themes, like the Crucifixus, were made profoundly impressive.

On the other hand, the vast design, so well accomplished, carries its own condemnation along with it, in the fact the necessary fact, of its inordinate length. The Mass lasted two hours. However grand in certain points, however interesting and impressive during moments, however full of new suggestion for the technical musician (and doubtless there was much to be learned from it, especially if one would study the score), still the impression as a whole was tedious and exhausting. To carry out such a plan, to give fair play to sixteen voices, required much room, more than the subject warranted in some of the movements. It had to be as long as it was broad. The bread had to be broken among such a multitude that it took a long time to get round. And that, too, in each single movement, or separately treated text, of the Mass. First, for the sake of contrast, movements were treated alternately by the sixteen solis and by the whole chorus. Not only did this double the length of everything, but it operated most of the time more as a foil, than as a contrast in itself agreeable. You were too glad always to have the chorus come back. The solis sounded hard, un-genial, thin; the crossings of voices often laid bare dangerous places on the uncomfortable verge of discord, such as you did not feel in the sublime and as it were self-rectifying harmonic masses of the chorus of four hundred. The Benedictus, however, which was sung only by the solis, was very beautiful and spoke to the feelings. The Kyrie and Christe were particularly over-long: first by solis, then by chorus, then solis again, each time treated at exhaustive length; and then a going back to the beginning and summing the whole up by the full choir. Had it begun with the last division, omitting all that went before, the effect must have been finer, one would think.

Grand as the thing was, you listened with impatience. It did not seem to get forward; it continually hung back, after it had fully passed you with its thought and put you in the mood of going on. A certain nightmare spell, the penalty of its own greatness, seemed to have invisibly bound its feet. We have already seen the reason. In treating sixteen voices, something must be found for each to do; they cannot move in four-fold common chords; the voice does not command so many octaves. Accordingly each theme, each motive, each musical statement has to be pulled to pieces and divided about among them in little figurative repetitions, answers, variations, melodic phrases of a moment's length. If this be well done, as it certainly is in this case, it lends a wonderful fullness, and sense of crowded, swarming life, yet quite harmonious, to the whole mass. But it can scarcely be called contrapuntal, or real polyphonic writing, in the high sense; for, though each of the sixteen parts manifests a certain amount of individual motion, it can only move a very little way, it can only go the length of its tether; there it stands tied to its post of a fixed harmony, with liberty to play a little around that, making little variations on it; but it does not move on in continuous self-development, twining itself with other individualities into a polyphonic whole, as in the works of Bach. The separate motion, the little melodic figuration of the parts, adds nothing to the thought and does not lead to anything; it only increases and enriches, so to speak, the sonority of the whole tone-mass at each given moment. It does not amount to creation; it has nothing to do with that part which genius plays in every composition; it is after all an art of effect; it is studied skill. Such a chorus dispenses with all orchestra; it needs none; it clothes itself with its own accompaniment. But in a way that prevents a natural rate of going forward. To accompany itself thus it has to repeat and multiply itself in little, and take many steps without advancing.

How different the polyphony of Bach, of Handel and other great ones! Four-part harmony is enough for them—as a rule. Five parts, six parts or a double choir, exceptionally and occasionally, serve for peculiar effects. The four voice parts have real, independent, characteristic and continuous progress; and for further enrichment, for color and support drawn from wider octaves, they employ instruments, which give a more piquant and decided contrast, and which add interesting accessory ideas. The sound of Grell's sixteen-part choir was unspeakably grand and beautiful sometimes; but you grew weary of it; it was positively a relief to our ears to hear again some four-part harmony, happily afforded in the second part of the concert by another new composition of his, a Te Deum, also a capella, and very fine. Introduced occasionally in the course of four-part compositions, for certain purposes, as for instance for the illustration of certain grand texts like some in Handel's "Israel," these sixteen-voiced sublimities might be admirable. But used through the whole length of a Mass, for two hours, they show you that the experiment is after all a failure, that the principle is wrong. It is chiefly as a curiosity therefore that this work is interesting. It proves abundantly the learning, the mastery of Grell. But it is not an achievement for which music can be thankful more than once.

Wonderful as the composition was, in its way, a greater wonder was its almost perfect execution by the Sing-Akademie. To sing through an entire Mass, in sixteen voice-parts, without any accompaniment whatever, during two hours, keeping the most complicated tone-web always whole and clear, entering always at the right time with promptness and decision, never lost or faltering, giving the right shade of expression, the right degree of force to every passage, the tones all pure and musical, the balance admirable, was an achievement which presupposes a remarkable average of ability and culture in the ranks, as well as indefatigable devotion and loyalty to a common end, and the most patient and well-directed practice. We have had something to boast of in the way of oratorio chorus singing in our own Boston; but nothing that could be compared to this. It was the crowning achievement of a society, who, every time that I have heard them have astonished me by the singular unity and perfection of their renderings. The Sing-Akademie, which was the life-work of Fusch and Zelter, to be whose successor therein Mendelssohn aspired, only to be defeated by an inferior candidate, and which stands now higher than ever before, probably, under Grell and Blummer, counting three or four hundred ladies and gentlemen of the most cultivated families of Berlin among its members, and having its own noble building, which contains house-room for its Director, a fine concert hall for its great performances, elegant ante-rooms, with busts and portraits (oil paintings) of the great composers meeting the eye at every turn, with a nice little upper hall for chamber concerts, and all sorts of conveniences—a completely furnished establishment in fact, is very properly the pride of Berlin and the object of much fostering care on the part of Prussian Princes, especially his late majesty King Frederick Wilhelm IV., the record of whose acts in furtherance of a high musical taste and culture in his capital is a rich and long one. The Sing-Akademie is such a musical society as we need in Boston, and in all our large cities, and I must endeavor soon to give a more detailed account of it.

NEW ORLEANS—Le Pardon de Plöermel.—Mr. Boudouasque has wisely decided no longer to delay the production of Meyerbeer's new opera, "Le Pardon de Plöermel." M^{lle} Adeline Patti, having perfected herself since she has been here, in the leading role, that of Dinorah, as that in which it is her intention to make her debut, on the London lyric boards, has been engaged to sing it here; and to-morrow evening the long-looked for opera, with its charming music, its new and elegant scenery, and its appropriate costumes and properties, will be produced—M^{lle} Patti, M^{mes} Richer, Pretti and Maillet, and Messrs. Melchisedec, Carrier, Genibrel, Chol, Delamarre and Debrinay forming the cast.

Italian Opera.

La Sonnambula was given on Thursday of last week, on the occasion of the benefit of Signor Brignoli, with Miss Kellogg in the part of Amina, Brignoli as Elvino and Susini as the Count. A Mad. Parazza, whose face has been long familiar in the ranks of the chorus, attempted the important rôle of Lisa. BRIGNOLI, of course, did his best, and that, in music so congenial to his powers, was of an excellence that can scarce be equalled. It is idle to enumerate the particular passages of an opera so thoroughly familiar as this, in which Signor Brignoli would excel, for it would be merely to give the titles of all the songs of the part of Elvino, from the beginning to the end of the opera. Add to this, that he never sang better and the whole story is told.

SUSINI made an effective Count Rodolpho, so far as good acting makes one, but was still not in good voice.

MISS KELLOGG, in many respects, was an admirable Amina. Her conception of the part was perfect, and generally both her voice and action carried out successfully her idea of the character and the intentions of the composer. In all the arias her neat execution, good style and acute perception of the requirements of the situation contributed to make her efforts satisfactory and pleasing, but in the concerted pieces she was wanting in sufficient power to cope with the more vigorous voices of those who surrounded her. The grand finale, Ah non giunge, was admirably executed and elicited much applause. A great drawback to this performance was the utterly incompetent representative of Lisa, who was hardly able to do enough to keep up the thread of the story, even with the omission of all the airs that she should give. The part is an important and very interesting one, and in the hands of Miss Hinkley, for example, (for it is by no means one beneath her), the opera would have been adequately represented. A young and ambitious prima donna could almost create this part before our audiences by giving it careful study. Who will do it?

La Sonnambula was repeated on Tuesday evening of this week for the benefit of Miss KELLOGG, which could have been but little benefit, by reason of the almost unparalleled severity of the snow storm which kept people effectually at home. This evening BARILI took the place of Susini, and consequently much more of the opera was omitted, even Vi ravviso. So the opera was practically given with no Lisa and no Count! Which will be omitted next, Amina or Elvino? Miss Kellogg and Brignoli did their best, and the beneficeaire received an offering of flowers at the close of the first act, on being called before the curtain.

La Juive has been twice performed, since our last; on Friday of last week and on Monday of this week. The attention of the hearer, at the first representation, was much disturbed by the intense dramatic interest of the plot, (which is one of the most successful of the works of the late Eugene Scribe), by the pomp of the spectacle, and by the unfamiliar character of the music itself, which fails to make a very marked impression upon the first hearing, beyond a very general one. A second and a third hearing have made its character better understood, and its beauties stand out now quite clearly and distinctly, although they are not of the sort that are easily retained in the memory, the melodies being short and broken, the composer looking always, more to the dramatic than the musical effect of his score, and thus making his music more largely of the nature of recitative and of concerted pieces than of the melodies which characterize the works of other popular composers of the day. These later hearings revealed many passages of much interest. The opening chorus of the third scene, Celebriam, is one of much brilliancy and well introduces the great scenic display that follows. The music of the first scene that begins the second act, is full of solemnity, and of a quaintness that seems in keeping with the religious character of the Jewish festival. The trio between Eudoxia, Leopoldo and the Jew, later in this scene, is one of much beauty and dramatic effect; but we longed to hear such a voice from the Prince as would fill out the harmony with the power that was intended, whereas Signor Scola was almost inaudible.

The portion of the opera which follows, the scenes between Rachel, Leopold and Lazarus, though of great dramatic interest, became a little wearisome from being unduly spun out, unrelieved by any melodies standing in relief from the general monotony of the music. The trio, however, at the end of the act is perhaps the more effective from this contrast and brilliantly closes it. The third and fourth acts do not equal the first and last in interest, with the exception of some beautiful airs sung by Stigelli. The last act is a grand climax to the whole opera, and the solemn dead march that opens it, to which such a thrilling effect of horror is given by the shrill piercing tones of the sife that mark its rhythm, make a most effective introduction to this exciting and almost painful finale. Very impressive, and solemn too, are the sombre and strange harmonies of the unaccompanied chorus that announces to the martyrs that the fatal hour has come, freezing the soul of Rachel with terror, and filling the mind of Lazarus with distracting and cruel doubts, whether to save her, or to permit her to suffer as a martyr. These violent passions are adequately and forcibly painted by the music of Halévy taken in connection with the effects of stage and scenery that it requires. How it would strike one apart from these it is not easy to say.

COLSON and STIGELLI again won new laurels by their wonderful impersonation of the characters of the Jew and his daughter, singing with unusual brilliancy and effect at the second performance which was by far the best of the three. Martha was repeated to a large audience on last Saturday afternoon, and we are glad to learn that we are to have still another opportunity of hearing La Juive this afternoon, which is the very last performance of this troupe which leaves for New York to open at the Academy on Monday.

We go to press too early this week, on account of the annual Fast, to be able to give any report of the later performances.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—THE MESSIAH.—The time-honored Messiah exerted its accustomed influence in filling the hall completely, on Sunday evening March 31st. Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS is much to be praised for singing with inmost feeling. Especially moving was her air: "He was despised." She proved again, that she is a true and worthy artist. Mr. STIGELLI likewise sang with dignity and feeling, in many instances rising to a high degree of expression. Both these artists added very greatly to the enjoyment of the evening. Misses KELLOGG and HINCKLEY are yet too young to have experience enough in the oratorio style. Deep feeling, dignified expression both being based on the emotion the artist himself experiences, are necessary requisites for a success in oratorio, which the ladies will yet have to acquire. Dr. GUILMETTE ought to sing with a more even tone. His wavering takes away much of the interest in his performance. Most of the choruses were done well. Some runs might have been smoother. *†

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—By an oversight in furnishing the plates for the music pages of this number of the Journal, a continuation of "Hymn of Praise" is presented instead of "Martha," as announced in the usual place.

Music Abroad.

Vienna.

The most important event last week was the appearance of Joseph Joachim. In years gone by, the Viennese had, it is true, heard him as a wonderful child, but the wonderful man still remained a stranger to them. Vienna, the cradle, if not of Joachim himself, at least of his reputation, as well as the place of his education, had some reason to complain of the manner in which she had been invariably overlooked by the artist in the course of his long travels. Young as he is, Joachim has been considered, for nearly the last ten years, the first of living violinists, and the fact of Vieuxtemps having been, now and then compared to him, proves that those who used such a standard were aware that they had to deal with greatness of no ordinary kind. It was no easy task for an artist to satisfy such high and long-cherished expectations of a public as experienced as ours. And yet Joachim has accomplished it in the most brilliant manner.

He began with Beethoven's concerto in D major. After the very first movement, it must have been evident to all that they had before them not only a most astonishing virtuoso, but a man of great importance and originality. With all his bravura, Joachim is so totally merged in the musical ideal, that he might be described as a perfect musician, who had passed through and gone beyond the most brilliant "virtuosity." His playing is grand, noble, and free. There is not the slightest tinge of "virtuosity" about it; whatever, in the solos could remind us of vanity or self-esteem is passed over, without our perceiving the faintest trace of it. This nobleness of artistic conviction is so prominent in Joachim, that it prevents our thinking until afterwards of the appreciation due to his magnificent technical skill.

What fullness and power in the tone which Joachim's grand and certain bowing draws from the instrument! It struck us, on the first occasion of our hearing Joachim, that, even in the most emphatic treatment of the lower violin passages, there was none of that peculiarly material scraping and shuffling on the string which we have at times heard in the playing of the most celebrated violinists. Joachim's shake is incomparable for purity and equality while his polyphonic playing is, at one and the same time, so well combined, and yet so sharply distinct, that the listener frequently fancies he hears two performers. In the course of his concerts Joachim will enable us to form a still nearer acquaintance with his technical skill. After once hearing him, it strikes us that it would not be quite safe to pronounce even a general opinion on his merits, since he will probably exhibit his art to us under other aspects. After his first concert, we certainly felt inclined to believe that the expression of what is great, noble, and pathetic was the task best adapted to his nature. He must show us, in other compositions, whether he is as great a master of light grace, easy wit, and fresh humor. His rendering of Beethoven's concerto—especially his execution of the adagio, which he gave with deep feeling, but with such a degree of freedom that he almost appeared to be extemporizing—afforded proofs of the most decided independence of conception. The concerto was more brilliant and more animated under Vieuxtemps' bow. Joachim exhibited greater depth of feeling, and by truly ethical power, surpassed the effect which Vieuxtemps' playing produced by his gushing temperament.

The second piece was an adagio by Spohr, the uniformity of which lost everything like ponderousness in the vigorous and, at the same time, varied manner in which Joachim gave it; but it was in Tartini's Teufels-Sonata that he struck us as most astonishing. We feel sure that violinists will agree with us when we say that this specimen of colossal and, at the same, classically refined, technical skill, was something never previously equalled. The most difficult bravura passages in this piece—passages which the performer is generally contented to get over with unpretending mediocrity—Joachim not merely produced with ease and certainty, but absolutely in countless instances, impressed an accent pregnant with meaning on this noisy, seething, confused mass of sounds; he "gets up lights" which lent the whole thing a new and expressive character. To sum up, we remember scarcely a second virtuoso whose entire performance completely in one and the same mould, and consequently so pure and harmonious in its effect.—Musical World.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 2.—Alas! for the consequences of being in a hurry, as shown in my forgetting to enclose Mr. Satter's programme in my last. I send it to you now, hoping that you will not consider it as coming too late to be of any value.

1. Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," . . . Otto Nicolai
2. a "Drusenthal," Fantasia-stück, E. Goldback
- b Sentiment Potique, J. N. Pattison
- c "Columbia," Caprice Américain, L. M. Gottschalk
3. Sonata, D minor, Op. 31, Beethoven
- a Allegro molto, b Adagio, c Finale.
4. (By request), Grand Fantasia sur "La Juive," . . . Satter

On Tuesday Mason and Thomas gave their fifth Soirée. Mendelssohn's posthumous quintette, in B flat, opened the programme. The first movement was a little marred by the instruments not being quite in tune; the effect, probably, of the very warm, damp atmosphere. Indeed, neither this movement nor the Finale were as clear and melodious as most of Mendelssohn's compositions and not by any means as pleasing as the Andante scherzando and Adagio, which were well worthy of their composer. This piece was followed by Beethoven's moonlight Sonata, played by Mr. Mason, and a Sonata for Piano and Violin by Raff, in which the same gentleman was joined by Mr. Thomas. This latter was interesting as a novelty, and showed a great deal of vigor and talent, but it had the fault of extreme length, and thus became wearisome. The whole concert would have been more enjoyable if it had been left out altogether. In that case, however, the audience would have missed the very fine performance of Mr. Thoman. An exquisite quartette of Mozart, No. 6, in C, verified the adage of "All's well that ends well," thus sending home the audience with the remembrance of only the many enjoyable points of the concert, and forgetfulness of the few drawbacks which it presented. Another uncommonly fine concert was given on Thursday night, by the Arion Singing Society. The programme was excellent, as you may judge for yourself.

1. Symphony No. 4 in D minor..... R. Schumann
2. Song of the Spirits on the Face of the Waters. Schubert Grand double Chorus with Orchestra.
3. Concerto for Violin..... Mendelssohn Bartholdy Joseph Noll.
4. Goethe's March (First time)..... Fr. Liszt
5. Overture, "The Magic Flute,"..... Mozart
6. The Forest..... Haesser
Chorus without accompaniment.
7. Concerto for Violoncello..... Golttermann
Henry Mollenhauer.
8. Cantilene and Finale. (First time.)
March and chorus from "Tannhäuser," R. Wagner by the "Arion" and the Ladies Chorus of the New York Singing Academy.

The orchestra, consisting of the best part of the Philharmonic, under the direction of Mr. Bergmann did fullest justice to the beautiful Symphony, and Mozart's ever fresh overture. So also to Liszt's Goethe-march, which was, however the least enjoyable number of the programme. The Arion sang very finely, and gave evidence of Mr. Anschütz' spirited and careful training. The last chorus in which they were assisted by about 20 ladies, gave universal satisfaction. Mendelssohn's Concerto was not interpreted as well as it might have been by Mr. Noll, whose performance lacks entirely the delicacy, refinement and soul which this composition requires. In any thing where vigor and breadth are needed, Mr. Noll leaves nothing to be wished for, he should confine himself to such works. The concerto played by Mr. Mollenhauer was admirably calculated to show off the beauties of the instrument of which this artist is a master; which made his performances exceedingly satisfactory.

PARIS, MARCH 15, 1861.—The new opera house will, it seems now decided, not be built on the site of the old one. The committee charged with making a report upon the plans submitted to them has pronounced the space allotted too small. For a capital as large as Paris, increasing daily in pleasure-seekers and art-lovers, a building larger than the one proposed would be required. The Grand Opera now accommodates 1,800 spectators, the new Academy of Music will, it is computed, not seat more than 2000. When it is considered that the 25 theatres of Paris and the 145 places of amusement are crowded nightly, the demands for a more suitable opera house than the temporary building now in use will be appreciated.

There are few places more uncomfortable than the interior of the theatres of this capital. Even in the best places it is difficult to take one's seat without causing many persons to rise. There is no room: the lobbies are narrow and close. This is no new matter of complaint, and in consequence the Parisian shuns the theatre in summer. When the present government is displaying such magnificence in the construction of public edifices it will certainly erect for art a monument worthy of the reign that is transfiguring Paris on each side.

The committee then have not accepted any of the plans proposed. These plans which were on exhibition for several days at the palace of industry presented some beautiful façades, though as a general thing there seemed to be a lack of originality. There was much of that classicism of the nineteenth century which stamps the architecture of the reign of Napoleon III.

Great care was bestowed by the artists upon the entrances. The vestibules and stairways were planned in such dimensions that there was cause to fear that the new Academy of Music was to be all exterior. The hall was forgotten in the study for monumental effect.

Prizes were awarded to the authors of five of the plans though none was deemed worthy of acceptance. The exigencies were indeed great upon the architect. The space too small. Carriage ways had to be provided, passages for pedestrians, a private entry for the Emperor all covered and made to tally with the monumental character of the edifice. The boxes were to be preceded each by a sitting-room, and room allotted for the imperial escort. These demands and others were from the first pronounced as incompatible with the space allowed. Several artists in fact sent in their designs disregarding the conditions. The result of the trial was the abandonment of the locality proposed.

And where will the new opera house then be situated? A place contiguous to the Place Vendôme has been suggested. The garden of the Tuilleries is seriously proposed. The Place de Rouen so far seems the most advisable, but it is not large enough. However, Paris knows how to demolish if needs be. Since 1852 streets enough have been cleared away not to be frightened at the demolition of some hundreds of houses.

The new Theatre Lyrique and opposite to it the new Cirque Impériale will, it is hoped, be completed in summer. The work progresses night and day. Those who cross the Atlantic in July may be in time to be present at the first representations.

The receipts for the month of February in the theatres of Paris are 1,751,362 francs. In the month of February last year the receipts were 1,765,398 francs, showing a decrease of above 14,000 francs.

Of new pieces produced with the last two weeks may be mentioned "Une femme emballée" comedy by M. Laurencin played at the Folies Dramatiques. "La servante de Nicholas," operetta by Mm. Nérée Désarbres and Nutter, music by M. Erlanger. "Je vous aime," by the son of Victor Hugo, M. Charles Hugo, at the Vaudeville. At the Opera Comique, Le jardinier galant by M. Ferdinand Poise has taken the place of Madame Gergoire, which it resembles in plot. Light, easy music, quick, gay action. Neither of these operettas have superseded the Circassienne which still draws as at first. At the Odeon Le portrait d'une jolie femme, by M. Rochfort is a weak comedy composed in a pretentious style.

The Comédie Française has produced nothing new since Les Effrontés which are still being played, though with occasional rays of light along the rows that were so crowded on its first appearance.

At the Theatre Lyrique, the representations of Le Val d'Andorre are drawing to a close. A new piece La Statue, opera in three acts is announced.

The Massacres de Syrie, at the Theatre du Cirque Impériale still attracts crowds among which the military are conspicuous who come to see the manoeuvres of the camels. A red placard is affixed to the bill posted at the door, informing the public that the camels will make their first entry at eight o'clock precisely, and besides, that "other camels from Africa appear in the grand march at ten." They are pealed, shabby looking creatures those "African camels," however, the spectacle is in its way truly "exciting," that's the word. But the massacres must give way next week to a new play by M. Alexander Dumas, "Le prisonnier de la Bastille, Fin des mousquetaires." Are we then to see the last of these Guardsmen? M. Maquet unceremoniously interposes before the production of this last play of Dumas and demands "his share" in the honors and profits. The prolific novelist is not eager to accept the claims of his ancient collaborators, but Maquet has redressed himself by appeal to the tribunals more than once, and we shall probably see on the bills, in spite of the author of Monte Christo, "par Mm. Dumas et Maquet."

Mlle Dejaset whom an indisposition had prevented from appearing for some time, has resumed her roles at her theatre of the Boulevard. Mme. Ristori has returned from Russia and is now in Paris preparing herself to appear in "The Madonna of Art" of M. Ernest Legouvé. She is to play at the Odeon and in French.

Ravel of the Palais Royal is engaged for St. Petersburg at the rate of 70,000 francs per season.

Wagner's Tannhäuser has at last been produced—Wednesday was the first representation. The Emperor was present. It was at his special wish that this German "music of the future," is heard now for the first time in Paris. The first production of Tannhäuser is an event even here. Mad. Tedesco personated Venus, and Herr Niemann seems to have satisfied the most exacting.

I must not remain silent concerning the scope of work that has called forth whole volumes of criticism in musical Germany. A magazine has been lately started which openly declares Tannhäuser to be the starting point of modern art. The enemies of the new style are bitter in the epithets they apply to it. I have heard a worthy professor in Munich, Riehl lose all patience when having occasion to mention that "new style which is enough to send dogs howling away." And Riehl is a talented critic, and man of exquisite taste; his "musical letters" recommend themselves by the depth of their views and the application the author finds to the sister arts with which music is so intimate linked. The admirers of Wagner on the other hand, are no less celebrated. At any rate it has become a fashion to sneer at the "music of the future." I cannot be one of the sneerers, I have seen of late too many horrid puns and caricatures in the weeklies of Paris.

There was opposition at the first representation of Tannhäuser on last Wednesday. There was some hissing, still [the applause] drowned these demonstrations. The work has to battle against the ridicule of the press. A dangerous opponent in France. It is too soon to be able to know the sentence of these Sunday critics. In my next I shall recount the failure or success of the work of Richard Wagner.

CHICAGO, MARCH 16, 1861.—The fifth Concert of this Society on Monday, March 11, was, as usual, well attended, for the mere announcement of a Philharmonic Concert is sufficient to fill Bryan Hall. The Society, with their efficient conductor, HANS BALATKA, is doing a good work in the cultivation of a high order of musical taste in our city.

1. Overture, "Egmont"..... Beethoven.
2. Scene for Baritone, "Page Bouyer et Capitaine." Mr. DePasio. Membre.
3. Solo for Violoncello, "Souvenir de Spa,"..... Servais.
4. Aria, from fourth act of "Martha,"..... Flotow.
Miss Smith.
5. { a Notturmo, } "Midsummer Night's Dream"
b Scherzo..... Mendelssohn.
6. Overture, "Girondists,"..... Litolff.
7. Trio, Finale, "Ernani,"..... Verdi.
Miss Dewey, Mr. Smith, Mr. DePasio.
8. Fantasia on a National Theme, for Orchestra..... Balatka.

Madame FABBRI, we regret to say, has left us, and is now operating with great success, in Detroit and Cincinnati. The best proofs of her popularity and of the great triumphs which she achieved during her stay here, are the ten concerts, in which she appeared before our best and most select audiences, and in all of which she met with the most cordial reception and with an unprecedented success, such as no artistes, who have appeared before her, can boast of. When shall we hear her like again!

For the next Philharmonic Concert Mozart's Symphony, No. 3, in E flat, is announced.

NORTH WEYMOUTH, MASS., MARCH 12 — Presuming your readers may be interested in musical matters at Weymouth, I thought I would send you an account of the "Union Choral Society." It was formed last fall, and has about seventy-five male members. The officers are:

President: H. C. Webb.

Vice President: F. B. Bates.

Clerk and Treasurer: Oliver Lord.

Directors: E. Hunt, L. Curtis, J. W. Bartlett, L. Stetson, C. L. Pratt.

Conductor: H. C. Webb, of Boston.

They brought out the "Messiah" and performed it very creditably at Weymouth Town Hall twice, and at Quincy, Hingham, and Braintree Town Halls once each, with an orchestra of 18 pieces and chorus of about 100 voices. The orchestra, with one exception (Hohnstock, of Boston) reside in Weymouth or its vicinity. It was led by Mr. N. U. Torrey, of the Howard Athenæum orchestra, one of our best native born violinists and a Weymouth boy.

The concerts, although costing the Society about $50 cash resulted in a loss of but $2.23. This we think doing well for Classical Concerts.

At a Town meeting held last Monday it was voted the Society have the free use of the Town Hall for rehearsals and concerts.

The performances this winter are an honor to the place, and, with the more than ordinary vocal and instrumental talent there is in Weymouth and vicinity, its excellent Conductor, and the encouragement given it by the town, it is hoped and believed that it will be a permanent institution.

The Society is now rehearsing the "Creation," although it will probably not bring it out this Spring but will give one or two miscellaneous concerts.

WARREN.

ST. LOUIS, MARCH, 1861. — Our Philharmonic Society had afforded to the inhabitants of this city, this winter, the first opportunity they ever had of hearing, regularly, classical music. I have been closely watching the effect. Previously, you never heard the subject mentioned save among a few. Now, the whole city has become aroused. Some, because it is fashionable, and they spend all their time at the concerts whispering, and comparing clothes; while the most, I am glad to see, are actuated by an earnest endeavor to learn. This Society has done the cause of music more good than any thing else that has ever been done west of the Alleghanies, as they have aroused the people to a consideration of classical music.

One word here, as to an occurrence that happened; some of the papers criticized the last concert a little, and gave much offence. The editors were informed that they had no right to criticize because tickets were free; they did not deny the truth of the criticism. This is wrong. If 2500 give their time they have a right to criticize. Besides the tickets are not free, as each member paid fifty dollars for seventy tickets. The Society must learn to stand criticism, good or bad, and endure remarks, even ill-natured ones. We are glad to learn, however, that the objections to being criticized were raised by some of the very young members, part of whom were the ones criticized, and that their course was heartily condemned by all the rest. We did intend to make long complaints about those who go to the concerts as they go to a fair, whispering all the time, but we came across this extract and hope you have room for it, or a part at least. I wish the Society would let me make a speech to the audience.

"One who keeps his eyes and ears open," makes in The Ledger the following true remarks on that most intolerable class of people, those who whisper at concerts:

"After attending the Philharmonic Concerts of New York for ten years, we make up our minds that there could scarcely be found as many polite people in New York as there were right-eous people in Sodom. The music seemed to be designed only as a cover behind which young and frivolous people could whisper. When the instruments rose up into great volumes of sound, of course whispering was drowned, but when the flow of sound subsided, and the more exquisite passages were murmuring gently, we have often lost the whole effect by the sibilant whispers all around. Go where we would, change from parquette to gallery, from one side to the other, everybody was busy in disturbing all who came for music. In the pettishness of disappointment we sometimes have been disposed to place these ill-mannered whisperers in the Apostle's catalogue of offenders. It is certain that they stand high in the court of ill-bred people. A person may be intelligent, well-dressed, and amiable, his connections may be high, his parents wealthy, and he may proudly claim to belong to the first society; but a person who whispers at opera or concert, is to be pronounced ill-mannered—and that without appeal or benefit of clergy! Nor is that all. Parents cannot have done their duty whose children do not know any better how to behave on public occasions. And when people who are cheated out of all the pleasure for which they have come to a musical festival, are smarting with this annoyance, they inwardly blame the mother rather than the daughter, and pity children that have been suffered to go out into society with so little knowledge of what is proper. A person who is truly polite at a concert or opera will be polite anywhere."

The material of the Society proves to be excellent, first class, and their energy is unequalled. Besides they have another important element of prosperity, plenty of money. So we promise ourselves great things.

The sixth Concert was Monday evening, March 25th, and by far the best yet, both in number, performers and finish of execution. The St. Louis Opera House, and the theatre are closed and Mr. Vogel with his orchestra joined the Society. The audience, to the number of twenty-five hundred were densely packed in the hall an hour before the time, although it was raining very hard.

PART I.

1. Overture, "Magic Flute"..... W. A. Mozart
2. Chorus: "How lovely are the messengers," from Oratorio "St. Paul"..... Mendelssohn
3. Scene and Aria: "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz"..... C. M. von Weber
4. Allegro and Finale, "5th Symphony"..... Beethoven
5. Flute solo, "Air Suisse"..... Boehm

PART II.

6. Overture, "Midsummer Night Dream" (by particular request)..... Mendelssohn
7. Chorus: "Oh! great is the depth of the Riches," from Oratorio "St. Paul"..... Mendelssohn
8. Grand Aria, "Le Pardon de Plermel"..... Meyerbeer
9. Male chorus, "Hunting Song"..... Mendelssohn
10. Song: "Thou art so near, and yet so far"..... Reichardt
11. Finale from "La Traviata"..... Verdi

The solo from Der Freischütz, sung by Miss Tourney was the best that we have heard so far in these concerts; we confess to have entertained a prejudice against her heretofore, but last night wholly removed it. The orchestral accompaniment was just what it should be, and it all harmonized so well, that the girl behind me, who had a fine ear for music, exclaimed, "Why, how much her voice sounds like the violins, I can't tell when she is singing, and when she aint." "However," as the man said about St. Paul, "That's where you and I differ."

Mr. Carr's Flute Solo was received with genuine delight. We can say no more of this gentleman than we have. The aforesaid young lady remarked to her beau, "He plays pretty well for an amateur." Allow us to assure the young lady, with our compliments, that Mr. Carr does play pretty well for an amateur, and if there is a professional in the United States that can excel him, (I except one) I would like to hear him. Right in here the young lady behind me interposed another remark which I leave for your readers to answer, "Is it the thing for the singers in a concert to wear black gloves" as many did.

The grand Aria Mr. Sabatski sung very well, and the "song" by a pupil of his showed great training. The Overtures, Choruses and Finale could hardly have been better. Too much credit can hardly be given to so young a society, for their rendering of such music. B.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Resignation. Miss Lindsay. 30

This song has quickly found its way into almost every musical family in England. It is of a truly devotional character, the words breathing a true Christian spirit, the music lofty and elevating.

Thoughts of thee. Julius E. Muller. 25

This composer of many fine and useful Piano pieces has tried his hand very successfully in a song, which has all the graces of melody and a rich harmonic fundment.

The sunny South. L. B. Barnes. 25

A melodious, pretty ballad, bright as the genial atmosphere and clear sky of the Southern zones.

Miserere. Sextet. "Trovatore." 25

Got up in this cheap form for Singing-clubs and Societies. It is printed precisely as sung in the Opera without change of key or any attempt at simplification. This is only one number of a long list of "Operatic Selections" for Choral Societies which are now being published at low prices. Among those out already the "Market Chorus" from "Martha," and the splendid Finale of the fourth act of "Ernani" deserve mentioning.

Instrumental Music.

Key City March. Helen M. Spaulding. 25

Physicians' Quick March. C. A. Stewart. 25

Two good military marches, easy to play.

Un Ballo in Maschera. Beauties arranged in 2 books, by Adolph Baumbach, each 50

Since this new Opera of Verdi's has gained such a decided hold upon our music lovers here that the demand for a piano arrangement of its sparkling melodies has become immense, this series written in the style of the well-known Trovatore selections by the same author will be hailed with gratification. The gems are all there: the splendid Quartet, the sweet Tenor Romanza, the dashing Barcarolle, the Laughing Chorus, the charming Songs of the Page, the galop-like Chorus of the ball-scene. None of the favorites will be missed.

Books.

THE AMERICAN MUSICAL CLASS BOOK. Designed for Female Colleges, Institutes, Seminaries, and Normal and High Schools. Containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises and Solfeggios, and a Valuable Collection of Duets, Trios, and Concerted Pieces. By T. Bissell. 50

Among the numerous works of the kind this cannot fail of a prominence, since its peculiar features are such as will commend it at once to the patronage of those for whom it is chiefly intended. Its rudimentary lessons proceed with a regularity of precision that cannot fail to fix permanently on the mind of the pupil the essentials of success in future studies—the exercises are in a form to attract the attention, and the selection of music one of the best if not the superior of all similar collections. Principals of Educational Institutions, music teachers, and others interested in books of this class will find it advantageous to examine this volume.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

THE CHANSON AND VAUDEVILLE.

1050—1860.

According to Berquin, in the Petite Encyclopédie poétique, the Romance de Roland is the earliest piece of verse known in the French language. This song of war, which of yore animated the soldiers of Charlemagne when marching to combat, gave way very soon to the romance of love which flourished among the Provençal Troubadours. From Provence, the "gay science" spread into Languedoc, then into Picardy and shortly after even into Normandy. About 1050 the joyous science was known throughout France. As poets of the middle ages we have already cited the names, Abelard, Helinand, and Thibaut Count of Champagne. The courts of love became numerous in the 12th and 13th centuries, and the Roman de la Rose appeared.

Ou tout l'art d'amour est enclose.

This fine old poem began by Guillaume de Lorris, who died in 1262, was finished by Jean de Meung, surnamed Clopinel.

In 1324 the celebrated Clemence Isaure founded at Toulouse the Academy of the "Jeux floraux" which is still in existence.* Under Charles V. (of France) a new impulse was given to literature; the royal Library was founded—containing then only 900 volumes. Soon after, Alain Chartier, (born 1386, died 1458) gained the title Father of French eloquence. To him the old story refers, of a poet, who one day sleeping in a gallery of the Palace, was kissed by Margaret of Scotland, wife of the Dauphin (afterwards Louis XI). The maids of honor expressing their surprise at such honor being conferred upon the poet, Margaret replied, "I do not kiss the man but the lips, which flow with such sweet and beautiful thoughts."

Martin Franc, author of the Champion des Dames and Francois Villon, celebrated for his ballets and rondos, flourished in the time of Charles VIII. Georges Châtelain, educated at the court of the Dukes of Bourgogne, Guillaume Coquillard an official at Reims, René d'Anjou, Count of Provence, and Clement Marot a pupil of Villon, successively attracted the public attention. Jean le Maire born in 1473, Octavien and Melin de Saint-Gelais, came upon the scene a little before the birth of Francis I., which took place at Cognac, Sept. 12, 1494. Of this gallant and cultivated king's epoch the poetical works now most esteemed are those of Bonaventure Desperiers, Marguerite de Valois, Clement Marot and Ronsard. The latter, born in the Vendôme in 1525, received, as a present from the magistracy of Toulouse, a Minerva wrought in massive silver. A celebrated club in the time of Charles IX., called the Pléiade, consisted of Ronsard, Jodelle, du Bellay, Baif, Thyard, Belleau and Dorat. It was to Ronsard that the verses of Charles IX. were addressed:—

Tous deux je les également nous portons des couronnes,
Mais, roi, je les reçois; poète, tu les donnes.

At length Malherbe comes and then the poets of the great century: Corneille, Molière, La Fontaine, Racine, Boileau; in the 18th century, Voltaire, by his fecundity, wit and facility ruled the French literary world. The chanson [song, ditty] which had reached great perfection in the 17th century in the rhymes of Master Adam, a carpenter at Nevers, who died in 1662, came into new life in the last century in the merry numbers of Collé, Favart, Gallet, Lattaignant, Florian, Panard, Piron, Vadé and Marmontel. Moncrif and Berquin wrote delicious romances, and this form of poetry—so often wrecked on the rock of insipidity—has been continued to our own day by the labors of Romagnesi, Berat, Masini, Panse-ron, Loisa Puget, Paul Henrion, Etienne Arnaud, &c.

But the chanson got the better of the romance. By turns gallant, erotic, bacchical, satyric and moral, it gained new life at the dinners du caveau [of the wine cellar] founded in 1773 by Piron, Crebillon the younger and Collé. This Society which at first met at Gallet's, was increased by the addition of Crebillon the Elder, Sallé, Fuzelier, Saurin, Duclos, La Bruere, Bernard, Moncrif, Boucher, Helvetius and Rameau; it afterwards transferred its Penates to the rue de Buci, not far from the café Procope, near the carrefour.

This epicurian association lasted ten years. In 1762, it was revived by Piron, Crebillon the younger and Bernard, and met at the cabaret de Landelle. The most distinguished members during the second period of its existence were Panard, Laujon, Lemière, Favart, Colardeau, Vadé, Dorneval, Salieri, Goldoni, Fréron, Delille the writer of fables, Philidor, Albanèse and Vernet. Crebillon suppressed the penalty of a glass of water, to which authors of epigrams either unjust or silly had previously been sentenced. A rolling fire of joke and jest filled up the sitting, and all was wit, gaiety and humor. This club continued but five years. Then come the chanson writers of the transition period, Garnier, Laborde, Lattaignant, Boufflers and Parny.

Sept. 22, 1796 the first of the Vaudeville dinners took place. Of the twenty-two members of this jolly company the more distinguished were Laujon, Piis, Barré, Radet, the three Segurs, Armand Gouffé, Dupaty, Dieulafoi. The breakfasts of the "Garçons de bonne humeur"—jolly companions—were eaten by a club of ten persons, Etienne, Desaugiers, Sewrin, Perisus, etc.

Dec. 20, 1805, the dinners of the caveau moderne were established, which given on the 20th of each month at the Rocher de Cancale. Piis, Laujon, Cadet-Gassicourt, Gouffé, Desaugiers, Jouy, Ducrai-Duminil were the heroes of this monthly meeting. Beranger was admitted member in 1813, and the year following succeeded Gouffé as perpetual secretary. But the events of 1815 put an end to the Caveau moderne. A second series of meetings began in 1825 at Lemardelay's under the presidency of the witty Desaugiers.

In 1835, a new Caveau club was formed at the instance of Albert de Montémont. The Ancelots and Scribes have not desdained to join these witty and interesting meetings, where excellent wine fires the spirit and warms the feeling of friendship. But now, the goodhearted Desaugiers and the immortal Beranger have departed leaving their mantle to Gustave Nadaud, incontestably the most remarkable of our present writer of chansons. At the same time poet, musician, singer and accompanist, he by his fourfold talents is a worthy heir of his many and illustrious predecessors.

The chanson, that eminently national product of the French mind, was parent of the Vaudeville. The invention of this form, is generally attributed to Oliver Basselin, a fuller at Vire in Normandy, who lived about 1450. The Chansons of this author used to be sung at the foot of a hill called les Vaux, which rose from the shore of river Vire. The words Vaux de Vire became by corruption Vaudeville. The chansons of Basselin were revised in the next century by Jean le Houx.

The Vaudeville is essentially a satyric character; hence the saying, that Ancient France was a monarchy moderated by chansons. The court, the members of the Parliament and high personages were always exposed to the rhymes. They all declared war against the chansons and their authors. Then the comedies made upon the events of the day or upon scandalous anecdotes took the name of Vaudeville. At a later date the same term was applied to the couplets sung in turn by the actors at the close of a play.

But the Vaudeville, properly so called in our day, originated in the Italian comedy and at the fairs of St. Germain and St. Laurent. And so followed chronologically the theatres of the Vaudeville, the Variétés, the Gymnase, the Palais-Royal, &c.

In 1737, Panard brought out at the Fair of St. Germain a piece entitled Le Vaudeville. Momus opened the play with his daughter dressed in a costume representing the Fair. She tells her father that she is sad because she loves the Vaudeville, which is a kind of literature which the comic opera will not recognize. Momus consols his daughter and obtains the consent of Bacchus and Joy, father and mother of the Vaudeville. Upon which she, in her character of the Fair of St. Germain, puts on an advocates robe and pleads the cause of the Vaudeville before Apollo; she proves that it has been well received every where else, that it is droll, playful satyric, amusing, witty, in short that it will please as well in the city as in the village. Fully convinced,

* This academy offers a prize for the discussion of the question, "Why in our times does the high comedy disappear from the stage, and give place to hasty improvised dramas in which morality is no less outraged than Art?"

Apollo issues a decree by which the vaudeville is put in possession of all the rights of Parnassus.

Sedaine, who detested this kind of play, afterwards introduced into one of his comic operas, a song expressing his detestation of the Amours d'été and the Vendangeurs, vaudevilles by Piis and Barré, which were then attracting crowds to the Italian comedy. This song* led Piis and Barré to build the Vaudeville theatre. But we must go back. In the "Theatre Italien" of Gherardi (Paris, 1717), there are few songs; in the "Nouveau Theatre Italien" (Paris, 1773), there is a considerable number of very pretty vaudevilles.

About 1739 Favart devised the 'pastoral' or village vaudeville. Annette et Lubin had a fine success. The verses were not without affectation, but were written with elegance.

In 1780 Piis and Barré gave the vaudeville new and vigorous life. Down to that period prose and verse had been mingled, Piis made vaudevilles entirely in verse. His essays were well received and at the comedie Italienne were played successively Les Amours été, Les Vendangeurs, and La Veillée villageoise. But Sedaine, who was giving melodramas, was disgusted with the success of the vaudevilles, and his strenuous opposition led by degrees to the disappearance of the vaudeville from the posters of the comedie Italienne. The first work of this form by Panard, Piron, Favart, Vadé, Lesage, d'Orneval, Fuselier, Anseaume, &c., were played at the fair of St. Laurent. The comic opera having been joined with the Italian theatre, the vaudeville was subordinated there to Italian pieces, to pieces with ariettes, to comedies and dramas, and was thus at length driven from that stage. The verses of Sedaine, spoken of above, led to the establishment of the theatre in the rue de Chartres. Piis having sought and been refused a moderate salary at the Italian comedy conceived the idea in 1790 of removing to another theatre. There was at the time in the rue de Chartres a ball-room called the Winter Vaudeville. Here the architect Lenoir built the Theatre Vaudeville, which was opened Jan. 12, 1792 with a piece by Piis in 3 acts entitled Les Deux Pantheons. Barré, Monnier and Chambon became associated with Piis and Rosières in carrying on the undertaking. Radet, Desfontaines, the two Segurs and others, soon began to write for it. During the revolutionary period Radet and Desfontaines were imprisoned six months for a bold sentence in their Chaste Susanne; they had put into the mouth of the judge the following words addressed to the two elders; "you are accusers, and cannot therefore be judges." The entire audience saw in this an allusion to the case of Maria Antoinette, whose trial was then in preparation. The two authors finally gained their liberty by some verses of a different tenor. It was long the custom at the vaudeville upon occasions of a new piece to sing a sort of a prologue, which was often written to celebrate this or that remarkable circumstance, and the two imprisoned poets took such an occasion to gain their freedom.

Fanchon la vieilleuse, a piece by Bouilly and

* Bonhomme Vaudeville
Laissez-nous donc tranquilles,
Amusez-nous par vos propos
Et par vos jolis madrigaux;
Mais ne quittez pas vos hameaux
Bonhomme Vaudeville.

Joseph Pain had a prodigious success. Madame Belmont created the beautiful part of Fanchon by her talented performance. Dieulafoi, Desaugiers, Moreau, Francis, Rougemont, Dumersan, Theaulon, Dartois, Dupaty, Merle, de Jouy, Dupin, &c., brought out at this theatre parodies and satyric pieces of exceeding piquancy. Virginie Dejaset and Jenny Vertpré distinguished themselves among the first comic actresses of their time.

In 1816 Desaugiers became director of the Vaudeville. Then Scribe came upon the scene, and with him a new generation of authors; Melesville. Delestre-Poirson, Mazeres, Carmouche, de Courcy, Saintine, Bayard, Dupeuty, de Vilneuve, Vanderburch, Delurieu, Sauvage and others. In 1819 Delestre-Poirson obtained the Gymnase and drew Scribe thither, who wrote at that time his charming Repertoire du Theatre de Madame. De Guerchy and Bernard-Leon succeeded Desaugiers, and they were followed by Etienne Arago in 1829. Then followed the dramatic successes of M. and Madame Ancelot, and in 1838 the Vaudeville Theatre in the rue de Chartres was destroyed by fire. At present the Vaudeville is established in the theatre on the place de la Bourse formerly occupied by comic opera.

A Cure Effected by Music.

The imagination has often played an important part in medical cures, and our most celebrated physicians do not hesitate to make use of some ingenious ruse to help and cure invalids. It would be easy to multiply the examples of happy effects obtained with pills of micapanis, acqua saccharifera and the use of twenty other substances, insignificant in themselves and without any virtue in pharmacy. The greater part of the so-called miracles effected by homoeopathy and the infinitesimal doses employed by it, have no other cause than the effect produced on the minds of invalids by the attraction of the marvelous and by strong faith.

Be that as it may, Dr. Gorré Gassicourt corresponding member of the Academy of Medicine, has communicated to that learned body, a curious and somewhat dramatic case in which the art of Thalberg and Batta has replaced the purging and bleeding so much laughed at by Moliere, who we know consulted his physician, following none of his directions and yet became perfectly well. It is not enough known that Moliere was as hypochondriac as he was jealous and in railing so much at the "malade imaginaire" and "les Maris ridicules" he reproduced and mocked his own weakness.

Let us return to Dr. Gassicourt, whose little work is entitled, "Some Generalities on the Subject of Medicine of the Mind."

After having developed some very ingenious and true ideas on moral effects as a means of cure, Mr. Gassicourt recounts the following:—

"In June 1837, I was called into an English family of which I was the medical adviser, to see a young lady of sixteen or seventeen, who had been recently brought from England, and whose health caused her family the most serious fears. Having tried every expedient, the doctors advised her removal to the continent, hoping for some benefit from the change of air. I found my young patient in bed; she had not quitted it for two months. Her complexion was as white as ivory, blue eyes deeply sunken and without any life, hollow cheeks, lips without color, voice completely gone, everything betokened profound decay. To my questions she only replied by monosyllables, and when I wished to feel her pulse, she could hardly raise her arm to allow me so to do. A constant fever sapped her drop by drop and a few spoonfuls of broth was all that for several weeks her stomach consented to admit.

The peculiar character of her physiognomy, indicated to me some moral malady, some heart trouble. I was not mistaken. A brother, tenderly beloved by the young girl, had three months before, lost his life while sea-bathing; she received the distressing news without a sigh or even shedding a tear. Since that terrible day, she had fallen into this mournful, deaf and dumb state, that Montaigne speaks of, when overwhelmed by accidents beyond our power of bearing up under.

What had been done thus far for her? Medicine of course had not the slightest success, the most affectionate care, the language of heart, even the recitation made by my advice, of the unhappy event that had so terribly stricken that young soul, affected her not at all, and it seemed impossible to renew the delicate thread so nigh breaking, of that existence but lately so rich in the future and so full of hope. To escape from that concentration of the grief that was slowly but surely undermining the springs of life, required some shock, a movement of expansion, something to break up the centralisation of thought; anything that loosens grief and will cause tears to flow, following the expression so true of Montaigne, gives release to the soul, separates it more at large and puts it at ease.

I wished to cure my young patient. The wish, in the practice of medicine often gives the power. The idea came into my mind to inquire if she was anything of a musician, they told she loved music passionately. For that reason, replied I, she must love the best music. Mozart and Beethoven completely possess her! Good, cried I, Beethoven and Mozart will save her! They thought I was dreaming, but allowed me full play. That same evening, at the desire of the patient, a piano was installed in the adjoining room, and the next day during my visit, while seated at her bed side, the marcia funebre by Beethoven, played with a sentiment worthy of the work, revealed itself all at once to our ears.

While charmed myself by that admirable piece, written by the master under heavenly inspiration, I followed and studied with an anxiety easy to comprehend, on the visage of my fair patient, the expression of the sensations that were working within her. Inert at first, I soon saw attention depicted on her physiognomy; then, like a flower exposed to the rays of the sun brightening on its stem, her head, lowered the instant before, was now raised. She listened! Suddenly her eyes sparkled with an unusual light, her cheeks were white and red by turns, her respiration became freer and more frequent tears in abundance (the first shed since the deplorable catastrophe) fell mingled with sobs; at last, convulsively agitated a cry escaped, "Let her come!" and immediately her arms opened to give a sisterly embrace to the dear friend who had just caused her to taste the unexpected benefits of those delicious emotions. From that day, her life was saved, Mozart and Beethoven aiding, for music, you may well believe was not abandoned. I could follow with pleasure the gradual coming back of strength and vigor to her frame. Some weeks after, my young patient, her mind serene, happy to return again to that life which is so charming at sixteen, beautified with all the graces of her age, left France and returned to the mother country, leaving in my memory an impression the most profound, yet the sweetest perhaps, that a physician can enjoy in the exercises of his profession.

Behold the power of music; behold another example of the marvels performed by the medicine of the heart. S. HENRI BERTHOUD.

Rossini at Home.

When in Paris for a few days last week, I was fortunate enough to receive an invitation from Rossini to attend his Saturday evening reception, a musical levée, at which all artists and professors of distinction assemble weekly to pay their respects to the illustrious musician.

Rossini lives on the Boulevard des Italiens, at the corner of the Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin, in a magnificent suite of appartements, au seconde. It is here he holds his court surrounded by a galaxy of brilliant women, whose wit and conversation are more sparkling than the diamonds of any duchess in St. Germain, and a host of chevaliers, from whose button holes dangle the gaudy decorations of every potentate in Europe. The hour of reception is nine o'clock, the amusement of the evening, music; no tea or coffee, no ices are allowed; the entertainment is purely intellectual, practically musical. And the tea and coffee are not missed; the music and bon mots of the amiable host offered far more enjoyment than the most refreshing ices.

The principal salons are thrown open to the guests. As I entered the first room, and tried to make my way through the crowd which blocked up the entrance to the music hall, peering over the shoulders of the visitors, I saw Rossini seated at the pianoforte, accompanying the Sisters Marchisio in a duet he has composed for his two protégées. In a brown shooting jacket of the loosest fit imaginable, the sleeves almost covering the tips of the fingers, a very bad wig, nearly of the same color as the coat, the figure at the pianoforte might, at first sight, have been taken for that of an old country gentleman retired from public life, and fattening to any extent upon the rich produce of his goodly acres. But wait awhile. The duet has but just begun. Let the accompanist warm up. His indolence leaves him, he sits erect, and becomes excited. See how the loose sleeves flap about, look at the drops of perspiration on his forehead, observe the fire and brilliancy of his eye as he turns round to each of the singers, urging them to a greater effort, in some crescendo passages or cadenza.

Yes, there's genius in that figure at the pianoforte, now no longer resembling an old country gentleman, but easily to be identified as that of Rossini. The duet finished amid the most enthusiastic applause of the assembled guests, applause perhaps heartier and louder than is usual at an evening party. Bravo maestro! Bravo da vero! Everybody crowded round the host as he left the pianoforte to go to his own particular chair in the adjoining room. There was a pause in the music. The courtiers busied themselves with congratulating the two sisters, and through them saying a word of flattery to the composer, who every now and then convulsed the room with laughter by some witty remark, which would be carefully noted in the pocket-book of a soi-distant wit, to be the next day retailed as his own.

After a short interval, Badioli and Solieri sang the duet from "Il Barbiere," then Badioli volunteered the bass song in the "Stabat," after which a very clever amateur, whose name is, I think, Sampieri, joined Solieri in the Elisire duet, and nearly eclipsed the tenor by his remarkable skill in managing a very fine voice and effective declamation.

Seated next Rossini was an elderly lady, slim in figure, and somewhat wrinkled in feature. She wore what I believe called a robe montante, and evidently was averse to crinoline. She was familiarly addressed by some as Marietta. "Who is that vivacious matron to whom everybody pays so much attention?" "That," said my friend, "is Madame Taglioni." "Not the Taglioni, the celebrated sylphide?" "Yes the same." I looked again, and fancied I could just trace a resemblance in the elderly lady in the black silk dress to that portrait of a danseuse, standing in an impossible position on one leg, which hangs in Mitchell's shop in Bond Street, covered with the dust of ages. It was a difficult task, the portrait having on a robe montante the very reverse of that which the lady wore who was before me.

Another celebrity of a time gone by was also present—Carafa, the composer of La Prigione d'Edimburgo, Le Valet de Chambre, and a hundred other operas now forgotten, the delight of a former generation.

The old gentleman is far from being in the same excellent condition as his comrade Rossini, but he nevertheless appears to enjoy life, and to carry his age remarkably lightly. Rossini having listened attentively to the songs and duets mentioned, sent his cara sposa, one of the most active housewives I ever met with, to request the Marchisios to sing again. They complied, and he led them to the pianoforte, introducing them to different visitors as they went along in the most eulogistic terms. This time he did not accompany, but stood by and encouraged the young artists with many a "bravo" and smile of approbation. Eleven o'clock was drawing near, and at that hour the "Reception" always terminates.

The last performance of the evening was by M. Nadaud, who sang some wonderfully lengthy French songs with a sweet voice and great expression.

Then every one prepared to go. Rossini had a kind good-night for all. In passing through the ante-room he showed me Dantan's two caricature statues of himself and Meyerbeer, in which he is represented sitting in a dish of macaroni, hugging a lyre and Meyerbeer as writing for dear life half a dozen operas at once, Rossini seemed to enjoy the joke, and to chuckle at his own idleness compared to the constant activity of Meyerbeer.

Mr. W. H. Fry.—In the N. Y. Albion we find the following kindly notice of Mr. W. H. Fry, the newly appointed Secretary of Legation at Turin.

We refer to Mr. W. H. Fry, the composer of innumerable works that have received encomium in these columns, notably of the opera of "Leonora," which was played not long since at the Academy of Music; of a very fine "Stabat Mater," which has not yet received any attention from music-givers; and of several symphonies played by Julien's Band here and in Europe, with invariable success. Mr. Fry, in addition to being a musician, was also a critic. We are humble enough to believe that he has never received his proper reward for what he has done in the cause of Art. But he was also a politician, and genius, even when perverted, is still a power in the land. For making sundry speeches, he has been chosen by his country as a representative of its dignity abroad. The only satisfaction the writer of these lines enjoys is that he is sent to a musical land. Mr. Fry's official residence will be in Turin—the capital of United Italy. The country loses a composer and critic of the first class, and gains a diplomat. Shall we be pardoned if we add that in our judgment the country gets decidedly the worst of the bargain! Do you not see that, whilst there are hordes of diplomats, there are but few masters of the "divine art," and—it is vanity to add—no flux and overflow of gentlemen who, by natural aptitude, education, and susceptibility, are capable of wielding a truthful and fearless pen in the cause of Art.

Critics are so often and so much occupied with mild complainings ament the grievances of others, that they seldom find time to think of their own;—never to speak of them. But behind the trenchant pen often fags a wearied mind. That æsthetic nonentity, created by the mandates of taste, who plods from day to day steadily through a world of mediocrities to the goal where comparative criticism is no longer human, has a heart for which no one gives him credit, filled with tender yearnings, asking for sympathy but winning contempt, insisting on justice but brewing hatred. Among the thousands who criticise criticism, how few are there who think of the critic. What indeed, asks the artist, is a critic but a miserable maggot of the brain who crawls through ideas to spoil them; who takes a fancy and batters it with a fact; who seizes an illusion and flattens it out with a reality. To each of that army of musicians, actors, and painters, who has not been praised more than ninety-nine times out of a hundred, the critic is worse than a superfluity. It is only to the art public that he is a necessity; a portion of the daily meal, a fragment of the early breakfast. He comes punctually like the milk in the morning, and perhaps is not much more invigorating. But, Messieurs the public, that punctuality is the test of his faithfulness, and is purchased with health, even life itself. To secure it, he toils long into the night until his eyes grow dim and the buzz of the yellow flickering gas sounds like the drone of the Fates in his ear. His reward is either absolute oblivion, or the public contumely of those it has been his misfortune to assail. He is never out of his coat of type; never without an enemy to point out how ridiculous it is. Could we strip it off, we should find beneath a kindly human creature with every generous impulse to lead a helping hand to the weak and struggling—and doing it more often than people believe, too; we should find sometimes a sentinel who has grown faint with long watching, we should find in short a gentleman like Mr. Fry, broken in health but strong in purpose, hopeful of the future, but weary, very weary of the present.

To a brother journalist and critic, who has fought nobly in the cause, and retires from the field disabled but covered with honors; to a gentleman of wide attainments and wide susceptibilities, and to a composer of distinguished merit, the critic of this paper pays his homage, and expresses the hope that warmth of an Italian sky may quickly restore him to health. Italy is the mother of Art. It is well that the children of art should go there for comfort and strength in their hour of trial.

Church Music in New York.

The Madison Avenue Baptist Church, built for the society of Rev. Dr. Hague, was completed and dedicated in January last. It is a very handsome brick edifice, and contains a new and superior toned organ of 36 stops, built by Henry Erben, at a cost of $5000, the peculiar qualities of which were exhibited on Monday evening last, by Mr. Morgan of Grace Church, to a large and select audience. The regular organist of the church, Mr. John H. Thompson, is an amateur player, and pupil of Wm. A. King; he has been in Europe, studying music, for the past three years, and is yet quite a young man, but bids fair to become, in time, one of our first organists. The choir is made up as follows: soprano, Miss Trull; contralto, Miss Barclay; tenor, Mr. Miranda; bass, Mr. J. Conkey—the whole forming one of the best quartettes in the city. The style of the music is left to the option of the organist, who shows excellent taste in his selections.

In many respects, the choir at the Church of the Messiah (Unitarian), Rev. Dr. Samuel Osgood's, on Broadway, opposite Fourth street, is second to none other in the city, and the music of this church is justly celebrated. Mr. Henry C. Timm, the President of the New York Philharmonic Society, officiated as organist here for fifteen years, and has been succeeded by Mr. Edward Howe, Jr., the present incumbent, who has filled this position during the past five years. Mr. Howe is a gentleman of liberal education, has been a professor of music in New York for eighteen years, and has brought to bear in this department an amount of scientific and theoretic as well as practical knowledge, which has greatly enhanced the value of this portion of the church service. The choir is composed of the following talented vocalists: Miss Grenelle, soprano; Miss Rushby, contralto; Mr. Mills, tenor; Mr. Jewett, basso. They use the "Greatorex Collection of Music," the "Church and Home," recently put forth by George Leach, who was for many years connected with this choir, and other books of that class. The music is given in a finished and classical manner, and Mr. Howe's accompaniments are particularly appropriate and adapted.

The organ is an old one, built by the Messrs. Hook, of Boston, but was remodelled, and had important additions made to it, some ten years since, by Crabb, of Flatbush, L. I. It is enclosed in a fine mahogany case, has two ranks of keys, extending from G to F, 26 stops, and a full complement of pedals. The swell is unusually full and fine. When the instrument is used, a jet of gas is kept burning inside of the swell box, the object of which is to keep the swell organ in tune with the great; it is under the control of the organist, and, by the use of this simple arrangement, the pitch can be changed one half tone when it is affected by changes in the temperature. It is the only arrangement of the kind in the country, with the exception of a similar one in the immense organ at Dr. Beman's church, Troy. Both were made by Thomas Robjohn, who has charge of this organ.

The Unitarian Church at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twentieth Street, which has been named "All Souls," and is used by the society of Rev. H. W. Bellows, D.D., presents a very unique appearance externally, as well from the style of its architecture, as from the peculiar arrangement of the building materials in alternate layers of French Caen stone and Philadelphia pressed brick. Internally, it is one of the most elegant and comfortable churches we have. The experiment for increasing the power of the speaker's voice, by placing a paraboloid back of the pulpit, which was so successfully made in Trinity Church under the supervision of Prof. C. W. Hackley, has been repeated here. It is about eight feet in height, in the form of a shell, with a concave surface, painted with a dark ground, upon which is a cross in gilt, surrounded with a "halo" or "glory," and each Sabbath the light of two gas burners is cast upon it. This is, to some extent, carrying out the favorite theory of the pastor, Dr. Bellows, who advocated symbolism connected with worship, in his renowned sermon "The Suspense of Faith." Some radical changes are on the point of being made in the musical department of this church, and, in view of these contemplated changes, we shall not furnish the detail concerning it, with the minuteness which we have observed in speaking of other churches. The organ is a fine one of 34 stops, built by Ferris of this city, and, in architecture, corresponds with the style of the church, the Byzantine. It is played by Mr. Ruopfeldt, who succeeded Mr. Wm. Scharfenberg. Both are German by birth, and artists of some repute.

The music at the new Unitarian Chapel (Rev. Samuel Longfellow's) on Clinton Street, Brooklyn, deserves more than a passing notice. The well-known vocalist, Miss Mary E. Hawley, sustains the contralto part in the quartet choir, and much attention is bestowed upon the musical portion of the services. Every alternate Sabbath evening, a vesper service is held, which is almost entirely musical, and highly attractive. The organ, built by Stuart of New York, is small, but adapted to the size of the building, and is very efficiently played by Mr. Colby. The pastor (a brother of Henry W. Longfellow, the poet) is at present in Europe.

At Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's church in Brooklyn, the singing is congregational, led by a large choir under the direction of Mr. J. Zundel, a composer of considerable note, who was formerly organist of St. Ann's Church, St. Petersburg, and latterly of St. Georges, New York. The organ is small, and not such an one as this rich and influential society should possess. One may hear at Mr. Beecher's Church, the finest congregational singing we have in this country. The "Plymouth Collection" is used by choir and congregation; this contains the music as well as the words, and generally it is a well arranged collection. The house is always filled, the congregation a united one—the result of the attachment entertained toward the pastor by his people—and the effect of their 3000 voices heartily united in singing is sometimes thrilling.

In concluding our observations upon this subject, we would remark that with many minds, an erroneous impression exists that the music of some of the churches described in these letters, partakes of an operative character. The most effectual method of rectifying this error would be for those who experience it to visit some of our churches and note the impressions made upon the mind by the music ordinarily selected.

The manifest improvement in sacred music of late years is due, in part, to the great advance made in the nature of the books published. The books of old and worn out tunes hitherto considered standard, are fast being supplanted by the more modern "Grace Church Collection" of Wm. A. King, "Greatest Collection," by the former organist and director of music at Calvary Church, the "Mozart Collection," and others. Among a large class of our people, there exists a demand for music of a more classical character than was called for a generation since. The time has passed away when selections from the "Billings and Holden" collection would be acceptable to worshippers, and there is no doubt that the generation of Psalm-tune books which followed this collection, will eventually furnish material for another series of "old folks concerts."

The demand of the age is for something elevating and inspiring, which, at the same time, can meet the call of the intellect. Those who attend church service seek, as well from the music as from the preaching, to experience an elevating and holy influence; and while some can experience this from listening to the tunes with the harmony as ordinarily arranged, others require new and varying combinations. By these the genius of such as Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn is better appreciated than the combinations of our modern psalmody composers. In the Grace Church collection of music some of the masterpieces of the great composers are embodied, and it is without exception the finest work of the kind ever published. The organ accompaniments are arranged separately, and are of themselves a study; in their complete harmonization, many of the resources of musical art have been employed, and they can be used with only a soprano or tenor voice to sustain the melody as well as in full chorus. This work, printed from engraved plates in the highest style of art, was originally published by Stanford & Delissier of this city, but the plates have been purchased by Oliver Ditson & Co., of Boston, who now publish it in the original form.

The Greatest Collection (also published by Ditson & Co.) is a very superior work, containing much good music selected from the standard composers, it is more popular than the Grace Church Collection as the price at which it is published brings it more within the reach of the masses, and it has deservedly attained a wide circulation. These works, although written for use in the Protestant Episcopal Church, more particularly, are equally well adapted to churches of other denominations, and we hope to see them generally adopted, their tendency being to develop a pure and correct taste in this direction.

Music is the highest language of the soul. It is the highest inspiration next to the prophetic, and the time has come when this department of worship has begun to receive its proper attention in our Protestant Churches. We trust that as the age advances in art, science and intellect, more and more thought and attention will be given to develop this inspiring art, and that genius will be well supported and sustained which shall devote itself to the production and performance of this, the truest prayer and praise.—Transcript.

CHICKERING'S PIANOS.—Sitting in the New York Academy of Music at the late Philharmonic concert, we were particularly charmed with the piano performance. Mr. Hoffman is well nigh an inimitable player, but certain it is that the best of players cannot make good music except from a good instrument. From Chickering's piano, which was played on the occasion, every run, scale, phrase, or isolated note reached our ears in its perfect integrity. Not a sound was lost, from the great sweeping chords and ponderous octaves to the most delicate chromatic scale, or pianissimo trill. This is not the case with all pianos. Those from many other factories, although possessing many points, are yet unequal in tone, and the bass not unfrequently entirely drowns the treble. The listener misses the clear, bell-like silvery sweetness of a genuine Chickering, which makes this piano so great a favorite in the parlor, and which was so highly appreciated by Thalberg and Gottschalk. They are the pianos fit for a musical poet. The great reputation which the Chickering's have earned during the past forty years is well-deserved.—Independent.

CHINESE MUSIC.—There is a story afloat that a Chinese maestro, Lusing is about to visit Europe on a musical mission, to combat the errors of modern music, and spread throughout the barbarian world the true principles of Chinese music. He will bring with him a Chinese orchestra to produce the compositions of Fo-hi a contemporary of Noah, and those of Pochery To Tis, the Rossini of China, who died only about two hundred years ago. This story L'Eco d'Italia gives without comment. It needs none, and will be gladly welcomed by those musicians who can see nothing good in modern music, and chiefly value compositions on account of their age. As they now profess to despise Donizetti, Meyerbeer and Verdi, and gloat on Gluck and Bach, we expect they will soon despise these worthy Teutons, and fasten their affections on Fo-hi, the contemporary of Noah.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

It is said that Meyerbeer's opera, L'Africaine, will follow next in succession—that is to say, unless Les Troyens, by Hector Berlioz, should find its way to the foot-lamps of the Academy instead—an event which is spoken of, and would beyond gainsay be an act of justice. There have been so many slips between the cup of publicity and the black lips of Meyerbeer's heroine, that she would scarcely be affected by the consequent delay. On the 23d of this month it is announced that there will be an extraordinary performance at the Imperial Opera House. Two hundred exponents will perform a selection from the symphonic works of Felicien David, under the conductorship of the composer himself. The Desert, the fourth part of Christophe Colomb, the overture to La Perle du Brésil, and the finale of Moïse au Sinai, will be included in the programme.

The manager of the Italian Opera has just engaged Mlle. Trebelli for five years. The terms are said to be 200l. a month the first year, 280l. the second, and 320l., 360l., and 400l. for the third, fourth, and fifth years. These are not bad terms even for an Italian cantatrice, and the lady, who will make her début in Tancredi, is said to be indebted for so advantageous an engagement to the two brilliant seasons which she has recently carried through at Berlin and Madrid. The Nozze di Figaro is in preparation. Mad. Penco, whose engagement has just been renewed, will play Susanna, Mad. Battu the Countess, and Mlle. Dalmoniti, whose débuts will continue, the Page. Meanwhile, the Italian pianist, of whom I gave you some notion not long since, is astonishing the audiences at the Salle Ventadour each night of performance with his executive feats. He has himself accompanied by an orchestra, which would seem quite a superfluous measure in his case, for the ubiquitous power of his fingers on the keyboard supplies the place of another pair of hands. One thing is to be said in favor of this hard-hitting gymnast, this "harmonious blacksmith," he conceals the physical effort his feats cost him with a placidity of exterior truly Spartan in its heroism.

Apropos of Mad. Penco's reengagement, and the terms received by Italian artists, it is said that M. Calzadò had to submit to an increase in that lady's demands, and has signed an agreement to pay that 252,000 fr. (10,080l.) for three seasons of seven months, a private box on the stage, and a multitude of other privileges great and small. Signor Gardoni is to be succeeded by a tenor legger, Montanaro by name whose voice is said to be very fresh and very flexible. Signor Angelini, wishing to go to Russia with Signor Graziani, has been allowed to give up his engagement, the management making no demand for compensation, which may be flattering or otherwise as a man may regard it. Mad. Tagliafico, in her normal capacity of comprimaria, will form part of the company. I told you how Signor Beneventano was to supply the place of Signor Graziani, making up in stones' weight of too solid flesh the deficiencies of the spirit. Not even his title of Baron della Piana can, however, exactly be taken in compensation for the defect in his title to rank as first barytone in a first-ratio establishment.

The first concert of the season was given last Wednesday at the Tuileries. Their Imperial Majesties do not seem to fare much more delicately in their musical entertainments than do our own Sovereign and consort at their palace of Buckingham. For curiosity's sake, I will transcribe the programme:—1, Trio, Pré au Clercs; 2, Duo, Chante Suzanne; 3, Les Noces Basques, pastoral scene for the harmonicon of Debain, by M. Lefebvre Wely; 4, Air, Songes d'une Nuit d'Été; 5, Chorus and air, La Circassienne; 6, Quatuor, by Alary; 7, Duo, Les Voitures Verrees; 8, Cantique, Le Domino Noir; 9, Variations, les Diamants de la Couronne; 10, Scena, La Circassienne. M. Alary presided at the piano, and the orchestra was conducted by M. Tilmant. A chef de cuisine who should place relatively so vulgarly inspired a carte before his Imperial master and mistress as their programme, would receive the Imperial sack, and most deservedly, nay, would merit exile to an English club-house. The chef de musique of the Imperial household is, on the contrary, "personally felicitated." His Majesty's subjects are either more faithfully served by their music purveyors, or have a better taste which they impose on the programme-maker. For instance, M. Le Président du Sénat, alias M. Troplong, had a concert the other day, a portion whereof were the principal scenes from the Armide and Orphée of Gluck, "interpreted" (vile word) by Mad. Viardot. Mad. Jardier de Maleville, moreover, played Mozart and Haydn to the guests of the same dignitary of State. To go on with private musical entertainments—musique de société—let me mention, first, that Rossini's "Saturday evenings" are brought to a close—dying most Pesarò swanlike and melodiously. On one occasion M. Duprez organised a concert, the personnel of which was entirely composed of his pupils, his own daughter, and M. Vandenhuevel, her husband inclusive, and never were the maestro's salons so crowded. To this succeeded a quieter Saturday, when only four artists exhibited their talents, the basso, Signor Badiali, the new tenor, Signor Montanaro, Signor Perelli, and Signor Bazzini, instrumental, executants, to whom must be added, supplementarily, the Vicomtesse de Grandval.—Musical World.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The programme on Monday night was in all respects irreproachable, and in one instance (we allude to the last piece) unusually interesting. We submit it in extenso:—

PART I.

Sinfonia in C..... Mozart
Arie, "Sombra forest" (Guillaume Tell)..... Rossini
Septuor in D minor..... Hummel
Duet, "Come, be gay" (Freischütz)..... Weber Overture, "Alchymist"..... Spohr

PART II.

Sinfonia in A, No. 7..... Beethoven
Arie, "Idole de ma vie" (Robert le Diable)..... Meyerbeer
Overture in C major (MS.)..... Mendelssohn
Conductor, Professor Stanislas Bennett Mus. D.

Still more worthy of being dwelt upon was the very admirable performance of Mendelssohn's overture, which is so rarely heard that it came upon the ear with all the freshness of novelty, and on that account, if on no other, was the most striking feature in the programme. The history of this composition, which only exists in manuscript, may not be generally known. In 1833, on the occasion of his second visit to England, Mendelssohn was deputed by the Philharmonic directors to write some pieces for their concerts. The result of this commission, which reflected the highest credit alike on the judgment and spirit of the society, was the overture in question (which, in consequence of the prominence of a particular instrument in the score, Mendelssohn used to call the "Trumpet-Overture"); the scena "Infelice," for soprano, since abridged, otherwise modified, and published; and the Second Symphony (in A major), now enjoying such universal celebrity under the title of the Italian symphony—a title invented after Mendelssohn's death, probably by some one who knew more about the composer's intentions than the composer himself. The "Trumpet-Overture," although n some passages reminding us more of Mozart than any other production of Mendelssohn's pen, is a masterpiece in the fullest acceptance of the word, and so delighted every hearer as to warrant its repetition at an early period, when, we beg leave to suggest, it might appropriately be assigned the place of honor in the programme. This, by the way, is one of the many pieces so inconsistently and so obstinately withheld from publication by Mendelssohn's executors. Happily, the Philharmonic Society, having the score and the orchestral parts in their possession, cannot be prevented from introducing it now and then at their concerts. If the rest of Mendelssohn's unpublished compositions are no weaker, there is no conceivable plea for suppressing them. It is to be hoped that before long some reasonable explanation of the line of conduct it has been necessary to pursue with reference to these interesting manuscripts than has been hitherto vouchsafed may be afforded by those from whom the musical world has an unquestionable right to demand it. At all events, the MS. overture on Monday night was a wonderful success.

THE OPERAS.—Her Majesty's Theatre.—Mr. Wallace's Amber Witch has now been performed four times, and, as we anticipated, with each repetition, has made strong headway with the public. Deficient in the bright and sparkling, and, consequently taking music of Mariana and Lurline, it no doubt disappointed many the first night who expected the Balfian and Wallachian tune to prevail everywhere. But Mr. Wallace was determined this time to dig a little beneath the surface, and strive to bring up a great treasure to the light. That he has done so, we believe. The Amber Witch is all to nothing his best work—best, not merely because it is more masterly and ambitious, but also because it is more melodious—not perhaps “tun,” but “tuneful;” as the public are beginning to find out already. In fact, the popular composer of Mariana has raised himself higher than ever in the estimation of thinking men by his last opera, and has converted many a sceptic into an admirer. As we shall have next week to give a detail analysis of the music in our review department, we shall not enlarge upon the merits of the opera in this place, but content ourselves with a brief explanation of the book, and a few words about the performance.

The plot of the Amber Witch is taken from Dr. Weinhold's well-known novel of that name, which created so profound a sensation in Germany many years ago. The story is divided by Mr. Chorley into four acts. The first reveals Mary, the Amber Witch dispensing food and clothing to the inhabitants of Coserow and its vicinity, who are reduced to famine by the consequences of prolonged and disastrous war (the “Thirty Years' War”). She has inspired both an illicit and an honorable love. The Commandant of the district (of Uesedom) endeavors to enslave her affections through the intervention of his own servant and Mary's jealous rival Elsie; while Count Rudiger, who has saved the life of her father, a village pastor, woos her in disguise of a peasant, and enlists her sympathy at once. The king being about to visit Coserow in state, Mary is chosen to present him with the congratulations of his loyal subjects; and in the act of discharging this responsibility, is made aware that her supposed peasant lover is Count Rudiger, a favored courtier of the monarch. Nevertheless, the young nobleman finds opportunity to abate her scruples, and amid the bustle of the ceremony, persuades her to grant him an interview at night. In the second act this interview takes place, the scene being the Streckelberg, a hill supposed to be haunted by witches. Here Mary had discovered the source of that secret wealth by means of which she is enabled to relieve her famished compatriots. An exceptional hill, the Streckelberg, contains a vein of amber, the existence of which is only known to our heroine, and which she gathers and sells at market through the immortality of her father. The meeting of the lovers leads to much the same as that of Romeo and Juliet in Capulet's garden. They plight eternal troth, but, meanwhile, have been overheard by Elsie and her confederates, who, aided and abetted by the jealous commandant, are devising means of having Mary publicly accused of witchcraft. Their machinations are successful, and in the third act we find the unfortunate Amber Witch awaiting her trial in prison. Her only plea is unavailable, a storm having completely swept away the vein of amber. The proffered intercession of the Commandant being indignantly declined, on account of the unworthy conditions that accompany it, Mary is arraigned before the judges, until, moved in an equal degree by the affliction of her father and the threat of torture, she confesses her guilt, and is condemned to the stake. In the interval, Count Rudiger has been incarcerated by his own father, who, informed of his ignoble attachment through the agency of the commandant, is resolved to prevent its consummation at any cost. The young lover is thus deterred from taking steps on behalf of his mistress; and it is not until the fourth act—when a serviceable coup de théâtre makes the obdurate “heavy-parent” die of the effects of a fall from his horse, and installs Count Rudiger in his place, as “Master of Revenstein,” that the latter is enabled to “rush to the rescue.” He arrives with a competent band of armed retainers at the nick of time. Mary is not to be burnt on the Streckelberg, the scene of her presumed transactions with the evil one, and she having repulsed the proffered aid of the commandant, she is at that instant awaiting her doom. Another opportune arrival, that of the king, is further instrumental in averting the catastrophe. The result will be anticipated. Mary is saved, the Commandant degraded and banished; Elsie dies, as some interpret it, of chagrin and disappointment, while others, judging by the words which Mr. Chorley has put in the mouth of the Commandant—of poison; and the faithful lovers are made happy.

SYMPHONIES FOR THE PEOPLE.—LIEBIG.

Berlin, Feb. 23, 1861.

The last letters have described musical opportunities of the selecter sort;—the Sinfonie Concerts of the Royal Orchestra, not accessible to the many: the Sixteen-part Mass of Grell, not enjoyable to the many, even were it perfect of its kind. Let us now glance for a moment at the popular side of musical opportunity and culture here in Berlin. Instead, therefore, of proceeding at once to chronicle those experiences which have been worth most, personally, to the writer, and which have been, as it were, new revelations to him of the infinite significance of Music as unfolded in its great forms by great masters; instead of recalling the concerts of the Bach-Verein, the operas of Gluck, the “Fidelio” of Beethoven, the “Paradise and the Peri” of Schumann, the stringed Quartet concerts, &c., &c., let us come back to our indefatigable friend, the people's friend, LIEBIG.

Truly he is a great public musical benefactor, this same Liebig—this grey-haired and fatherly, but yet fresh and rosy-faced, clean, wholesome looking, tranquil, smiling, kindly, energetic, self-possessed, enthusiastic gentleman, who for many years now, four times every week and more, the whole year round, has stood at the head of his well-trained orchestra, now numbering fifty instruments, discoursing to the people,—to men, women and children, assembled in a social, free and easy way, sipping their after-dinner coffee, plying their knitting-needles, or crocheting—discussing all the finest Symphonies and Overtures of Beethoven and all the masters;—playing no trash (at least no longer than until it shall have been ascertained to be trash), but only the noble and immortal tone-poems, the true works of genius. For the people, I say; for the price of admission to such luxury, such refining education of the taste, such opening of genial springs of inspiration amid the dull and slavish routine of most lives, is a mere song—three silver groschen, or say seven and a half cents. (Five groschen for a single admission). He takes the people as he finds them; does not ask the mountain to come to Mahomet, but brings Mozart and Beethoven to them, into their social haunts, as they take their coffee (and their cigar), “their custom of an afternoon.” The little that they pay more for the music, is scarce worth considering.

Liebig is a musical Providence to the Berliners and Berlinerinnen. Without him, how would they (the general public, I mean) get any chance to hear a Symphony? The concerts of the Royal Orchestra, as we have seen, the Sinfonie Concerts, par excellence, are a very aristocratic and exclusive institution. The hall is small, and nearly all the tickets are held, and even handed down as heirlooms, in favored families. All the other evenings of the week, that orchestra is employed in the Royal Opera, and not available for concerts. Part of the charm, to the favored few in the Sinfonie Concerts, lies probably in their very exclusiveness. Let them rejoice in their brilliant chandelier light, multiplied in costly mirrors; we of the humbler sort can richly afford not to envy them; for does not Liebig flood us with whole skies full of unobstructed musical sunshine! They get perhaps a dozen Symphonies in the course of a year; we get some hundreds, if we are constant to our Liebig.

And this is not his only service. Music in Berlin has still another cause for gratitude to Liebig. He furnishes the orchestra for most of the great performances of choir and orchestra combined. What would the Sing-Akademie, what would the Bach-Verein, the Stern'sche Gesangverein, and the other important societies do without him? Where would they go for such an orchestra? Neither of them could afford to keep one of its own; and one picked up for the occasion could not answer so well. But if there is to be an oratorio of Handel, or the Paulus of Mendelssohn, brought out by the Academy; or the Passion music and the great Cantatas of Bach by the Bach-Verein; or Schumann's “Paradise and the Peri,” or Bach's great Mass, by Stern's Society,—why, there stands Liebig ready with his orchestra of fifty, all trained to hand, kept in continual practice the year round, like any regiment of the Prussian army, all accustomed to one another, all familiar with the whole repertoire of classical composers. He also, in order to maintain an equal standing, to show himself ebenbürtig (as the Germans say), or equal-born, with regular kapellmeisters, gives in the winter a selecter series of Sinfonie Concerts in the hall of the Sing-Akademie, which differ from the others only in the higher admission fee, and in the absence of cigars and coffee—the programmes being not a whit better. Our business now is with the cheap concerts.

Here are data from which to form an estimate of the amount and variety of fine orchestral music, which Liebig brings within the reach of every music-lover, during every year, in Berlin. I have before me the programmes of thirty-four of these concerts, the whole or parts of which I have heard, since the second week in November. And this by no means includes all the concerts that were given. Allowing for the three weeks of total abstinence from concerts during the period of public mourning after the death of the king in January, they represent about as much as one man could well find time or appetite to hear out of three month's worth of Liebig's performances.

Each programme, as a general rule, contains two Symphonies, three Overtures, and some other piece, besides commonly some favorite tit-bit of the public thrown in for an encore. The thirty-four programmes show the following

SYMPHONIES.

EMANUEL BACH. No. 1, (twice played).
HAYDN. Nos. 7; 12 (in D); 13 (C); 14 (D); 15 (B flat), twice; 16 (E flat); 17 (E flat); 19 (C); 21 (E flat), twice; 28 (A), twice; and the Military Symphony (twice).

ROSSINI. Cygnus animam, for orchestra.
PRINCE RADZIWIŁŁ. Choruses to "Faust."
MEYERBEER. Schiller March (twice).

This is a mere catalogue, to be sure. But every musical person will find it significant. It contains all the best and well known Symphonies of the four great Symphonic masters, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, besides many of their works which elsewhere seldom or never find their way now into public performance. It contains pretty copious and varied specimens of other writers in this form, both of the most modern, and of older ones which have chiefly a historical interest. In the overtures and other important works of the same composers, it is equally rich. Is there another city in the world where so much as a tithe of all this is accessible, in any three months, or three years, to the great mass of the music-loving people? Is not this a privilege, in respect to culture, to refining influences and cheerful opportunities, to be envied? Truly in this respect the Berliners are a favored people, although they lack some great advantages of our free land too precious to be exchanged even for Art and Music,—advantages, however, of which we ourselves shall never know the real value, and never be quite secured in their continuance, until they shall go hand in hand with these.

— But here time cuts me short. I wish to notice more particularly the manner in which Liebig makes up his programmes. D.

Italian Opera.

The troupe of the "Associated Artists" has left us after a prosperous season of four weeks, in which, we are told by a contemporary curious and well informed in such statistics, their receipts amounted to twenty-four thousand dollars, leaving them a clear profit of six thousand, after paying full salaries to the members of the company. A goodly return for performances often given during storms of unusual severity.

Don Giovanni was given on Wednesday of last week to a full house. Mad. COLSON was the Donna Anna, of course, and sang it admirably, giving with much fine effect the generally omitted air, Non mi dir. We have heard many good Donna Annas here, and Mad. Colson will bear the comparison with any of them. STIGELLI was the Don Ottavio and sang Il mio tesoro finely, but the insipid lover of Donna Anna is no congenial character for him, and beyond the beautiful song he finds little scope in the part for his best efforts. Miss PHILLIPS was the Zerlina of the evening, and gave the music better than we should have supposed the natural range of her voice would have permitted her, singing with taste and discretion, and we need not say, acting the part effectively and in good taste. Perhaps, her Zerlina was scarcely simple enough for Mozart's little peasant girl, who listens at one moment to the artful flatteries of Don Juan and the next weeps over the piteous tale of Masetto, hardly knowing what she is about in either case, her foolish head completely turned by the soft words of either. Miss HINCKLEY, we were told by the bills, kindly consented to assume the part of Donna Elvira! A wonderful condescension indeed! What is art coming to, if it is blazoned as a favor on the part of a young singer, to be willing to take a leading part in this immortal work of Mozart. Is it not the artist who is honored by being thought capable of filling it, and is it not a worthy object of ambition for any singer to aid in giving completeness and due effect to the production of this masterpiece? Miss Hinckley did it very well, perhaps as well as any of her predecessors in the character. FERRI was a fair Don Giovanni, and SUSINI an amusing Leporello, singing some things very well, being in better voice than usual. The whole performance was a reasonably satisfactory one, the parts being equally balanced and intelligently supported.

The Barber was given on Thursday instead of Moses which had been promised, the change of opera, of course making a thin house. The performance was a lively merry one, as it generally is, the artists seeming to enjoy the fun as well as the music, and to enter into it with a zest that is apt to hurry them a little beyond due bounds. FERRI was the Figaro and a very satisfactory one. BRIGNOLI, SUSINI and BARILI taking the Count, Bartolo and Basilio, and all very effectively. Miss HINCKLEY was the Rosina, and acquitted herself with much credit. She sang the Una voce, in very good style and introduced a brilliant bravura waltz in the singing lesson, which she sang finely, being enthusiastically applauded and obliged to repeat it. She entered with spirit into the comedy, and the whole performance, in spite of some imperfections and a little excess of fun at times, was on the whole a very enjoyable and pleasant one.

I Puritani was sung on Friday and Miss KELLOGG attempted a bold and not altogether successful experiment in venturing to assume the rôle of Elvira. This part in which the memory of Grisi is still so fresh, is one that requires more maturely developed powers than those of our young prima donna, to render with proper effect. She did some things well, nevertheless. Son Vergine vezzosa, was sung with brilliant execution being warmly applauded, and rewarded by the customary tribute of bouquets. But as a whole, she did not make a marked impression in this character, and will never be recollected in it or identified with it as she may be with Linda or even La Sonnambula. Very much too, of the music was omitted, probably to adapt it to her powers of execution or endurance. With this we have fault to find. A true artist should not, would not attempt a great part in this skeleton fashion, giving only sparkling morceaux and cutting other parts vitally essential to the dramatic unity of the plot. Better not soar so high till the wings are strong enough to complete the flight, so will the artist be safe alike from the perils of falling from the dizzy height and from being touched by the shafts that are levelled by critics on every side. BRIGNOLI sang in his usual faultless manner and Ferri and Susini well represented the Puritan colonels, exciting the accustomed popular enthusiasm by their spirited singing of the famous Suoni la tromba. The important part of the Queen Henrietta, in the hands of Mad. Avogadro, was worse than nothing. Here was another opportunity for some of the ladies of the troupe who were competent, to show a true artistic ambition by filling the part, thus aiding to give a complete and worthy representation of a great work. When shall we have singers who are also true artists, who so love their art as to be willing at times to assume a place a little lower than the highest, for the honor of Art?

La Juive was performed for the fourth time on Saturday afternoon, being the last performance of the season. We need not say that we enjoyed this additional chance of hearing this opera. The only change was the substitution of Lotti for Scola, in the part of Leopoldo; a somewhat smaller man with a somewhat larger voice than his predecessor. The music written for this character demands a first-class tenor, and the dramatic importance of the part is very great. We could not but wish to hear BRIGNOLI in the part, and speculate what Stigelli might not make of it, were he Leopoldo and not the Jew. With such a voice as either of these in this part, what a fine cast we should have had of La Juive. It is vain to hope for such good fortune as to see two such tenors singing together in the same opera. Here is the chance. When will Signor Brignoli improve it? The orchestra was reduced to its usual size, at this performance, and the opera was given almost complete, with such short pauses between the acts that it was compressed into three hours.

So ends a season of Italian opera very pleasant to the hearers, and very creditable to the artists. They have given us two new operas of great interest, two native prima donnas of great promise and good performance, who will be remembered here with pleasure and have left a decided impression of unusual talent upon the audiences who have heard them. They will always be welcomed with pleasure. They have had another prima donna, Mad. COLSON, of long acknowledged talent and a reputation that increases with every effort that she makes; two rival tenors, each unrivalled in their way, a contralto, a Boston girl, who is not without honor in her own city but always gladly welcomed, not only esteemed for her talent as an artist but respected for her excellent private character. Add to these such voices as those of Ferri and Susini, and we must confess to having been favored with a troupe of unusual talent.

Signor Muzio, the conductor, has done his work well, and is entitled to be honorably mentioned in a review of the season. The business management has been well conducted, as is evinced by the pecuniary success of the troupe and the comparatively few disappointments of any kind that the public has suffered during the season. If the company had done some things in the way we have suggested they might have been done, we should have little fault to find.

Organ Concert.

The Organ Concert at Tremont Temple, on Fast-day, given by Mr. GEO. E. WHITING, came too late to receive a notice in our last week's issue. Here is the programme :

PART FIRST.

1. Grand Sonata in F minor, (Op. 65, No. 1.).....Mendelssohn
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
2. Chorus, Mighty Jehovah. "Lucresia Borgia".....Donizetti
Bowdoin St. Choir.
3. { a Organ Fugue in G minor.....Bach
b Overture, "Oberon".....Von Weber
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
4. Chorus, Joy is over. "Lucresia Borgia".....Donizetti
Bowdoin St. Choir.
5. Fantasia for Organ in E minor.....G. E. Whiting

PART SECOND.

1. Prelude and Fugue in C minor, (Op. 37, No. 1.).....Mendelssohn
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
2. Chorus, The Regatta. "Lucresia Borgia".....Donizetti
Bowdoin St. Choir.
3. { a Variations on "God save the Queen".....Rink b Andante from Mendelssohn's 4th (Italian) Symphony.
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.
4. Chorus, Father in Heaven. "Mammiello".....Auber
Bowdoin St. Choir.
5. Overture, "Guillaume Tell," (by request)......Rossini
Mr. Geo. E. Whiting.

Mr. WHITING is a very young man and is said to have studied by himself with the exception latterly of a short course of instruction. If so he deserves great credit for having dared to attack such a programme as that above. The word "attack" seems exactly to express his style of playing, indeed a musical friend who sat by our side would fervently ejaculate at the close of each piece "tremendous execution!" He is a very nervous man, evidently, and his nervousness crept into his performance, more evident in the fugue perhaps, than elsewhere, which as he played it was a grand rush, the time all too fast and consequently one tone hard on the heels of another. The movement of a fugue should certainly be clear and distinct, preserving a certain dignity in its greatest haste.

We are certainly right in supposing that the test of an overture upon the organ, is successful imitation of the orchestra. The organ has the materials, as many of its stops are voiced expressly to imitate the orchestra, truly instrumental. Mr. Whiting's overtures, by this standard, fell short, he did not make good use of his materials, and we missed that perfect connection between the passages so satisfying in a superior orchestra; there was too much patchwork. However, Mr. Whiting is a most promising musician and in his Fantasia he was very successful. It has a character of its own, making it truly original. Many of these compositions are original only in virtue of their want of character. The choruses were only well rendered, showing faithful drill, but needing sadly the electrifying influence of a resolute baton. There was an unpleasant see-saw in the time between the organ and chorus in the first pieces. However, the audience were delighted, either with the music or the swift heels of the organist, and we have no right to complain.

Mr. S. B. BALL gave his annual concert last Tuesday evening, at the School-street Church. Beside his quartette, he had the volunteered assistance of a number of ladies and gentlemen, many of whom are his pupils. The church was well filled, and the programme, which consisted of choruses, part-songs, solos, &c., was quite creditably performed, considering that it was amateur talent. Some of the solos deserve particular mention, but we have not space. Mr. Ball was agreeably surprised at the close of the concert, by the gift of a valuable diamond pin, from his pupils.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Mendelssohn Quintette Club are to conclude their series of parlor concerts in this place by a public concert in Lyceum Hall, on Friday, April 19th, and will give Beethoven's Septette and Schubert's Octette, on their programme. Our Cambridge readers should not forget this concert.

The Polyhymnia, a vocal organization consisting of boys and men from the Church of the Advent choir gave a well attended concert at Williams' Hall, on Fast Day eve. The programme comprised a variety of sacred and secular music. Among the former were some of the fine old English Anthems. These pieces were sung correctly but without animation and suffered much from a too heavy organ-accompaniment. Occasionally only, we got a glimpse of the heavenly tone-body of the boys' voices. To our taste the merest outline of an accompaniment would have sufficed. The boys did not need any support from the organ; they came in promptly and firmly as well as true in pitch. This chorus might do a great deal of good by bringing to our hearing part of the Berlin Dom-Chor's repertoire of pieces. Love songs of which the second part had some, are of doubtful propriety for boy's voices, whose tone-color very naturally lacks that warmth which is necessary to portray emotions of the heart.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, MARCH 29, 1861.—All the scenic display of the Grand Opera, the preparations that had lasted for six months, the coöperation of the best artists could not ensure the success of Tannhäuser. On the evening of the first representation it might well be doubted whether the failure was real or only apparent. The very novelty of the performance elicited a degree of attention which prevented the full explosion of the discontented. Ulterior performances the piece however, can leave no doubt in the minds of those who were still unwilling to abandon the hope of success on the first evening.

Wagner attacks in every portion of his work what he styles the conventional rules of the Italian opera. Even the most sanguine admirers and upholders of system had not calculated upon the co-operation of the musical critics of the capital. Indeed Wagner has always made light of the opinions of the press. He does not hesitate to assert in one of his theoretical works that he believes himself to be prejudged by the writers of the musical feuilletons. It is to the public he appeals, "that public whose taste has not been altogether corrupted by Italian melody." The Paris public must in Mr. Wagner's opinion now, be as corrupted in taste as the Paris critics, for it has judged his Tannhäuser with even less respect. The press had praised certain passages of the work at least, these very passages were received with hisses and interrupted at the second representation.

It seems pretty certain now that the work will be withdrawn. The tumult was so great last Sunday that it was expected every moment that some representative of police authority would make his appearance on the stage requesting the public, in that polite way which is in order in France, to desist from any manifestation of satisfaction. The presence of the Emperor is generally all sufficient to keep the most turbulent audience within bounds. In this case it was not so. Although he himself gave the signal of applause, that applause was immediately met by hisses and occasionally by works little complimentary to those who seemed to conform to the Imperial taste. On the second evening when the applauders and hisses were about divided, in the middle of the second act, the Emperor appeared in his box. All who saw him make his appearance immediately turned and applauded. Those on the same side of the house as the Imperial loge not comprehending the cause of the increased applause made a counter demonstration. It was several minutes before the tumult could be appeased. Such scenes were renewed several times. The orchestra, the actors found favor with the public. It was the composer himself on whom the dissatisfaction seemed to concentrate. Once Niemann, who personated the character of Tannhäuser threw up his arms and and stopped as if begging the audience for silence. This action was met by unequivocal marks of encouragement for the artist. Nothing but the music itself was the subject of disapprobation.

The failure of the Tannhäuser may be better appreciated from a few citations. The general spirit of criticism may be inferred from the following specimen. It is Fiorentino who writes.

"People imagine that an imperturbable assurance is sufficient to impose one's self upon a public the most railing, skeptical and keen-sighted in the world. There were the other evening at the opera twenty French composers who each have written works superior to anything Mr. Wagner has ever done, and it is in presence of these masters he comes and erects himself into an inspired reformer, an infallible genius."

Little enough is said about the music, perhaps those gentlemen whom the composer seems to have treated with little deference do not deem it worthy of criticism but only of abuse. This they give plentifully. And the legend, the plot, even they cannot digest.

"The legend of Tannhäuser is popular in Germany. The celebrated Tieck has converted it into a tale which we are told is taught to children. Happy young German intellects that are fit from the cradle for such heavy food!"

Without wishing to defend Wagner's system one cannot but be impressed with the injustice, the shallowness, the narrow-mindedness of the spirit that has called forth the majority of the remarks that have been current in the Paris press respecting a work which if it deserve nothing more, deserves at least a serious refutation of the principles upon which it is constructed.

We may expect soon a parody of the piece by Delacour and Lambert-Thiboust. It is to be produced at the Varieties under the title of Ya main Herr. A large caricature in one of the weekly papers represents a bard accompanying his song with a harp, his hearers falling asleep about him. Beneath are the words, "Germany still uneasy in the possession of her Rhine-provinces sends the Tannhäuser to Paris to put the French asleep."

Of the new pieces of the last fortnight may be mentioned: At the Odeon Le Jaloux du Passé by M. Scholl; at the Palais Royal Arrêtons les frais; at the Gaité, La Fille des chiffonniers a melodrama by Anicet Bourgeois and Dagué; at the Bouffes-Parisiens, Le Pont des Soupirs, opera-bouffo in two acts by Crémieux and Halévy, music by Offenbach. At the Vaudeville La femme est troublée by Dumanoir and de Courcelles.

At the Gymnase a beautiful little Vaudeville was represented last week. It is entitled Les Trembleurs, and is written by Dumanoir and Clairville. The hero Monsieur Bruneau trembles constantly at the political state of affairs. He scents war, revolution, invasion in every breeze. He never fails to read the journals which by their detailed accounts of insurrections, and dissatisfactions in every part of Europe render his nights sleepless. The piece is full of pointed couplets which applying well to the present are received with great applause.

At the Italian Opera Mozart's Nozze di Figaro was given last week.

The reception of the new ballet by Dorley and Petitpa at the Grand Opera contrasted with that of the Tannhäuser. Graziosa was composed expressly to show the power of Mme. Ferraris in its fullest relief.

It was on Monday last, March 25, that Madame Ristori made her first appearance at the theatre of the Odeon in the new piece of Ernest Legouvé La Madone de l'Art. Having been unable to witness this performance I shall in a future letter revert to this great Italian artist who now presents herself before the French public acting in a language not her own.

It is said that the work of M. Legouvé was inspired by Mad. Ristori herself. The subject is the love of a German prince for a great tragic actress Beatrix. His rank is an unsurmountable barrier to their union. "I love you but never will be your mistress," is the declaration of Beatrix, who henceforth has no other love but art. The moral aim of the piece is to show how really great genius is when it walks hand in hand with virtue. To-day being Good Friday, all the theatres of the capital are closed. F. B.

PITTSFIELD, APRIL 3, 1861.—Notwithstanding the severest snow storm that ever descended from April skies, a select company were assembled last evening at a "soirée musicale" given here by the pupils of the Mendelssohn Musical Institute. Had you been present, Mr. Editor, I doubt not you would agree with me in the opinion that the performances were as well worthy of being styled a "Grand vocal and instrumental concert," as many given under that name in our cities. I send you a programme, by which you will see that the pieces performed were indeed worthy of artists, and were such as those who are ambitious to enter the heaven of the Tone-art, and realize all its glorious wonders, will appreciate and enjoy.

PART I.

1. Overture—Guillaume Tell.....Romini
Misses Julia C. Clark and Harriet A. Hall.
2. Scotch Ballad.....
Miss Helen Macgregor.
3. Polonaise—Op. 26.....Chopin
Miss S. Louise Monroe.
4. Terzetto—"Era stella del mattino".....Mercadante Misses McGregor, Clark and Hall.
5. Bando Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Miss Elizabeth F. Merrill.
6. Aria—"Dove sono".....Mozart
Miss S. L. Monroe.
7. Moonlight sonata.....Beethoven
Miss H. Macgregor.

PART II.

8. Grand Duo—Op. 114.....F. Schubert
Misses S. L. Monroe and E. F. Merrill.

A taste of the sweet and gentle sadness of Chopin, of the weird and fairy-like harmonies of Mendelssohn, one of the noblest of Mozart's melodies, the wonderful sonata of Beethoven, so gentle and so sad in its beginning, so overwhelming the astonished listener, as it proceeds in its wild movement;—and then, how can I do justice to that "grand" work of Schubert, in the weakness of language and pen? One must hear and enjoy it, in order to realize its beauty and power. May you soon have opportunity to enjoy it as well as I did last evening. The execution of these and all the pieces of the programme was rare indeed, called for no indulgence on the score of dilettantism. The performers must indeed possess natural talent, and also have had the advantage of rare training in all those departments which enable the pupil to render the meaning and intentions of such authors with such skill.

I learn from their catalogue just published that this Musical Institute thus closes its fifth year, having instructed one hundred and fifty-three pupils, of whom twenty-two are or have been teaching successfully, in various parts of the country. May the teachers emulate their master in the high standard to which he earnestly endeavor to raise all who come within his influence, in regard to the class of Music which should receive attention and the manner of teaching and studying it. L. M. R.

TERRE HAUTE, (La)—Being compelled about six weeks ago to stay over night in Terre Haute, Indiana, your correspondent was induced to visit an exhibition concert given by the pupils of Mr. Meininger, Prof. of music in the Female College of that place. Having some knowledge of music, I am compelled to say that I was so astonished with the performance of those scholars, both in vocal and instrumental music, that I determined to speak of it to the public through your worthy journal, as sufficient praise can hardly be bestowed upon the professor for his ability and faithful discharge of his duty. One young Miss (whose name I have since forgotten) played the piano in a style, that is not often found in this country from older hands. A. K.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH, 22, 1861.—Not seeing any notice of the Harmonia First Concert in your interesting paper and knowing the scarcity of musical news in this city I take the liberty of giving you a sketch of the concert of 21st inst.

The programme contained a choice selection of concerted pieces and solos given by the best talent of the society. The choruses were well rendered, particularly the "Morning Prayer" from Dr. Meignen's "Deluge," and the Bacchanalian Chorus from Darley's Cities of the Plain. The gentleman who sang the Bass Solo in Moses, needs considerable study and finish before attempting such parts, but as a whole this chorus was well sung. A duet from Semiramide by two young ladies was very well given, although one might desire a little expression in singing dramatic music. The Trio from Belisario was sung with spirit and feeling, the soprano having a voice of unusual sweetness and clearness, the bass and tenor were of unusual good quality for amateurs. The aria from Nabucco for mezzo-soprano was rendered tolerably; the singer evidently prides herself upon her low notes which are not however, as good in quality as the higher ones, being too husky, and it will be necessary for her to study Italian as her pronunciation is horrible. A Quartette from the Bohemian Girl was very well rendered and appeared to give satisfaction, in fact it was not as well sung by the last opera troupe in this city. Prof. Bishop's Ballad was given in his usual style and well merited the hearty applause it received. "Una voce," from the Barbieri was tolerably well given by a statue-like young lady; the time was entirely too slow, it being a lively piece requiring the quickest movement and most brilliant execution. A Duet called "Addio," by Donizetti was very well sung but was lacking in expression. An Aria from Gemma di Vergy was next given by the soprano before spoken of in the Trio.

The rendering of this piece was the gem of the evening the execution style and expression being faultless, this young lady appears to possess a voice of unusual register, singing from "C" in alt down to "A" in this piece and with uncommon strength. The next a male quartette by Darley, was well rendered (if we except a mistake made by the bass), and met with hearty applause, then followed a Duet from Trovatore for mezzo-soprano and tenor, very effectively sung, and we were reminded rather forcibly of Brignoli by this tenor who possesses a fine full chest-voice of unusual sweetness; he should apply himself to study and a few years hence he will occupy a prominent place among the talent of this city, the lady acquitted herself with great credit, singing with expression, showing the proper appreciation of the music; in fact, this piece has been very seldom, if ever sung better on the stage. The closing feature was the "Star Spangled Banner," solo and chorus. The solo parts were sustained by a young lady dressed in costume supposed to represent the Goddess of Liberty, quite a novelty at a Harmonia Concert, and a young gentleman formerly a member of the Cooper Opera Troupe filled the tenor and he sang with great spirit and expression, the lady however sang through her nose, which marred the effect considerably, probably the heavy crown of stars surmounting her head was the cause. I do not like fancy ball costumes in the concert room, particularly when given by a sacred musical society.

The audience rose whilst singing the national anthem, and although it met with much applause still it was not encored. Taking the concert as a whole it was a success, we must not expect to find perfection in amateurs, but all engaged may with study become good if not first class concert singers.

Yours,

VERDI.

CINCINNATI, MARCH.—The Cecilia Society performed in their fourth regular concert—fifth season Gade's composition "Erlking's daughter," for Soli, chorus and orchestra in a highly creditable manner. In the first, miscellaneous, part of the concert Miss Raymond the Contralto, and Mr. Werner, the Pianist, distinguished themselves.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Rock me to sleep, mother. Frank Wood. 25

A very pleasing composition, the more than charming words by "Florence Percy." The public will not be slow to recognise its merits, and we predict for it a wide popularity.

Annabel Lee. Song. E. F. Falconnet. 60

A piece which has evidently been a work of love with the author. Its general plan is well conceived and the details are carefully finished and show consummate taste and musician-ship.

O the dear delight of dancing. Montgomery. 25

A humorous song; easy and very amusing.

I'd be a star. With guitar accompaniment.)

C. J. Dorn. 25

Molly Bawn. " " Curtiss. 25

Two popular songs, newly arranged for guitar players.

Instrumental Music.

Russian Medley. Charles Grobe. 50

Russia has a great many airs which are peculiar to her. They have always been favorites with arrangers. From Thalberg to Beyer almost every composer of note has paid tribute to the beauty of these Russian melodies. In this medley they are gathered like a bunch of flowers, each in its own plain and beautiful garb, unadorned by the glittering network of embellishments which they are often hidden in. It is a very pleasing combination.

Willie's favorite Quickstep. S. A. Earle. 25

Great Western Galop. A. Rossi. 25

Two pretty trifles. Good recreation pieces for scholars.

La mia letizia. (In tears I pine). Cavatina from "I Lombardi." Transcribed. A. Baumbach. 35

An effective arrangement of this popular air of Verdi's, just difficult enough to make it attractive to even the advanced pianist. As there has not been any arrangement of this melody, well-known and much admired as it is, our amateurs will not be slow to get a copy.

Lilla March. Junior. 5

Nightingale and Cuckoo Waltz. M. Perabo. 10

Prairie Polka. Ernst Perabo. 15

Pretty trifles, for beginners.

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE GUITAR. 50

These volumes are the first of a new series of attractive low priced books of instruction and music; for all kinds of musical instruments. They are exceedingly neat in typography, the types being clear and distinct and the paper and printing unexceptionable. The contents are of a popular kind, comprising excellent instructions, and a very choice collection of the best music of the day.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

COMIC OPERA.

1595—1800.

As the chanson engendered the Vaudeville so the Vaudeville was parent of the Comic Opera. The latter in fact was the child of both, since in the Vaudeville airs had succeeded the old slow moving tunes.

At first Allard and Bertrand, associated with Widow Maurice and Decelles, had the theatrical exhibitions of the Fair in their hands alone. They afterwards shared them with Dolet and Laplace and were succeeded by Octave and Dominique. Their successors were Saint-Edme and Madame Baron, after whom came Francisque and Lalauze. At length Ponteau obtained from the Academy of Music the right to establish the comic opera, which he held until its suppression in 1742.

The Theatre de la Foire began with farces in which rope dancers mingled their performances. In course of time they began to give fragments of old Italian pieces, to the great discontent of the French comedians, who obtained a prohibition of the giving any piece in dialogue or monologue by the actors of the Foire. They immediately had recourse to the plan of giving the text to the spectators who sang, while the orchestra played the tune; but afterward they obtained from the opera the right of singing.

Lesage, Fuzelier and d'Orneval began immediately to compose pieces different from the vaudeville, being in peculiar, rhymed couplets, and the new form took the name of Opera Comique.

The first Comic Opera mentioned by Desboulmiers, in his "Histoire du Theatre de l'Opera Comique" is a piece in one act entitled Le Retour d'Arlequin à la foire. It was represented Feb. 12, 1712. Then came La Querelle des Theatres and in 1718 des Funerailles de la Foire, a piece referring to the suppression of the Opera Comique through the combined influence of the French and Italian comedies. It was not revived again until the Fair of Saint Laurence in 1721, when a piece in one act was performed called Le Rappel de la Foire à la Vie. At length after numberless vicissitudes Monnet—whose motto was Monet, mulcet, movet—reopened the comic opera at the Fair of St. Germain in 1752; and ten years later the company was officially reunited to the Italian comedy. In 1780 the Italian actors withdrew, Carlin excepted; but it was not until 1793, after the law granting liberty to the theatre, that the concern took again a national name, Opera Comique, though originating at the Fair, in dramatic exhibitions which go back to the year 1595. In fact so long ago as Feb. 5, 1596, the Theatre de la Foire St. Germain had been duly recognized and had its privileges upon the payment of the two crowns per annum to the Brotherhood of the Passion.

After Lesage, Fuzelier and d'Orneval, the most successful authors for the comic opera during the 18th century were, Piron, Panard, Carolet, Fagan, Favart, Delisle, Marivaux, Antrean, Boissy, Vadé, Laujon, Anseaume and Sedaine. The most distinguished composers of that era were Gilliers, Dauvergne, Duni, Philidor, Monsigny and Gretry. Of the second rank, Blavet, Aubert, Alexandre, de la Croix, Mouret, Lacoste, Laruette an excellent actor, Blaise, Desbrosses, Trial, de La Borde, Dezede, Martini. To Jean Claude Gilliers, a composer very well forgotten now, is due a fame no less than that of having been the creator of that national French form of the musical drama, the comic opera. His airs are distinguished by frank gaiety neatness of rhythm and a melody easy to fix in the memory. Gilliers was born in Paris in 1667 and died there in 1727, aged 70 years. He began his career at the Comedie Française as a violinist, where he wrote the music for the dances in the small pieces of Regnard and Dancourt. As Fetis has not given a list of the works of this founder of the French comic opera, we add partly to fill the gap, the titles and dates of all his pieces, which we have been able to find.

1. L' Hyménée royal, an entertainment, text by Pellegrin, 1699.
2. Cephale et Procris, 3 acts, text by Dancourt, at the Comedie Française 1711.
3. La Foire de Guibray, text by Lesage, at the Fair of Saint Laurent, 1714.
4. Le Tombeau de Nostradamus, 1 act, Lesage, 1714.
5. Parodie de Telemaque, for the opening of the theatre of St. Edme, 1715.
6. La Ceinture de Venus, 2 acts, Lesage, 1715.
7. Les Dieux à la Foire, a prologue, 1724.
8. L' Amante retrouvé, 1 act, Largillière, Aug. 6, 1727.
9. Sancho Pança, 2 acts, Thierry; Aug. 28, 1727.
10. La niece vengée, 1 act, Panard, Aug. 28, 1731.
11. La Comedie sans hommes, Panard; Feb. 3, 1732.
12. La Fille sauvage, 1 act; July 7, 1732.
13. Le Pot-Pourri comique, 1 act; pantomime by Panard, 1732.
14. Sophie et Sigismond, 1 act.
15. La première Representation, Lesage; June 26, 1736.

It is true that all those pieces are far from deserving the title of real musical works, especially in their orchestration. But at that time they did not put the pedestal upon the stage and the statue in the orchestra—to use the fine simile of Gretry. Let us here express our regret that the bust of Gilliers has not been placed in the lobby of the Opera Comique. He was the originator of this form, a fact which should not be forgotten.

After Gilliers and his contemporaries, Mouret, de la Coste, de La Croix, Grandval, Aubert, Alexandre, &c., Dauvergne, (born at Clermont 1713 died at Lyons 1797) attracted public attention by his comic opera Les Troqueurs, given in 1758. Down to this time, music had mingled with the dialogue of the comedies only in the form of songs, suited to the action, or in the vaudevilles at the end of the plays. Les Troqueurs on the other hand, was written in imitation of the Italian Intermezzos—the Serva Padrona of Pergolese for instance, performed at Paris in the autumn of 1752—that is, with recitatives to connect the musical pieces and gave a new impulse to the development of this child of the comedy—vaudeville. Hence it deserves some description.

Four persons, two men and two women, comprise all the elements of this little drama. Lucas and Lubin are to marry Margot and Fanchon; but before the knots are tied they fall into serious reflections upon the characters of their future spouses. The one is hot-tempered and headstrong as a devil, the other so easy as to be almost sleepy. The lovers conclude that each has a hard bargain and agree to exchange greatly for the worse. So having proved that the exchange has the balance on the wrong side, each takes his own again.

Le Jaloux corrigé by the flutist Blavet, born at Besancon in 1700, obtained a merited success; but soon after this was given there came to Paris an Italian composer, who wrote a series of works full of nature, grace, gaiety and comic power. This was Duni, born at Matera in the kingdom of Naples, Feb. 9, 1709, the tenth child of an obscure chapel master. He received his musical education at the conservatory dei Poveri di Gesu Cristo at Naples under the celebrated Durante, then at its head. Receiving a commission to compose the opera Nero for Rome, Duni found himself put in competition with Pergolese. The score of the latter was superior to Duni's, but the Neapolitan gained a success by being the first to proclaim in all companies Pergolese's superiority. After travelling extensively Duni was appointed music teacher to the crown prince of Parma. As French was a common language at that court, the composer was called upon to write several little operas in that language. He obtained a distinguished success with his Ninette à la Cour (1755), text by Favart, and was then contrasted with the composition of La Chercheuse d'Esprit and le Peintre amoureux de son modele. He settled in Paris in 1757, where he wrote eighteen operas in the course of eighteen years. The most known are Nina et Lindor, (Sept. 9, 1758), la Fille mal gardée (1758), Pile des Fous (1761), la bonne Fille (1762), les Chasseurs et la Laitiere (July 21, 1763), la Fee Urgele (1765), Clochette (1766), les Moissonneurs (1768) Thémire (1770).

A dozen Italian and twenty French comic operas form a handsome aggregate of musical labor for Duni, who died at Paris June 11, 1775. All his works are full of grace and freshness; his instrumentation was usually extended only to the stringed quartette, sometimes two hautbois or two flutes being added. The vocal parts are, however, delicious, full of taste, nature and true and well conceived expression. The melodies are such as come from the heart, not leaving it void, like those of our day. When art has degenerated into handicraft elsewhere, its decay is rapid; Let us hope for a revival also in music.

François André Danican Philidor, whose bust is still wanting in the lobby of the Opera Comique was a contemporary of Duni. He was born at Dreux, Sept. 7, 1727 of an old and distinguished musical family, and was admitted among the boys of the royal music at vaudevilles at the proper age, where he studied his art under Campa. Settling in Paris he gave instruction in eking out a living as a copyist. It was at that he studied chess for which he had remarkable talents. The nine years from 1745 to 1754 he spent in Germany, Holland and England, occupying himself much more with chess than with music. His first work for the theatre of the Fair of St Laurent was given March 9, 1759, and obtained a brilliant success. It was entitled Blaise le savetier; this was followed by l'Huître et les Plaideurs, le Soldat magicien, and le Jardinier et son Seigneur. Philidor became composer to the Opera Comique, ruling that stage for which he wrote thirteen works. The most remarkable of them are Le Marechal, in 1 act, le Bûcheron, le Sorcier, Tom Jones (1764), and l'Amitié au Village, (Oct. 31, 1785).

In 1777 he printed at London his Analyse du jeu d'échecs. May 23, 1786, he produced an unsuccessful work at the Grand Opera, Themistocles, in three acts, from which time he gave himself up entirely to his passion for chess at the café de Regence. The revolutionary troubles led him to return to London where he died Aug. 30, 1795. His music is free, natural and melodious; he drew his effects from nature and often produced picturesque and original rhythms. His instrumentation is simple, though horns and bassoons are added to the old hautbois and flutes.

Monsigny, a composer of noble family, was born two years after Philidor, at Fauquemberg, near St. Omer, Oct. 17, 1729. He was destined by his family to a financial career, but afterward entered the service of the Duke of Orleans, as Major Domo. Until his thirtieth year he lived quietly in the high circles, whence he gained that elegance of manner, which he preserved through life. A performance of Pergoleses la Servante maîtresse, awakened in him the impulse to write for the stage. He began the study of composition immediately with Gianotti, and after some informal essays of his powers, wrote the score of the Aveux indiscrets—and a piece given at the theatre de la Foire in 1759. Its success encouraged him to follow it with two more works upon the same stage in 1750, Le Maître en droit and le Cadi dupé. The comic force shewn in the latter called from the poet Sedaine the expression, "there is the man for me!" The two authors joined their forces and wrote together a large number of dramas and comic operas, one of which was On ne s'avise jamais de tout, (Sept. 17, 1716).

Monsigny's success was so great as to excite the jealousy of the Italian comedy, which succeeded in causing the Theatre de la Foire to be closed.

The next year, 1762, the two theatres were united and Monsigny wrote successively, during the following years, le Roi et le Fermier, Rose et Colas, Aline reine de Golconde, l'Ile sonnante, le Deserteur, his masterpiece (March 6, 1769), le Faucon, le Bal de Arsène, le Rendezvous bien Employé, and Felix ou l'Enfant trouvé, (3 acts, 1777). This was his last work. His rare sensibility was exhausted; this had been his good genius, for it inspired him with a constant supply of melodies so touching as to render his works immortal. In 1798, the directors of the Opera Comique gave him a pension of 2,400 francs. In 1800 he took the place of Piccini as inspector of Instruction at the Conservatory. He succeeded Gretry as member of the Institute in 1813 received the cross of the Legion of Honor in 1816 and died at Paris, Jan. 14, 1817 at the great age of eighty-eight years.

Gretry was as remarkable for his feeling of scenic effect as Monsigny for the exquisite sentiment of his melody. He was born at Liege, Feb. 11, 1741, the son of a poor musician and began life as a singing boy at the collegiate church of St. Denis. Leclerc, Renekin and Moreau were his teachers; but the influence of the Operas of Pergolesi, Buranello, &c., upon the future master, decided his vocation for the theatre; at the age of eighteen he went to Rome, where he studied counterpoint under Casali and at length produced at the theatre Alberti an Italian interlude, entitled, la Vendemmiatrice.

The score of Monsigny's Rose et Colas gave Gretry an insight into the characters of the French comic opera. He then came to Paris, stopping at Geneva on the way where he produced his Isabelle et Gertrude. At length after conquering a thousand difficulties he brought out Le Huron, a comedy in one act by Marmontel, Aug. 20, 1758). To this succeeded Lucie, then le Tableau parlant, a masterpiece of drollery, Zemire et Azor, la Rosière de Salency, l'Amant jaloux, l'Epreuve villageoise and Richard Cœur de Lion (1785) which sealed the fame of its author. At the Grand Opera La Caravane, Panurge and Anacreon obtained a merited success. His last works showed plainly the decay of his peculiar genius.

A true vein of melody and expression suited to his text are the distinguishing qualities of Gretry's music. His instrumentation is feeble and has often been retouched in our time. But such touchings are always a very delicate matter and it is at least a very rare thing to succeed; hence we much prefer the naive defects of the author to the deafening noise introduced by modern writers. In 1789 and 1797 Gretry published two very interesting volumes of Essai sur la Musique, which we recommend to the attention of all composers. He was appointed inspector at the Conservatory in 1795, and was elected to one of the three chairs of the musical Section of the Institute then formed. Gretry died at Montmorency Sept. 24, 1813, crowned with glory and honor.

"The Music of the Future."

RICHARD WAGNER.

PARIS, MARCH 29.

1. Quatre Poèmes d'opéra traduits en prose française précédés d'une lettre sur la musique par Richard Wagner—(Le Vaisseau Fantôme—Tannhäuser—Lohengrin—Tristan et Isolde)—Paris. A. Bourdilliat et Cie 1861. 1 vol. grand in 18 pp. LXXXIII—317.

2. "Zukunftsmusik"—Brief an einen französischen Freund als Vorwort zu einer Prosa-Üebersetzung seiner Operndichtungen von Richard Wagner. Leipzig. Verlagsbuchhandlung von J. J. Weber, 1861. 1 vol. 8° pp. 58.

Richard Wagner has proved himself a writer of talent no less than a musical composer. His works "Art and Revolution,"—"Art of Future"—and "The Opera and the Drama" are noble expositions of his theories of art, and vigorous defences of his own method of composition as well as bold attacks upon prevalent and hitherto universally adopted rules. Wagner presents himself as an innovator. The principles upon which former composers have worked he treats as radically false, his severity falling especially upon the Italian school, whose best productions he qualifies with the name of table music. It would be foreign to our purpose to enter into any details in regard to this aesthetic discussion which has occupied so much space in the German press, we merely wish to record the appearance of Wagner's last production, one addressed more particularly to the general reader and prepared by him previous to the representation of his Tannhäuser at the Grand Opera in Paris.

It was at the request and under the auspices of the Emperor himself that the Tannhäuser was received. From the first announcement of the intention, now, nearly two years ago, a portion of the Paris press showed itself averse to the step about to be taken. The Presse baptised the foreign composer with the name of the Marat of music. An epithet goes far in France in influencing public opinion. The Marat of music! Such was the note of introduction announcing to the Paris public the creator of what other laughers beyond the Rhine had called "The music of the future," from a misinterpretation willing or otherwise of the title of his second work.

The volumes heading this notice were prepared by Wagner to answer or rather to precede the criticism with which he naturally expected his Tannhäuser to be met. The letter addressed to M. Frédéric Villot explains concisely the nature of the innovation he has labored to introduce in the treatment of the opera. Then follow prose versions of his operas except the Nibelungen, for Wagner, unlike foreign composers has always written the text to his own music. The Phantom Ship, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, and Tristan and Isolde are all based upon popular traditions, that are worked up with dramatic interest. They are not mere librettos where all is sacrificed to the music, where a few lines or words are repeated to satiety, where are found platitudes which seem to justify the saying of Voltaire that "what is too foolish to be spoken must be sung." The development of the action is complete. They are poems as they are justly styled in the title page: Poèmes d'Opéra.

However all these preparations, all the splendors of the scenery and costumes of the Grand Opera could not save the Tannhäuser from being mercilessly hissed on its first representation in Paris. We do not wish to quarrel with the judgment pronounced by the public on this occasion. This is no place either to attack or defend Wagner's music, only we would remark that there was in the reception of the Tannhäuser every evidence of a parti-pris long beforehand, to meet the innovation with sneers and to greet the new music with laughter and hisses. The house was noisy, turbulent, uneasy. Third and fourth rate critics talked in groups. No attention was given except at intervals. Wagner was the Marat of music, a German innovator. The little papers of the capital, unable to touch politics had found matter of joke and caricature for three months back in this Musique de l'avenir. It was judged beforehand and the next Sunday there was a wonderful unanimity in the Paris feuilletons in regard to the ridiculous pretensions "of this dreamer who set himself up before the wittiest and keenest audience in the world as an innovator"—and the unanimity was so unusual in those who spoke first, so perfect that even similar expressions, comparisons, bons-mots a little disguised might easily be discovered trickling through all. It was the small talk of the foyer retailed to the Parisian public. And thus are reputations done and undone.

The merit of the letter preceding the translation of the Opera Poems is that it is adapted to the general reader, musical terms are avoided as much as possible. The general outline of the new system is sketched in as few words as could well have been done. These explanations have been severely criticised. Granting to the opponents that they are perfectly right, the criticism with which Wagner's words of evident conviction were met, seems none the less unfair. It does not touch upon the point at issue. It dwells on minor details. Detached passages and assertions which indeed seem paradoxical are reproduced and exposed to ridicule. To an impartial reader siding with neither party but seeking for information only, the answers of late produced do not deserve a moment of serious attention.

The letter is written in a tone of sincerity that recommends it to the attention of all. The author expresses his sentiments and views in that honest straight-forward way that wins respect of any one who seeks for more than the mere quarrels of art-schools. The very essence of the Italian opera is attacked. Its origin is detailed as also the grand outlines of music in Germany. The author demands a perfect conformity between the music and the dramatic action. They must interpret, complete each other; when words cease to express, music must go beyond, and the words must always be in exact accordance with the feelings called up by the melody. There must be no artificial pauses, no rests. The action must progress as it does in nature, which has caused the opponents to say that Wagner's music was one noisy recitative. In view of this concordance between the two arts, the musician demands the fullest co-operation on the poet. Thus may language, the instrument of abstract ideas act upon the sensibility. Music will be giving to poetry beyond the rhyme and adornings it already possesses, a new element of power. There would be a marriage of both into one work. Each would find in the other that which each alone lacks. And thus would be satisfied in the Opera, that involuntary desire in him that listens to a poem or to a symphony, for something more, something which is neither in the words, nor in the music alone but in both thus combined. The orchestra would then be with the drama in a relation somewhat analogous to the chorus of the Greeks with the tragic action. Only the relation would be much closer, the orchestra being united to the work of the poet by an intimate participation and interpreting it. Such is the theory of Richard Wagner viewed aside from all the means employed by him to attain this end. These means, the chief element of the innovation proposed by him, we are not prepared to discuss, nor does he dwell upon them in the works under notice.

It is to metaphor that he turns in conclusion to characterize the grand melody as he conceives it embracing the whole drama. And above all it is a quiet contemplation he demands on the part of his hearer. When thus listened to, "It must at first produce on the soul an impression like that caused by a beautiful forest at sunset upon him that has just escaped the noises of the town." There must be a perception of silence. When permeated with the feeling of stillness, we seem endowed with a new sense that reveals to us the harmonies of nature, we acquire new modes of perception, the ear is keener. He that is thus prepared to listen to the voices of the words in their infinite variety—"Hears some which he believes never to have heard before;—as their numbers augment so also strongly increases their intensity; they become more sonorous;—as he hears a greater number of distinct voices, he recognizes in these sounds which take a definite character, which swell in his ear and overpower him, the grand the sole melody of the forest; it was the very melody that had produced upon him from the first a religious impression. It is as if in a beautiful night the deep azure of the firmament rivetted his look; the more he abandons himself wholly to the contemplation of this spectacle, the more the starry host appears clear, distinct, scintillating, numberless. This melody will leave in him an eternal re-echoing; but to tell it would be impossible. To hear it again he must return to the forest and return there at sunset. What would be his folly to wish to seize one of the graceful singers of the woods, to have it brought home and teach him a fragment of the grand melody of nature! What could he hear then unless perhaps—some Italian melody?"

We reprint, above, the programme of a concert given here some years ago. We do this to recall to our readers the music and singers which Boston has enjoyed in times gone by. In spite of this, we Bostonians are called on, from time to time, to admire and pay for singers who would scarce be paralleled with those quoted above; and we are thought to be fault-finding, particular, cold, dull, for not going into raptures over them. Look at the many enumerated above in one single concert. Can it be expected that those who have sat delighted to listen to these, are to go into a fever of delight at every soprano, tenor, baritone or bass that chances to come along? And when the public stays away from some entertainments which are not sufficiently attractive, is it necessarily non-musical? Or, if it fails to applaud a second rate performance, is it any reason for the artists to turn up their noses at it altogether? It is well, now and then, to go back and look over our musical antecedents. The fact is, we have heard a great deal of good music here.—Boston Musical Times.

LIEBIG AND HIS CONCERTS, (CONCLUDED).

Berlin, Feb. 23, 1861.

So then—forty-two different Symphonies, fifty-nine Overtures, besides other famous things, in a portion only of the concerts of three months! But it is not only in the quantity of good music which they present, that LIEBIG's programmes are so remarkable. Not only in this cumulative aspect do they challenge attention, but also by the individual and peculiar method of their making up. Liebig has his fancies as a programme maker. He shows his character in it. In the complexion of each programme you detect a certain educational design, partly in allusion to the present moment and its chance opportunities, partly in pursuance of a serial plan or course. There is certainly an idea running through each programme. Thus, much of the time we find him giving the Symphonies of Haydn and Mozart in course, one after another, almost in the order of their numbers; contrasting them continually with Beethoven, as with the highest standard, the consummate flower of the symphonic art; while at the same time, on the other hand, he also contrasts with him the greatest efforts of his followers, Mendelssohn and Schumann, and frequent specimens of what may be called the period of decadence, the Symphonies of various now living or quite new composers. He is catholic as to men and styles, and tries to represent all, and do justice to all claims of any dignity; and this chiefly that his audience may compare and learn, may have a reason for their opinions about great and little, new and old composers. He is also very hospitable to the efforts of newly risen aspirants. He gives one, sometimes two or three hearings to the Symphony or Overture of some young composer, until it may be fairly said to have had its chance with a public which he is doing his best to make appreciative. For example, one week he brought out three concert overtures by an English lady, Miss Maria Moody, who had come over with the scores to Berlin; they were short flights, showed fair musicianship in respect to form, instrumentation, &c. (the fruit of German studies), passed off with a succes d'estime, and were forgotten. Another time he bored his hearers terribly with a new Symphony, by one Fischer, a very weak dilution of Mendelssohn, and an intolerable deal of it; as also with a young Overture that tried to rage like Beethoven, without even matter, not to say method in its madness; but we were at once refreshed and compensated by a touch of the true thing in the fiery Coriolan of Beethoven, and a delicious, genial Symphony of Mozart. The lesson learned was worth the patience.

Of course, too, in these programmes he pays his compliments to the musical magnates here, (for our Liebig is a courteous gentleman, and he, also, has a "Hof" prefixed to his title):—to Taubert especially,—to Vierling,—to Meyerbeer, not too much (be it said to his praise), not so much as to his wronged and greater predecessor, Spontini, whom he (Meyerbeer) supplanted, to the regret and shame now of most musical Berliners. Often the programmes have a reference to other performances, and answer a subsidiary purpose as preparations for, or as reviews upon, what is to be heard elsewhere. If Goethe's "Faust" is produced (as it has been lately in incomparable style) upon the royal stage, Liebig takes care to give us several different Faust overtures, including that by Lindpaintner, used in the theatre, and also at another time, soon after, an orchestral review of the Prince Radzkywill's Faust choruses and melodramatic fragments. If the "Midsummer Night's Dream" is announced at the Schauspielhaus, with Mendelssohn's music, Liebig takes the opportunity to bring the Overture, the Scherzo, &c., into his concerts. If "Egmont" is the play, he treats us with the entire Egmont music of Beethoven,—enough to rob us of all disposition to quarrel with our coffee. When Taubert, with the Royal Orchestra brings out Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the exclusives, that is a signal for the people's kapellmeister to do the same thing for them; while to those who can attend both, it serves for a rehearsal and for deeper acquaintance with the work. Taubert revives a forgotten, interesting antiquity, a pre-Haydnite Symphony, by Emanuel Bach; and Liebig instantly proceeds to play the same repeatedly, until the sound thereof becomes familiar. Again, he does not neglect anniversaries; his programme sometimes reminds us of the birth or death of some great master. Thus on the 27th of January we found a laureled bust in front of the stage, and the selections were entirely from Mozart: Overture to Zauberflöte; Fantasia and Sonata; Overture, Finale to first act, Finale to second act, of Don Juan; Symphony in C, with the Fugue ("Jupiter"). Even if we suppose that in many instances the programme is made up at random; if we look not beyond whim, accident, or the convenience of the moment for the whole secret of his method, still the chances are of finding something interesting, something to one's purpose in the concerts, take them as they come. In most cases, however, he is plainly governed by some principle of selection and association. Let me recall a few examples.

Here is one of the oddest — the "Faust" programme already mentioned:

Overture to "Faust".....Schulz.
Sinfonie in F major.....Dorn.
Overture to "Faust".....Spohr.
Aria from "Stabat mater".....Rossini.
Overture to "Faust".....Lindpaintner.

Sinfonie in E flat (No. 3).....Mozart.

Faust number One, by a young composer, was a clear, respectable performance, not extravagant or overstrained, and not particularly deep. Spohr's shows his usual mastery, and the freshness of his happiest creative period; not so sickly sweet and cloying as much of his music is; but certainly no musical peer for Goethe's poem. Lindpaintner's is the most elaborate and most imposing, with full strength of modern orchestra, all agitato and would-be exciting, as if full of the delirious tumult of the senses and of all wild dreams and insatiable passions; but still no work of genius. This was the one used in the performance of the drama. Dorn's Symphony seemed also full of Hexen-bräueret, "a true witch element;" and you could not help suspecting that Liebig had introduced it from a fancied analogy with that side of "Faust." I know not whether the Dorn here named is the kapellmeister here, Taubert's colleague, and author of the Nibelungen opera, or a young composer in Vienna. Certainly this symphony is one of the most wilfully wild, eccentric extravaganzas that ever reached my sense of tune and rhythm; full of flings of audacious fancy, sometimes for a moment interesting and even beautiful, but just as disappointing and unwholesome as the sweet visions summoned by the witch charms, and as instantly vanishing. He seemed to be catching ideas, or rather conceits, by their tails as they ran away (why not let them go?) and dragging them mercilessly back into his wicked conjuring circle. Sometimes it seemed to me as if the composer had caught the first hint of his Symphony from one of those old Dutch paintings of St. Anthony's temptation. There were many hisses mingled with the applause that followed, and just then — so fatally well-timed, that Mephisto himself must have been invisibly present — a tremendous crash of broken crockery among the coffee tables! Why Rossini's Cujus Animam was put in such company, I was puzzled to conceive. It casts a broad gleam as it goes by. Decidedly the most genial thing of the evening until we Mozart. Had it been placed immediately before that, and after all the "Faust" business, one could have taken it for the "flaming sword," the wall of separation between all this diablerie and the Paradise that followed. For it was like Paradise to get back to Mozart. Such a warm, genial, spontaneous Symphony! Such beautiful, innocent, pure music! the inspiration, as it were, of the child soul, the new created, that walks face to face with the Creator. It was good in Liebig to land us there; it was like returning from long nightmare cruises along Colchian shores, amid Medea sorceries and dragons, and finding oneself safe again beneath sweet Ionian skies, where Beauty has her temples in the isles of Greece. I forgot to mention that we did get a bit of relief after the Dorn Symphony, by the introduction of some of those delightful variations out of Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia." Those are real fancies, and not struggles after fancy. Liebig often gives them for an encore piece.

Here is the programme for Dec. 18th, in the week of the birthdays of Beethoven and of Weber:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....C. M. von Weber.
Sinfonie in C major.....C. M. von Weber.
Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven.
Romanza in F, (violin).....Beethoven.
(Choral Fantasia).....Beethoven.
Overture to "Leonore" (No. 2).....Beethoven.

Sinfonie in C minor.....Beethoven.

Here is another, of the week during which I heard Fidelio, greatest of operas, with the single exception of Don Juan, at the Royal Opera House. It is doubly interesting: first, as affording such a study of Beethoven's working processes, of the manner in which he recast his idea, until it satisfied himself; and, secondly, unfamiliar (now) examples of the elegant and even style of Symphony, as first set by Haydn, and followed, at an humble distance, by composers who neither could, nor cared to, go beyond his depth:

Overture to "Leonore" (No. 1).....Beethoven.
Symphony in E flat.....A. Romberg.

Overture to "Leonore" (No. 2).....Beethoven.
Andante from Symphony.....Abt Vogler.
Overture to "Leonore" (No. 3).....Beethoven.

Symphony No. 13 (C major).....Haydn.

And now look at this one, curiously compounded:

Concert Overture.....Maria Moody.
Marcia alla Turca.....Beethoven.
Symphony in C minor.....Mendelssohn.

"Die Dorfmusikanten," Comic Sextet..Mozart.

Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven.
Symphony No. 10 (C major).....Mozart.

The Moody overture was, as I have hinted, a pretty fair success of woman in male costume; she enacts Symphony about as well as Signorina So and So does Romeo. It consisted of passages passably put together. On the whole not edifying. How all the faces brightened at the magical sounds of Beethoven's Turkish March (out of the "Ruins of Athens" music, the whole of which was played a few evenings before in one of Radcliffe's concerts)! The whole work is worthy of Beethoven's good hours; and this march seems to realize the rhythmic pulse of Oriental life by quite as true an imaginative instinct (to say the least) as that by which Mendelssohn is supposed to have caught the fairy vein of Shakespeare. This dimple of sunshine would enliven some of our murky March and April "Afternoon Rehearsal" concerts in the Boston Music Hall. Mendelssohn's early Symphony does not count among his great ones. Its somewhat slender material is worked out to tedious length, but of course in a right musicianlike manner and with elegance and sweetness. Interesting for once to the musical inquirer. It was once given, I think, in Boston, by the "Germanians." The Sextet (for quartet of strings and two horns), is one of those exquisite drolleries with which Mozart's ever buoyant, childlike nature overflowed in social hours, in moments of rest and reaction from severe work. It is a burlesque on the ambitious attempt of a club of village musicians to do the classical thing, i. e., perform a piece in several movements in Sonata form (original, of course). It is somewhat such a thing in music, as Peter Quince's tragedy of Pyramus and Thisbe, and quite as laughable and enjoyable. Such solemn, formal emptiness! All the forms are in a ludicrous manner kept up, as long and pompous as court ceremonies; but without the shadow of an idea to put into them. The emptiest periods and phrases are repeated, imitated, answered with the utmost gravity; with awful pauses after nothing said — but said emphatically. And such comical blunders! horns in fifths, &c. Attempts to trill in instruments least fitted for it and getting the alternate note a semitone out of the way! In the last movement the double bass leads off with a startling fugue theme (in the lowest depths), and there stops short while another instrument takes it, and so round — and that is a fugue! The best musician could enjoy such fun! The Symphony in C was not the well-known "Jupiter"; if not so great as that, it added to one's stock of Mozart, who left nothing not worth having — although we found the adagio of this a little prolix.

Here is a programme rich in new and old:

Overture to "Titus".....Mozart.
Symphony No. 3 (E flat).....Schumann.

Overture to "Prometheus".....Beethoven.
Scherzo from 9th Symphony.....Beethoven.
Overture to "Iphigenia," with R. Wagner's conclusion.....Gluck.

Symphony No. 16 (E flat).....Haydn.
(Overture to "Coriolan").....Beethoven.

Here is another:

Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini.
"Frühlinglied".....Mendelssohn.
Overture: "Ein Märchen".....R. Wuerst.

Grand Septet.....Beethoven.

Symphony (No. 12) G major.....Mozart.
Overture to "Freischütz".....Weber.

I cite this programme chiefly for the sake of mentioning what a peculiar and enhanced effect the well-known Beethoven Septuor derived from the manner in which it was treated. The first and second violin, and the viola parts were played each by four instruments; and there were four cellos strengthened by two double basses. Of course the clarinet, fagotto and horn were single. This lent a certain largeness and positiveness to these [for Beethoven] somewhat commonplace movements, as they have sometimes seemed, which rendered them again fresh and vigorous. It was like the interest sometimes restored to too familiar objects by a magnifying glass. Wuerst is one of the most gifted of the young composers who reside in Berlin. His overture, which might be called "a fairy legend," impresses me, after repeated hearings, as one of the happiest things in that vein since Mendelssohn. I shall perhaps some time speak of a very successful Quartet by him. The Frühlingslied of Mendelssohn, here named, is the well-known Song without Words. It cannot possibly sound so well for orchestra, as in its original piano form; and Liebig takes it altogether too slow. Still it is one of his popular make-weights, which he throws in very often.

And how does Liebig's Orchestra play? Not so well as the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig; but I may safely say, upon the average quite as well, and often better than our Symphony orchestra in Boston. Bear in mind that it is about fifty instruments strong; that they are kept in continual play together the whole year round; and that they are found good enough to do all the accompanying here in oratorio, in concerts of the Bach-verein, of the Sing-Akademie, of Radecke's series, &c. Naturally they fall more or less into a certain hacknied routine way. They play too often, to take enthusiasm always at the flood tide. But they also have their lucky moments; and I have once heard the C minor Symphony played better by them, than I ever heard it, except in the Gewandhaus. The instruments all have good sounds, especially the oboe and bassoon; and the general sound of the orchestra is rich and fine.

It is not to be denied that there are some drawbacks to the pleasure and convenience of these tone-feasts of the bountiful Liebig. In three, at least, of his four locales, you have to go very early to secure a seat. You had better take a book with you, if you have got eyes. An individual comes an hour beforehand—a solitary woman of a family, or of a knot of cronies—and turns down all the chairs around the table where she sits, perhaps several tables; and this sign of first discovery and possession is scrupulously respected by all after-comers; attempt to seat yourself in one after another of fifty places which appear vacant, and you are politely informed that it is besetzt—kept by the one who has come in reserve for the friend who will come, or some chance friend who may come. There is more or less of jar and disturbance, too, from the rattle of coffee cups, and beer seidels, and small change; since, of course, the kellners must do all the business they can for the proprietor and keeper of the house. Yet it is wonderful how quietly all this goes on; it only needs the pervading instinct of musical good manners; and that comes with such love of music as you see here. You have only to "hush," and the offenders are as still as mice.

The worst annoyance, probably, at least to many, is the bad cigar smoke. Fond as you are of Symphonies, you may not be partial to smoked symphonies. Especially should it chance to be the Ninth Symphony, as it was once my experience, when the crowd drove me into the gallery, where the smokers fancy themselves sheltered, above notice and above decency. Abstinence from "the weed," however, is commonly requested on the programmes, and with considerable, sometimes complete, effect; it is like the caprices of the weather; there are smoky and there are clear days; you cannot forestall them. But it is not possible wholly to suppress the nuisance in a free and easy German audience,—especially where it is made up in large part of students, saucy and proud of their duelling scars; for German students, it is well known, as a general rule, are anything but models of refinement.

Can we have Liebig concerts in our American cities? Can we change our whole way of life? D.

NOTE.—Our readers are desired to make the following corrections in the new series of Editorial Correspondence.

In the Christmas Letter (No. III.), Haupt is called the pupil of Mendelssohn. I wrote "pupil, with Mendelssohn, of Zelter." Again, middle of next column, for "pejor" read helmet.

In Letter No. IV., within the first down line, for "passive opportunity" read passing; strike out "long" before "excursions"; for "choice" read "chosen temples."

For "talk a walk" (!) read take.

For "talented (!) husband's genius," read lamented.

In Letter No. V. (Journal of Feb. 9), 3d column, 4th line, for "musical inquiries," read inquiries. Middle of 4th column, "the men on the other, less in the royal box," &c., put a full stop after "other," and commence new sentence, "Up in the royal box," &c. Top of next column, "the initiation, through the trial and sacrifice of two young souls," &c. read, "the initiation, through trial and sacrifice, of two young souls." 43d line, "so admirable in a male chorus," strike out "in." Six lines from end of letter, for "purity and style," read "of style." "Sing, sing," too, is a case where the half is better than the whole.

Letter VI. Third column, for "Lathie," read Lethe. 4th column, for "the best movement," read last. For "these variations," those. For "Eusebius, Master Rare," Eusebius, Meister Rare. Bottom of the same column, for "representations," read representatives; and (horrible divine), "our hero of the victim" should be "of the violin." 11th line, last column, "led in triumph," should be "led in triumph."

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 9.—All the concerts which have not taken place during the winter, are being crowded together into these last five or six weeks of the season. Every week brings two or three, and those for the most part good ones. But unfortunately the greatest musical attractions bring nothing but small audiences, and one can only wonder that so many artists have the courage to get up any thing of the kind. On Thursday Satter gave a matinée in aid of the German Hospital Fund which is being raised. The audience was entirely different from that generally present at these concerts, and consisted almost exclusively of German ladies. Mr. Satter produced some new gems from the inexhaustible store of his repertoire, in the shape of a Marche Triomphale for two pianos, by himself, Liszt's stupendous arrangement of the Fifth Symphony, and the Overture of Oberon. In the last two pieces, he exhibited even more marvellous powers of execution than usual. The Marche Triomphale, in which Mr. Pattison took the second piano, is exceedingly spirited. Improvisation concluded the concert, in which airs from Martha, Freyschütz, Don Giovanni, Tannhäuser, &c., seven in all, were brought up successively and interwoven with each other in a very skilful manner. Mr. Satter was assisted by Miss Rowcroft, a singer of considerable ability, but not very agreeable voice, and Mr. Appy the violinist, who played a fantasia on Massaniello. He has much energy and vigor of stroke but very little softness and sweetness. The latter deficiency may however have been owing partly to his instrument, which was very harsh.

On Saturday night a concert was given by Mr. Bruno Wollenhaupt, the young violinist who made so successful debut at a Philharmonic concert a year or two ago. He has but once since appeared in public, at a soirée of Mme. Abel's last season. He is too excellent a player to have lain perdu so long, and more than one music-lover heartily welcomed this occasion of hearing him once more. The programme was a very fine one, but had several faults aside from the character of the music. In the first place it was too long, then it contained too many solos, and finally Beethoven's second Symphony, which was beautifully played by a small orchestra, was put at the very end, when the listeners were wearied, and their powers of enjoyment and attention weakened by all that had come before. The orchestra played besides, the Overture to Oberon, and Sig. Centemeri sang arias from Attila and Le Pardon de Plöermel; his fine baritone showing to best advantage. Mr. Wollenhaupt played four times, and proved himself equally excellent in various styles of composition. His first piece was the Violin-Concerto of Vieuxtemps, to which he did full justice. Then he gave us an arrangement of Hungarian airs, by Ernst, and subsequently a Fantasia on "Les Hirondelles," by David, composed by himself. This is a work of much merit, and very pleasing and interesting. He was encored, and played a short fantasia on Home, Sweet Home. Mr. Wollenhaupt combines all the requisites of a first-rate player. He has force and vigor, but at the same time great delicacy and purity of power, he has also great mechanical skill, but more than all these a degree of fire and feeling in his playing, that proves how his whole soul is wrapped up in his art. May he soon give us an opportunity of strengthening this impression.

A concert was given last evening at Irving Hall, (fast becoming a favorite locality for such entertainments) for the benefit of the same German Hospital Fund for which Satter gave his last matinée. It was arranged chiefly by the Ladies Union which has been organized for this object, and was hardly made known among the American public, being advertised only in the German papers. This was not the wisest course. The programme was so good that many who might not have been induced to attend by the specially German object would have been attracted by it, and the room might have been much fuller. You will see that the programme, in regard to quality, was almost unexceptionable, but it had again the too frequent fault of extreme length, so that but few listeners must have been at the end.

The performances were very satisfactory throughout, and showed in their spirit that they were given for a national object. It was quite interesting to compare the three vocal societies, the three best in the city. The Teutonia made its first public appearance if I am not mistaken, and did great credit not only to themselves but chiefly to their leader, Mr. Mosenthal, who has only had them in training during the past winter. The members are rough, unpolished mechanics, but they have fine fresh voices, know how to manage them, and sing with accuracy and precision, as well as with much nicety of shading and a great deal of expression. —t—

GETTYSBURG, PA., APRIL 8, 1861.—Mr. Editor. Of course you are interested whenever people are stirred about the "art divine." For this reason your Journal must have an account of a musical occasion unusual in this part of the world. Concerts do not often occur here. The town is small, and out of the way, and traveling companies do not think of going so far round the corner. But there is in the place a large circle of sincere admirers of sweet sounds, and the presence of a college and theological seminary tends to elevate taste and refinement. A traveling company did not come, but a concert was started by an amateur orchestra, "The Quaver Club," composed of students and other young men. Where professional orchestras are wanting, amateur societies can be very useful in beginning the work of musical cultivation. To the orchestra was added a good strong chorus, formed by selections from different choirs. Thus equipped, "Mozart's Gloria," an Anthem by Zundel, and "Sail, Sail," from Lurline were put under rehearsal. These with solos and orchestral pieces made out a miscellaneous programme. The performance took place April 4th. Of course it was not a rendering from professional hands, nevertheless it was very creditable.

One benefit is certain to follow,—an increased interest in musical study among the college students here,—a study refining and elevating, and at the same time as effective mental discipline as any Latin, Greek or Mathematics.

But I must not forget the principal feature,—the part of the performance which was professional. Mrs. Mozart from New York was present. There is no need of telling; you know of her abilities. The auditors hardly knew what to do with themselves after her clear tones and charming execution. First came a silence from pure wonder, then unbounded enthusiasm. The lady sang very prettily Comer's "Song of the Lark," and very skillfully the Cavatina from "Beatrice." The "Last Rose of Summer" was on the programme; "Home, Sweet Home" and "Comin' thro' the Rye" were given on encores. Mrs. M. is successful in oratorio; last Christmas your correspondent heard her perform admirably the soprano of the Messiah at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia; but she is particularly successful in simple ballads, perhaps as much so as any who attempt them. Her natural grace and temperament give the assistance by means of which these melodies become so touching. The people were delighted too to find her more than an artist, a finished lady. Her amiability won the affections of all.

The whole performance pleased so much that a repetition was called for. A new programme was made out, and a second concert given the following night.

NEW YORK, APRIL 15, 1861.—We have had one week of opera by the associated artists, alternating between this city and Brooklyn. Un Ballo, Son-nambula, La Juive, Linda and Moses in Egypt have been given, with fair success. The last opera was performed as an oratorio on Saturday night and horribly mutilated. Such a poor performance has not been heard here recently. Stigelli was the only singer who appeared to advantage. Miss Hinckley did not sing the part of Anaïde near as well as Adelina Patti. The company have now gone to Philadelphia.

There are any number of concerts announced for this week, but the political excitement, rendering people indisposed for quiet enjoyment will seriously interfere with their pecuniary success. The Mendelssohn Union has given a fair performance of Wallace's "Lurline" to invited guests and will next perform it at a public concert. They will then rehearse "Moses in Egypt."

There have been this month more changes in church choirs than were ever known before at any one time. An amusing circumstance which has been goSSIPed about considerably is the recent squabble between C. Jerome Hopkins and the pastor of the Church of the Incarnation. The quarrel hinged on the question as to who should select the tunes. Hopkins as the organist maintained his right to do so but the rector thought his rights paramount, and ludicrous blunders in the selections not unfrequently occurred. War ensued and Hopkins relieved himself by a documentary protest as long as the moral law but vastly more original and amusing.

Father Heinrich is in this city in a state of poverty but not without friends. A brief sketch of his career I have gathered from his own lips. He was born in Schönlinde, in Bohemia, (Austria), on the 11th of March, 1781. He was educated for a mercantile life, and became the principal in a very extensive banking house, the branches of which were established in Prague, Vienna, Trieste and Naples. From early youth, Mr. Heinrich was of an adventurous spirit, which immense wealth enabled him to gratify at will.

His very extended commercial business, frequently made it necessary for him to travel, and on one occasion he visited the island of Malta, where the passion for music seemed first to have taken decided possession of his soul; there he obtained a Cremona violin, to which he became ardently attached; this instrument lasted through all his wanderings and strange vicissitudes, until its accidental destruction by the carelessness of a musician of the Drury Lane Orchestra.

For long, long years this violin and maestro were inseparable friends, being together day and night, in the western wilds of America, and in the crowded cities of both [Hemispheres]. Father Heinrich has crossed and re-crossed the Atlantic many times; his biographer tells us, that he sailed from Lisbon for this country, in 1805, and that it was when he was Director of music, at the Southwark theatre of Philadelphia, he received the sad news of the failure of his Banking house and its branches. He soon left Philadelphia for Pittsburg, crossing the Alleghenies on foot, and finally settled in a log cabin in Bardstown, Kentucky, where he began writing music; he was about this period about thirty years old, and he attributes some of his best compositions, to his study of Nature in those then solitary wilds. The log-hut is still most carefully preserved, and is pointed out to all visitors, with great interest, by the family of the late Postmaster General, in whose garden it now stands.

Having satisfactorily overcome the shock of his loss and his necessary change of position in the financial world, Mr. Heinrich proceeded to London, where he remained five or six years, officiating among the leading violinists of the orchestras of Drury Lane and Covent Garden, and publishing many of his compositions, which made him widely known in that metropolis.

Subsequently he returned to America, dividing his time between this city, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore, in the prosecution of his profession, sometimes leading, at others performing in the Orchestras.

Father Heinrich has composed over one hundred works, comprising Oratorios, Symphonies, Overtures, concerted pieces and songs, many of which are distinguished for great originality, varied expression, patriotic sentiment, as well as for the curiously constructed stories which adorn their title pages.

There are many who remember his mammoth concerts given here in years gone by, which drew together the musical profession, from the principal cities of the Union, and enlisted public interest.

In 1857, Mr. Heinrich made his last trip to Europe, he then had the happiness to hear some of his best works, performed by the societies of Prague and Vienna. In 1860 he returned to his adopted country (the United States), and till the present time has quietly lived in this city, where this octogenarian and probably the oldest musician living, is now fast fading away. His life has been one of the most varied conditions, begun in opulence, with hosts of friends to cheer him and partake of his rare hospitality, full of youth, vigor and hope, now the picture has changed, and he truly needs the sympathy and respect of the world.

A New Instrument.

IMPORTANT TO ORGANISTS AND COMPOSERS.

UNITED STATES HOTEL, Lake George, N. Y., }
APRIL 8, 1861.

Mr. Editor:—Some time ago, I was in quest of a Pedal-Pianoforte suitable for organ practice; and was advised to import one. The instrument was delivered to me last autumn, in perfect order, having been cleverly packed in an air-tight box, inlaid with zinc. It is in the cabinet or boudoir form, has seven octaves in the manual, and over two octaves of pedals. To each key of the fingerboard, there are three strings; excepting in the extreme base octave, which has two. To the pedals, there are three, two and one strings respectively according to a judicious distribution of tone. The pedal strings, which are in rear, extend lengthwise with the piano, and of course are tuned in unison with those of the manual. The entire action is perfect, the pedals responding at once to the touch; and when the lids are raised before and behind, the tones are nearly as powerful and as clear, as are those of the largest grand action pianoforte. For chamber music, it is sufficiently loud with the lids closed. The pedals may be easily detached, but in order to play them, the piano has a regular organ-bench, that spans them, and that extends as far as the key-board. This is so constructed that it may be taken to pieces, and packed alongside of the piano if necessary for transportation. The case has a rose-wood veneering, and prevents the appearance of an ordinary Boudoir Piano, except that it is a little deeper. It is of great beauty, and would be an ornament to any salon; actually occupying less space than a common piano, being easier tuned, from the position of the sound boards, as well as more readily removed upon occasion. It is in fact two in one, a foot and a hand piano; the two separate actions being placed in the closest possible juxtaposition. With this, an organist can execute a fugue of Bach or Handel with the same facility, as upon a first-class organ, and thoroughly prepare himself for the choir, or the concert-room.

Yours truly,

H.

P. S. The following are the proximate dimensions:

	Feet.	Inches.
Height.....	5
Depth, (exclusive of key-board) . .	1	8½
Width.....	4	4½

Pedals 2 octaves, key-board, 7 octaves. Price in Berlin, 375 Prussian Thalers, (reckon about 75 cents to a Thaler).

These instruments called "PIANO-PEDALS," are manufactured by Julius Hellmünd 40 Potsdamer Strausse Berlin, at the above price and will be sent to any desired address in the United States.

NEW YORK, APRIL 16th.—Mr. Satter's Sixth and last matinée, which took place last Friday, was very poorly attended. The programme was not quite as interesting as usual, as, for the first time in any of these matinées three out of the six pieces played were not new. These were the overture to Tannhäuser, Liszt's arrangement of Sextuor from Lucia, and Mr. Satter's fantasie on Don Pasquale. Besides these, Mr. Satter gave us the waltz in A flat by Chopin, and two entire novelties in the shape a Prelude and Fugue (No. 5, in G) by Rubinstein, and Variations on a theme of Schumann, by Brahms. Both were exceedingly difficult, and most original. The first was peculiar in respect to the subjects of the fugue being much more melodious than is generally the case and which had a very fine effect. The latter was totally different from any other variations, and sometimes rather far-fetched both in rhyme and harmony. Mr. Satter played both pieces splendidly.

Next Saturday we have the Philharmonic, the last of the season, and on Thursday the third of the Arion concerts. Gottschalk announces a series of concerts in conjunction with Carlotta Patti and minor stars are constantly appearing only to vanish again forever.

When one considers how little is made by most of these concerts, which are, indeed, more frequent by losing affairs, it is surprising that musicians can still venture upon such undertakings. However, we music lovers are all the more obliged to them.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE MUSIC TO MACBETH.—It is about time there should be new music written to Shakespear's "Macbeth." The music now allied with it and which has become hallowed by long use, was no doubt considered proper and attractive by the good people who first heard it, a long time ago, but to our modern ears it utterly fails to convey the idea of anything that has any connection with what happens on the stage. This operatic part of the performance of "Macbeth," in which girls of the chorus are made to sing dry solos to a fugued accompaniment, of a generally inefficient orchestra, inwardly trembling all the time lest they or the orchestra should lose the thin thread of melody, until the chorus chimes in with a strain which would be just as appropriate at any old English merry-making, and winds up with an echo behind the scenes, to catch the applause of the galleries, is to musical persons very annoying, to say the least. A song is a very good thing in the right place, but a sad bore in an improper one. Good actors may be, and are very often, poor singers. If we are to have music, let it be melo-dramatic. Why does not somebody try to reform this evil?

5. Finale, "Eine Sommernacht in Denmark".....Lumbye

DR. GUILMETTE, well known to our concert goers as an accomplished vocalist, and public singer, especially in oratorio, proposes to deliver lectures here upon the human voice. His advertisement in another column gives some particulars of his lectures, which we have no doubt will be very useful and interesting, as his experience is the double one of a professional man and of an artist.

Mrs. CHARLOTTE VARIAN, whom some of our readers heard a few weeks ago at the Music Hall, at one of the afternoon concerts, announces a concert at Chickering's, for Friday next, assisted by Mr. Simpson (tenor) and Mr. E. Hoffman, pianist.

"THE MUSIC OF THE UNION."—This it is which today echoes through the city of our usually peaceful streets; to this every heart beats and every foot keeps step, while with one voice all agree to uphold the honor of the flag that floats everywhere before our eyes. The occupations and the places devoted to Art even are freely offered to the service of the Union.

The Evening Transcript tells us that "the free use of the Music Hall has been offered by the Directors to the Commonwealth as a dormitory and place of rendezvous for the troops during their temporary stay in this city. The provisions made for their comfort and accommodation by the city were of so ample a nature, that the offer was courteously declined by the Governor, who remarked that he should regret, except in case of extreme urgency thus to disturb or disarrange that building."

ORPHEUS MUSICAL SOCIETY.—Our readers will notice the advertisement of the Concert of this Society this evening and of the repetition of the Bards on next Saturday.

TO MAKE A LIBRETTO.—The modern poet should completely abstain from reading the ancient writers, for this reason that the ancient never read the moderns. Before entering upon his task he will take an exact note of the quantity and quality of the scenes which the manager is desirous of introducing into his drama. He will compose his poem verse by verse, without giving himself any trouble as to the action, in order that it may be impossible for the spectator to comprehend the plot, and that curiosity may thus be kept alive to the end of the piece. By the way, he will not forget to close the piece with a brilliant and magnificent scene, terminating with a good chorus in honor of the sun, the moon, or manager. He will have recourse as frequently as possible to the dagger, to poison, to earthquakes, spectres, and incantations. All these expedients are admirable; they cost but little, and produce a prodigious effect on the public.

"Never bore people with ugly music merely because it is the work of some favorite composer; and do not let the pieces you perform before people not professionally scientific, be too long.—Grove's Musical Lacon."

MUSIC.—CHARLES READE, in a noble defence of Music, says: "Music was the nursing mother of Poetry, the highest of all arts. The verse did not create itself; it arose in all its primitive forms out of musical division. For centuries after its birth, Poetry could not walk alone, either in the East or in the West. Those incomparable lyrics which are called the 'Psalms of David,' where description and moral teaching, piety and nature, earth and heaven, blend so sweetly, were songs, composed in happy moments of musical as well as poetic heart, by David and many other harpers; and but for music, these gems of poetry and praise had never embellished language. And it is not too much to say, that here alone, where Poetry and Music meet, is the spirit of the Old Testament as manifestly and constantly Divine as that of the New. Many forgotten harpers sang before Homer, and to their divisions we owe the majestic Hexameter. Homer, like his own Achilles, was a harper.

"The Iliad was sung or chanted, and where the same words are repeated, there was a sort of refrain with a more marked melody. But for Music, then, the greatest Poem would never have been created; but for Music again might well have slipped off the memory of the hearers.

"Poetry came West at Music's apron string. The Arabs who brought it into Europe were songsters. The Spanish troubadours who caught it from them were songsters; so were the French trouvères, who had it from them; so the Dutch minstrels, and the Irish and Welsh bards.

"For centuries Poetry could not walk alone nor please by its own rhythm. And even that rhythm it owes to primæval Music.

"This is but a small part of the debt mankind owe to this art, now outlawed by a caprice of demi-civilization. That debt is hundreds and thousands of years older than any claim Painting can put in to our gratitude. Why pick our old benefactor out from among a hundred pettier arts, to outlaw her? Her modern feats, are they so very contemptible? The brilliant operas, the mighty oratorios, the learned quintets, the profound symphonies, the pious masses and anthems, where the boy's sweet, mellow voices rise so young and pure above the pealing organ, and waft the same to Heaven; the thrilling songs that nations take to heart, and love, and sing, and feel for centuries; are all these trash?

"Music is an universal language. Unlike the writers, the composer's text can be printed or played by all the human race, pure as it came from the master's mind. God has given the lovely art this worldwide advantage over the writers, to compensate its inferiorities, a noble compensation. For thus Music mitigates the curse of Babel, a terrible curse to man."

LONDON.—MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The concert of last night, March 19, devoted, like many others given during the present season, to the works of Beethoven, was attended most numerous, the more expensive places being occupied by company belonging to the highest classes of society. The programme included, amongst other masterpieces, Beethoven's great pianoforte sonata in A major, Op. 101, played on this occasion for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts by Miss Arabella Goddard, who, judging by her performance of this and other sonatas of Beethoven's so-called "third period" (need we remind our readers of her triumphant successes with the 106, 109, and 111?) seems to have discovered the clue which can alone direct the executant through the new world of sound which the mighty Ton-Dichter created, and to have penetrated the interest of these golden mists, "dark from excessive light," which enshroud, like a sunny haze, the inspirations of the poet "hidden in the light of thought." For Miss Arabella Goddard, Beethoven, the most inventive and imaginative of musicians, has no secrets. She knows him by heart; and, what is more, can put her heart into her fingers, and thus render him intelligible and delightful even to the ears of a mixed audience, such as that of the Monday Popular Concerts, which (such is the gradation of the admittance fees) included nearly every class of the community. Never did the great English pianist, who so chivalrously plays superb works in public which no other pianist can, or at any rate does attempt to, except perhaps for the delectation of the "select few" who may patronise a quasi private chamber-concert—never did the "reine et le roi aussi" of the most fashionable instruments distinguish herself more honorably than on this occasion. The exquisitely beautiful love-song with which the sonata commences, the vigorous march movement so utterly unlike any other march composed before or since, and the sterlingly brilliant finale, with its charmingly capricious humor and fugue, ingeniously wrought as it is difficult to execute, were one and all played to perfection. A few more such performances cannot fail to work what many consider a kind of artistic miracle—that is, to render Beethoven's sonata in A major, Op. 101, generally popular.—Morning Post

MADAME ROSA CZILLAG.—This eminent artist has arrived in London, to fulfil her engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. The Viennese papers speak of her last appearance at the Kärntnerthor Theatre, in Trovatore, on Saturday last as a remarkable scene of public excitement and expression of regret at the departure of such a favorite. On this occasion it would appear that all "rules and regulations" were set at defiance, contrary to the laws of the Imperial Theatres, which forbid any artist "de réparer après la fin du spectacle sous quelque prétexte que ce soit, et surtout d'adresser la parole au public." (Art. XIX.) Mad. Czillag was recalled innumerable times after the opera, and in a short speech, almost inaudible from her emotion, bade farewell to an audience before whom she made her first appearance on any stage, about ten years ago, and since which her name has always been the most attractive of the artists forming the Opera Company at the Kärntnerthor Theatre.—Mus. World.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—Saturday, March 16, would have been the last night of the season, but that the theatre was closed that night, peremptorily, by order of the Lord Chamberlain, in consequence of a recent bereavement in the Royal Family. That all places of public amusement should be closed on certain occasions, where the feelings of the highest personage of the realm are deeply involved, we think can hardly be gainsaid; nevertheless, we think the hardship involved so great, the grievance so universal that Government should be called upon to make some compensation. On Saturday night so great was the demand for tickets at the two English Opera houses, that many could not be supplied. Here was a wind-fall for the managers after a season characterized by no brilliant success. But at the eleventh hour comes the authoritative firman—the theatre is shut up—the public is disappointed—the managers lose hundreds—the servants of the establishment are mulcted of a day's pay (how little some are able to afford it, need we aver)—and no one person benefitted thereby. This is the way to go in mourning indeed; but we cannot help feeling it would be more agreeable to reason and good policy to allow everybody to purchase his own crape and wear it after his own fashion. It certainly was most unfortunate, as far as the two theatres were concerned, that the royal death should have occurred the day it did. The managers, however, had nothing to do but to bear it and make no sign.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The order which prohibited the opening of the theatres in London on Saturday evening, in consequence of the death of the Duchess of Kent, did not extend to the Palace at Norwood, for the Saturday concert took place as usual. The feature of the programme was a pianoforte concert by Mr. Henry Baumer, a King's Scholar of the Royal Academy, a selection from an oratorio of whom occasionally is performed at the Crystal Palace orchestral concerts. A composer naturally takes all possible pains with the performance of his own work, but the firm, clear, and decided pianoforte playing of Mr. Baumer should not be passed over without a word of acknowledgement. The pièce de résistance of the concert was Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor. With many gleams of the poetic beauty which is never totally absent in Schumann, the fourth symphony is less satisfactory than the first—in B flat—which Mendelssohn is said to have highly esteemed, and the performance of which he once conducted. Mendelssohn's glorious violin concerto was played in masterly style by M. Sainanton, whose unaffected expression—untainted as it is by the slightest tinge of exaggeration—makes us listen to his performance with a pleasure more completely unalloyed than that excited by many more celebrated virtuosi. M. Sainanton also played his own Rigoletto fantasia, which is always well received, because the charming melodies are allowed to tell their tale in all their original simplicity. The fresh voice of Miss Emily Spiller, a débutante, gained her an encore in Schloesser's "Queen of the Sea;" and she also sang the scena, "Ah! forse è lui." Madame Sainanton-Dolby showed such good taste in selecting Haydn's lovely "Spirit-song," that we were surprised at her choosing "The skipper and his boy," the absurdity of which even fine singing can never conceal. The orchestra, under Mr. Mann's direction, performed with great care, although want of sufficient rehearsal was at times perceptible. The number of visitors amounted to 2,966.

Paris.

TANNHAUSER.—"A second trial has come off, far from being more successful than the first. On the contrary, the public disapprobation was manifested with increased energy, and we do not recollect such another evening in the arena, ordinary so calm and serene, of our Grand Opera. We coveted a decisive judgment, and begged the judges to preserve a grave demeanor; but advice of this kind is easier to give than take. True that we can manage to dispense with hissing; but to avoid laughing is another affair; and, on the very first night, we involuntarily yielded more than once to the feeling which had irresistibly laid hold of the entire audience. On the second night precautions had been taken to guard against such inconvenient manifestations. The ohoe solo after the 'Herdsmen's song,' the redoubtable trait de violons, the pack of hounds, at the end of Act I., and the re-appearance of Venus in the third were one, and all suppressed. Curtailments, too, had been effected in various places, and the rose gauze curtain (so decorously shutting out a logical but undramatic contingency) sent back to the property-room. But, alas! nothing could save Tannhäuser. This time there was less laughter, perhaps, but a great deal more hissing; and for a plain reason—the applauders (claque!) being numerous, the vigor of the disapprobation was regulated by that of the approval.

We have been assured, nevertheless, that Richard Wagner continues obstinate, attributes the check he has received in Paris to a cabal organized against him by his enemies. In his double capacity of poet and composer, the author of Tannhäuser, is, doubtless, furnished with a double dose of pride, and should, therefore, perhaps be accorded a double amount of indulgence. This last we willingly extend—nay, we can even pity him, for we know of nothing more sad and hopeless than the fatuity, too common now-a-days, which induces authors to contemplate and admire themselves in their works, and to pronounce in a tone of sovereign authority, without the slightest deference to public opinion, that those works are good. Et vidit quod esset bonum.

The second performance of Tannhäuser merely served to bring out in still bolder relief the talent and courage of the singers, who had to answer in person for the sins of the composer. The tenor, M. Niemann, especially distinguished himself in this painful struggle, and the audience took care to make him understand his reputation was not at stake. Mads. Tedesco and Marie Sax, MM. Morelli, Cazeaux, Coulon, and the rest, equally deserved protection from the storm of disapprobation, which even the august presence of their majesties, the emperor and empress, was powerless to allay.—Revue et Gazette Musicale de Paris, March 24.

On Sunday the Tannhäuser was played for the third and last time. The theatre was crowded, the receipts reaching 10,000 francs. The performance was the stormiest of all. Never was there such an uproar in the Opera House. The spectators were provided with whistles, and the whistling was heard in cadences and roulades. Wagner is certainly the first composer ever hissed by the aristocratic public of the Grand Opera. The proscenium box, situated above the Emperor's was filled with hisses in straw-colored kids. The few partisans of Wagner and his music tried to defend him. In the midst of the tumult I heard the cry "Hiss, but hear." They hissed but it was impossible to hear. The storm raged not only in the theatre, but the foyer was also excited; the hubbub resembled the roar of the sea, or the clamor of the Bourse on a settling day. Nevertheless the opera, betrayed by its own interpreters, was carried on to the end.

A burlesque of the Tannhäuser, called "Ya Mein-herr," by MM. Delacour and Lambert-Thiboust, is about to be produced at the Varieties Theatre.

At the close of the third performance of Tannhäuser, Mr. Wagner wrote the following letter to the Director of the Opera:

"Sir—The opposition that is shown to the Tannhäuser proves to me how right you were when, at the beginning of this business, you made some remarks about the absence of the ballet and other scenic conventionalities, to which the subscribers of the Opera are accustomed. I regret that the nature of my work has prevented me from conforming to those exigencies. Now that the violence of the opposition does not even allow those who wish to hear it to give the attention necessary to appreciate it, I have no other honorable course to take than to withdraw it. I beg you to make known this decision to his excellency the Minister of State. Very respectfully,

RICHARD WAGNER.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

O give me back my childhood's dreams. Ballad.

S. Glover. 25

A pretty song, more especially recommended to young singers.

Weep not fond heart. Song.

Kücken. 25

This new song of the popular German composer is a real gem. Everybody who recalls the deeply touching strains of his "Good night, farewell" or "The Jewish maiden" will know what he has to expect. Written for a Mezzo Soprano or Baritone voice.

Come ferry me o'er.

Mrs. Groom. 25

Companion to a noted song of the same authoress, "Over the sea, a Jacobite song."

Flores mariani, a collection of Catholic music, by

Wiesel, complete. 1.00

Ave Maria. Trio for female voices.

50

O vos omnes. Motet for mixed voices.

25

Sub tuum praesidium. Quartet.

50

These pieces make capital offertories. Organists will find them of great practical usefulness as well as sterling compositions, which will wear well with singers and hearers.

Matin Song.

Heurion. 25

A popular French song, with the original words added. A pleasing effect in imitation of bells is introduced in the accompaniment.

Instrumental Music.

Un ballo in maschera.

F. Beyer. 25

A fascinating arrangement for young players, containing most of the gems, recognised as such here. It makes a good piece for instruction, also, as the melodies are easily caught up by the ear, and thus make study easy.

Dixie's Land. Arranged for a Brass Band.

D. C. Hall. 1.00

Bands who are not yet in the possession of a good arrangement of this familiar air should at once get a copy. It is conveniently printed on stiff cards and suits any number of instruments from 8 to 14.

No plus Ultra Polka Quadrille.

J. S. Knight. 35

The Polka Quadrille has of late become so fashionable that the very few which are printed with figures do not satisfy the demand. Both music and figures of this Quadrille have the unqualified endorsement of a number of "belles and beaux" in this metropolis, who have often tried it and found it really as plus ultra.

Books.

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE VIOLIN. 50

WINNER'S PERFECT GUIDE FOR THE GUITAR. 50

These volumes are the first of a new series of attractive low priced books of instruction and music; for all kinds of musical instruments. They are exceedingly neat in typography, the types being clear and distinct and the paper and printing unexceptionable. The contents are of a popular kind, comprising excellent Instructions, and a very choice collection of the best music of the day.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Great Bell Roland.

[Motley relates that the famous bell Roland of Ghent was an object of great affection to the people, because it always rang to arm them when liberty was in danger.—N. Y. Evening Post.]

BY THEODORE TILTON.

I.

Toll! Roland, toll!
—High in St. Bavon's tower
At midnight hour
The great bell Roland spoke:
And all who slept in Ghent awoke:
—What meant its iron stroke?
Why caught each man his blade?
Why the hot haste he made?
Why echoed every street
With tramp of thronging feet—
All flying to the city's walls?
It was the call
Known well to all
That Freedom stood in peril of some foe:
And even timid hearts grew bold
Whenever Roland toll'd,
And every hand a sword could hold:—
For men
Were patriots then,
Three hundred years ago!

II.

Toll! Roland, toll!
Bell never yet was hung
Between whose lips there swung
So true and brave a tongue!
—If men be patriots still,
At thy first sound
True hearts will bound,
Great souls will thrill—
Then toll! and wake the test
In each man's breast,
And let him stand confess'd!

III.

Toll! Roland, toll!
—Not in St. Bavon's tower
At midnight hour—
Nor by the Scheldt, nor far off Zuyder Zee,
But here—this side the sea!—
And here in broad bright day!
Toll! Roland, toll!
For not by night awaits
A brave foe at the gates,
But treason stalks abroad—inside!—at noon!
Toll! Thy alarm is not too soon!
To Arms! Ring out the Leader's call!
Re-echo it from East to West
Till every dauntless breast
Swell beneath plume and crest!
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till swords from scabbards leap!
Toll! Roland, toll!
—What tears can widows weep
Less bitter than when brave men fall?
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till cottager from cottage wall
Snatch pouch and powder-horn and gun—
The heritage of sire to son
Ere half of Freedom's work was done!
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till son, in memory of his sire,
Once more shall load and fire!
Toll! Roland, toll!
Till volunteers find out the art
Of aiming at a traitor's heart!

IV.

Toll! Roland, toll!
—St. Bavon's stately tower
Stands to this hour,—
And by its side stands Freedom yet in Ghent
For when the bells now ring,
Men shout "God save the King!"
Until the air is rent!
—Amen!—So let it be:
For a true King is he Who keeps his people free.
Toll! Roland, toll!
This side the sea!
No longer they but we
Have now such need of thee!
Toll! Roland, toll!
And let thy iron throat
Ring out its warning note
Till Freedom's perils be outbraved,
And Freedom's flag, wherever waves,
Shall overshadow none enslaved!
Toll! till from either ocean's strand
Brave men shall grasp each other's hand
And shout, "God save our native land!"
—And love the land which God hath saved!
Toll! Roland, toll!

COMIC OPERA.

1800—1830.

We have before remarked that literature and the fine arts always reflect the general ideas current at any given point of time in the civilization of a people. We find a new proof of this remark in the rapid notice which we are to give in this paper of the lives and musical characteristics of the six composers, Dalayrac, Mehul, Berton, Catel, Nicolo and Boieldieu.

Dalayrac was born at Muret, in Languedoc, June 13, 1753. From his infancy, a taste, amounting to a passion, drew him to music in spite of his father, who intended him for the bar. The young composer, preferring art to the Digests, used to spend his evenings in the garret of the house where he could practise the violin without being heard. Some nuns in the next house discovered his secret, and the persevering artist was allowed to follow the bent of his nature. He was sent to Paris in 1774 to enter the guards of the Count d'Artois, where he immediately placed himself under the instruction of Langelé, a pupil of Caffaro, who gave him lessons in harmony. His first publications were some stringed quartets under an assumed name. In 1781 he produced two comic operas which were performed with success at court, Le Petit souper and le Chevalier à la mode. Encouraged by these fortunate attempts he made his first appearance at the Opera Comique in 1782 with his Eclipse totale. Within thirty years from that time he had composed, almost always with success, fifty operas, of which the more known are Nina (1786), Azémina, Raoul de Créqui, les Deux petits Savoyards, Vert-Vert, Camille en le Souterrain, Romeo et Juliette, Gulnare, Alexis, Adolphe et Clara, Maison à Vendre (1800), Picaros et Diego, Une heure de Mariage, Gulistan and le Poète et le Musicien, (1811).

The music of Dalayrac is graceful, flowing and easy. It contains a great number of pleasing romances and airs which have become popular. His orchestration is simple and never overpowers the voice. His score to Camille is of high dramatic color; his Nina is full of sentiment and interest; in short, all his works exhibit happy inspirations. The talents of Dalayrac were ennobled by his personal character. In 1790, when a failure had deprived him of the fruits of his industry and economy, he annulled the will of his father, which had benefited him at the expense of his brother, a cadet. He was made one of the Legion of Honor at the institution of the order; and died at Paris, Nov. 27, 1809, just as he finished putting his last work upon the stage. His life has been written by Piétrecourt. A pamphlet printed in 1791, entitled "Reponse à MM. les directeurs de spectacles," which argued against certain of their decrees in 1789, was from Dalayrac's pen.

If this composer was a representative of the elegance of the old regime, Mehul, on the contrary, paints well the republican epoch and the first empire.

Mehul was born at Givet (Ardennes), June 24, 1763, the son of a cook, who was hardly able to pay the expense of the boy's education. At first his only instruction in music was from a poor, old, blind organist; but his progress was such that the organ of the church of the Recollets, at Givet, was entrusted to him at the age of ten years. Two years later the boy was introduced to Hanser, the celebrated organist of the abbey de Laval Dieu, who took him as his pupil. The Abbot put him upon the footing of a novice, and he repaid this kindness afterward by two years' service as assistant organist. Mehul seemed now upon the point of passing his life in a cloister, when the colonel of a regiment, foreseeing the destiny of the precocious youth took him to Paris at the age of sixteen and confided him to the skillful instruction of Edelmann. In 1781 two works, sonatas, by Mehul, were published by Lachevardière; these productions only show that the genius of their composer had found its true path. Adding the dramatic style to the instrumental, and profiting by the counsels of the illustrious Gluck, Mehul became one more great master of the French school. At the concert spirituel in 1782, he brought out an ode dedicated to J. B. Rousseau, and then wrote three operas under the direction of Gluck, Psyche, Anacreon and Lausus et Lydie. Next came Alonso et Cora which was accepted at the opera, but was withheld from the stage six years. Irritated but not discouraged by this injustice, he turned his attention to the Opera Comique, and composed the drama Euphrosine et Coradin, which was performed in 1790. This work exhibits the talents of its author in their full maturity. Noble vocal parts, instrumentation much more brilliant and powerful than had been heard in France up to this time, a true feeling for the demands of the stage and great vigor of expression in the painting of strong situations, these were the qualities, which he showed in this, which may be considered as his first great opera. Then came Cora, followed by Stratonice, in which the air "Versez tous vos chagrins" gained great applause, and a quartet, the admiration of artists. The overture of the Jeune Henri aroused enthusiasm and the Irato gained deserved success; Uthal was too monotonous in color. But it was in his Joseph, that the author displayed all the grandeur of his style, the copiousness of his melody and his truth of sublime expression. Joseph is a biblical poem, a sort of oratorio, which gained much by being produced at the opera. La Journée aux Aventures was the last work of Mehul. His health was gradually undermined by an affection of the chest, and he died Oct. 18, 1817, aged fifty-four years.

Berton, son of a distinguished composer, was born at Paris, Sept. 17, 1797, four years after the birth of Mehul. He began the study of music at the age of ten and at fifteen entered the orchestra of the grand opera as violinist. He studied composition first with Rey, then with Sacchini, who gave his pupil, so happily endowed by nature, excellent advice upon the disposition of melodic ideas, upon modulation and the management of dramatic scenes. Drawn to the theatre by an irresistible impulse, Berton took the Frascatana of Paisiello as his model. He procured the text of an opera entitled La Dame invisible, and set it to music. Sacchini, finding in it marks of real talent, wanted the young author to come daily and work at his house. In 1786 Berton produced oratorios and cantatas at the concerts spirituelles and the following year gave at the Italian comedy les Promesses de Mariage, his first opera publicly given, and one which was favorably received. In les Rigueurs de Clôître, text by Fiévée, Berton began to exhibit his own peculiar style. Ponce de Leon, Montano et Stephanie, and le Délire are the works in which the characteristics of his simple, expressive, touching style are best seen. In 1795 he was appointed professor of harmony in the conservatory at Paris. He was director of the music of the opera buffa from 1807 to 1809, during which time he brought out Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, that masterpiece which developed the taste of the French for truly beautiful music. Leaving the Italian Opera he was appointed vocal director at the Grand Opera, under Picard. In June, 1815, the number of the members of the musical section of the Institute being increased from three to six, Berton, Catel and Cherubini were joined by Gossec, Monaigny and Mehul. Soon after the king Louis XVIII. made him chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and at the new re-organization of the conservatory Berton obtained the chair of high composition and was placed upon the examining committee.

An instinctive perception of stage effect is a predominating quality in the style of Berton; but we find in him also a certain originality of melody, harmony, modulation and instrumentation. Montano et Stephanie may probably be distinguished as the masterpiece of this composer, not denying however the great merits of Aline reine de Golconde and les Maris Garçons. A complete list of his works may be found in Fétis "Biographie." We will only add that beside his fifty scores, we owe to him a Traité d'harmonie, 4 vols. 4to, and a pamphlet, Epître à Boieldieu, upon music mechanical and philosophical.

Among the serious artists whom a too frivolous generation will be disposed to let fall into undeserved oblivion must be named Catel. He was born at Laigle in June, 1773, and came very young to Paris to perfect himself for his musical career. Sacchini caused him to enter the royal school of singing and declamation, founded in 1783, by Papillon de la Ferté, the director of the Menus-Plaisirs. There Catel studied the piano-forte under Gobert, and was initiated into the principles of harmony and composition by Gossec. He was appointed professor in the school in 1787, accompanist at the opera from 1790 to 1802, and at the organization of the conservatory, Sarrette named him professor of harmony. Being appointed to prepare the Traité d'harmonie for the school, he, at a meeting of the professors, presented a work which still forms the basis of solid instruction in the science. In 1810 he was joined to Gossec, Mehul and Cherubini as inspector of the conservatory, but resigned the place in 1814. From that time he accepted nothing but his nomination to the Institute in 1815, and the cross of the legion of honor, which was conferred upon him in 1824, without solicitation on his part.

His opera, Semiramis, brought out in 1802, had not the success which its merit deserved. The general impression was, it was "too learned." Be that as it may, L'Auberge de Bagnères and les Artistes par occasion were successful at the Opera Comique in 1807. Les Aubergistes de qualité, a composition rather cold, but the melodies of which are exquisite in taste, appeared in 1812. Le Premier en date, and the Siege de Mézières were followed by Wallace in 1817, which must be held worthy of honor as Catel's masterpiece. We find in this work a very powerful dramatic sentiment and a local color perfectly appropriate to the subject. Notwithstanding his successes Catel became disgusted with the theatre. His operas upon the whole obtaining neither popular ovations nor productive receipts, he ceased to write, seeking in the encouragement of young artists and in the delights of a peaceful life, a pure and noble compensation for triumphs, which he could not gain upon the stage. The collection of musical pieces for national festivities contains much from Catel's pen; he wrote also chamber music and in 1815 published a second edition of the excellent solfeggio exercises of the Conservatory. To an understanding, most just and fine, he added a character of the severest probity and all the qualities of a pure soul. His gratitude to his early protector never faltered; his kindness to young musicians knew no limits.

That which above all gives the breath of life to dramatic music is melodic idea and scenic sentiment; these qualities will cause the works of Nicolo and Boieldieu to live.

Nicolo Isouard, son of a French father, was born at Malta in 1775. He came early to Paris to enter the navy, but afterwards accepted a situation at Malta as clerk in a banking house; but he already felt his vocation to be music and dreamed of dramatic successes. An old teacher of counterpoint, Michael Angelo Vella, took a liking for him and instructed him in the elements of harmony. Azzopardi, chapel-master to the Knights of Malta, put him afterwards to the study of fugue in the old healthy Italian method. His father, however, now sent him to Palermo to forget his music in the dull routine of a counting house. But spite of his numerous duties, Isouard continued his studies under the direction of Amendola, who formed his taste by causing him to play the accompaniments of the last works of Leo, Durante and Clari. At a later date being employed by some German bankers at Naples he finished his pupilage in the study of composition with Sala and Guilielmi. From this time, in opposition to the wishes of his family, he abandoned commerce to devote himself entirely to the cultivation of music.

Coming to Florence he wrote there his first opera, Avviso ai Maritati, and soon after brought out at Leghorn Artaserse, which had deserved success. De Rohan Grand Master of the Maltese order, now called him home in capacity of organist, and afterwards appointed him chapel-master. Upon the arrival of the French at Malta and the suppression of the order, Nicolo employed his leisure in the composition of operas, some of them translations from the French, others original Italian texts, for the theatre of the place. After the capitulation Gen. Vaubois took him to Paris as his secretary. There Nicolo met Rudolph Kreutzer, who like a devoted friend aided him with his purse and influence in smoothing the path to success.

Le Tonnelier (1799) was Nicolo's first opera produced at Paris. This essay was followed by La Statue, Baiser et la Quittance and the Petit Page. Thus far the talents of the young composer excited no great attention; but Michel Ange, (1802) les Confidences, le Medecin Turc, Leonce ou le Fils adoptif, and above all l'Intrigue aux fenêtres (1805) placed him among the favorite composers of the public. Between 1805 and 1811 he added fourteen operas to this list—the best known of which is les Reniezvous bourgeois (in 1 act, 1807). His chosen co-laborers were Hoffmann and Etienne. Upon Boieldieu's return to Paris, Nicolo added breadth and grandeur to his style, and composed Cendrillon, Joconde, and Jeannot et Colin (1814) works which remain in the repertory of the Opera Comique, as types and models of sentiment, freshness, naiveté and melody. Nicolo died at Paris, March 23, 1818 in his forty-third year, leaving his Aladin ou la Lampe merveilleuse unfinished.

Nature's Piano.

HOW MUSICAL SOUNDS CAME FROM FOSSILS—THE "LITHOPHONE."

PARIS, MARCH 30, 1861.

Though the greatest of poets has declared that there are "sermons in stones," the most learned of geologists have failed to discover that there is music in fossils; a discovery which has nevertheless been made by an amateur brother of the craft, Monsieur Bordas, an ingenious Frenchman, equally addicted to rhyming, music-making, sketching and geologising, the happy possessor of an hereditary estate in the Perigord, a patrimony which rejoices at once in the euphonious and suggestive designation of "Le Petit Paradis" for the richness and variety of the fossils found within its borders.

That the owner of even a "little" paradise should be the first to reveal to the ears of later ages the mysterious harmonies that have lain dormant ever since the flood might almost be anticipated as the result of a preëxistent fitness in the nature and relationship of things; at all events, this gentleman, after twelve years of incessant tapping and hammering on tens of thousands of "specimens" dug up by his people all over his estate, has at length succeeded in obtaining eighteen sonorous fossils, which, when struck with a piece of stone, give out a clear, defined musical sound, in quality much resembling the tones of musical glasses, and constituting, to the extent of these eighteen "keys," a complete and perfect musical gamut of tones and semitones, following each other in regular order, and forming a sort of fossil piano. This instrument, unique in its way, has been brought to Paris by its maker, who is exhibiting it for the edification of the curious, under the name of "the lithophone, or natural piano." The Academy of Sciences has named a commission to report upon this original instrument, and upon the many other curious fossils found by M. Bordes in his own grounds, and brought by him to Paris.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE LITHOPHONE.

The lithophone consists of a rough plank, about five feet long and six inches broad, placed in a rustic frame composed of moss-covered twigs; straight ones, roughly nailed together, forming the bottom of this frame; others, bent into semi-circles and nailed upon these, forming the sides. In this frame—which is supported by rustic legs and looks very much like a rude magnified jardinière—lies the afore-mentioned plank, and upon this plank are placed the fossils which constitute the keys of the lithophone. The fossils are not fastened down in any way, but are merely laid on the plank side by side, one after the other. The progression of the tones is the same as in the piano; the deepest being to the left of the performer, and the scale ascending, in tones and semitones, to his right. The fossils on which he performs by striking them with the pieces of stone he holds in each hand, are of various shapes and sizes; differences which seem, however, to have nothing to do with the differences of the tones they emit on being struck.

ITS NOTES.

The first and deepest key is fossil No. 1. It is a queer, thin, spreading three-cornered piece of the root of a tree, which presents the appearance of having been sawn across in its wooden days; it is warped or bent, like the top of an overgrown mushroom, and each of its two principal ends gives out a distinct note, forming together a perfect fifth. Between the two notes furnished by this fossil there is a gap which is not filled by the notes of any of the fossils; fossil No. 2 forming the note next above the highest of the two notes given out by fossil No. 1, and the sounds of the others following in the same order as the notes of a piano.

The sounds given out by these fossils, though clear, sweet, loud, and as truly musical as those of any other instrument, possess a peculiar wildness and freshness of tone that impart a very original character to the music of the lithophone, and seem naturally to carry the hearer's fancies among woods, waters, winds and mountains, calling up thoughts of country scenes and sounds. Bells, peasants' dances, the songs of birds and cries of insects, seem to blend in the tones of this curious instrument with the more orthodox developments of musical expression. The pieces played by M. Bordes on his fossil piano are, for the most part, his own composition, and are really as charming as original.

ITS ORIGIN.

The idea of "forming an instrument made solely by nature" seems to have suggested itself to the amateur geologist in this wise. He had been engaged for several years in making a collection in an empty greenhouse of the fossils found on his estate, when, happening to strike one of these with a stone, he was struck by its emission of a pure musical sound, and hung it up at the door of his "museum," with a piece of stone beside it, that visitors might amuse themselves by striking it on arriving, instead of ringing the bell. A year or two afterwards when going over a hilly part of his grounds to attend a singing meeting got up by him among the neighboring peasants, he chanced to strike his foot against what he took to be a loose stone, which rolled down the side of the ravine, striking right and left against the stones in its descent, and giving out, every time it struck against them, a musical sound as distinct as that of the deputy bell, but of a different pitch.

"When I heard that second tone," says M. Bordes, "I paused in my rapid walk towards the singing school; the idea of the lithophone presented itself to my mind. I struck my forehead with my finger thus (imitating the gesture to the word), and I cried 'Eureka!'"

But though "the idea" had presented itself fully formed in that luminous moment to the mind of the owner of Le Petit Paradis, its realization in "pure silex" has occupied the inventor for twelve years. The search after fossils was prosecuted with fresh vigor, exercising, one may infer, an unfavorable effect on the surface beauty of the Perigourdin Eden and on every fossil and every bit of stone disinterred by his workmen did the indefatigable seeker bestow an interrogatory tap. But in no instance has he been able to elicit a musical sound from any species of stone; fossils only, as far as his experience goes, having this property, and in the proportion only of one to many thousands. Whenever he found a fossil possessed of sonority he carried it home forthwith and deposited it in triumph upon the plank which he had appropriated for the purpose, and which he now retains in the completed instrument as a souvenir of the hopes and fears, the despondencies and elations of the long and patient search into which he has put all the intense and concentrated enthusiasm peculiar to the votaries of hobby-horses.

CURIOUS RESULTS.

As he obtained the sonorous fossils in question, he ranged them in their proper order, leaving spaces between them to be filled by future waifs, and at length had the pleasure (as he says, "the happiness") of seeing the interval between the upper and lower notes of his pet invention, really filled by the consecutive series of intermediate sound necessary to constitute a perfect musical scale. Singularly enough, in his twelve years' search, though he has found duplicates of a few of the tones in his gamut, he has never found a fossil giving a note either higher than the highest, or lower than the lowest of the fossil-piano he has succeeded in forming.

The fossils forming the keys of the lithophone have not been touched by saw or chisel, but are exactly as when taken out of the earth; nor can M. Bordes offer any explanation of the fact of their exceptional sonority.

Among the fossils he has brought to Paris are figs and other fruits still to be found in that region, with others not now known. On one curious fossil vegetable a cockle fastened itself, and has become a fossil in its turn. One of the figs shows the bite of some animal that has eaten away one side of it; proving, thinks the inventor of the "natural piano," that the immersion to which these fossils are due must have taken place in the autumn, the fig being ripe, and very suddenly, as, though ripe and partly eaten, the form of the fruit is otherwise perfect as it would not be if it had remained exposed many days to the action of the air.

NEW YORK, APRIL 10, 1861.—Editor of the Transcript:—Our nation is one which is hardly yet entitled to be called "musical," although the initial steps which are to make us one have been taken, and we may expect a new era in music to dawn upon us at an early period.

We cannot yet boast of large musical societies, such as exist in England, France and other countries which sustain Conservatoires de Musique, and offer every facility to render smooth the royal road to knowledge in the "Art Divine;" but progress is the law, and the time is rapidly approaching when we shall stand on an equal footing with other nations in matters pertaining to the fine arts, as we now do in all that belongs to the practical and useful.

That this condition will ultimately be brought about, we have assurance in the many influences at work tending to such a consummation, among which may be mentioned particularly the large number of artists residing in our midst who have been educated in the schools of Europe, or are natives of those countries where wealth is lavishly expended in the encouragement of art. In order to exhibit the present condition of our people in matters relating particularly to musical art, I propose to present your readers with a sketch of the history and attainments of the leading choral societies of this city, in accordance with a promise made some weeks since.

As a general rule, our societies meet once or twice per week for practising the standard works of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, etc., as well as the more modern productions of some of our own native composers. Only those who have gone through the necessary rudimentary instruction, and can read music at sight, are admitted to membership, as their design is to practice rather than instruct.

The New York Harmonic Society, established in the year 1852, was founded with a view to the promotion and encouragement of the musical interests of New York, by holding stated rehearsals for the practice of the highest class of sacred and secular music, giving public performances, and such other means as might be deemed desirable. Its first officers were Isaac M. Phye, President; E. M. Carrington, Vice President, and Archibald Johnston, Treasurer. Mr. George F. Bristow was unanimously elected conductor, and has so continued to the present time. In 1857 it became a body politic, by the issue of its charter on April 16 of that year. The management of the affairs of the society is vested in a board of fifteen officers, subdivided into committees, of which are two standing, four tenor, and four bass. This board meets the first Tuesday in every month for the transaction of the general business of the society. The members assemble for rehearsal every Monday evening throughout the year at their rooms in Dodworth's Academy on Broadway. They have no vacation during the summer months and never miss a rehearsal of some kind, on the stated evening, under any circumstances.

Most of the productions of the great masters have become familiar to the Society, and many publicly performed, averaging four or five in the year. The "Messiah" is invariably performed by them on the evening of Christmas Day. In some instances these public appearances have been of a very interesting character; among them may be mentioned the Jenny Lind concert, the opening of the Crystal Palace, the great Musical Congress under the direction of M. Jullien, the Atlantic Cable celebration, the Bristow Testimonial, etc. There were other performances of the Society, with Jullien and his famous orchestra, and still others of greater or less note. Its more recent productions have been the new oratorio by Geo. F. Bristow, "Praise to God," produced three times—the last at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, which proved a complete success. This Oratorio, which I have already noticed at some length, is the first American production ever performed with such signal marks of approbation. As a work of art it is most excellent, an honor to the composer, a credit to his country; it suffers nothing from comparison with standard works, and will rank high as a masterpiece—criticisms from all quarters abound in panegyrics.

Among the earliest performances of the Society was the "Messiah" with Jullien's orchestra. The leading vocalists were, Miss Maria Brainerd, soprano, Madame Pico, contralto, and Signor Badiali, basso; on this occasion, Miss Brainerd made her first appearance in oratorio, and greatly distinguished herself, singing the entire soprano part, seven solos, with unanimous approbation. This performance of the "Messiah" has been considered the finest and most successful ever given here. The receipts were nearly $4,000. It was given in the Metropolitan Hall (since destroyed by fire)—the only complete and elegant concert hall New York could ever boast of.

The Society numbers 240 members. Of the male members there are two divisions, corporate and associate the former paying $10 per annum, having the sole direction of its affairs, &c., and the latter paying $4 per annum, having no voice in its management. Although the enterprise has not received the cordial support and encouragement it merits, it has, nevertheless, not only maintained its ground, but has been successful thus far, and is now in a flourishing condition. The Society owns an extensive and valuable library containing all the most celebrated oratorios, and very many of less merit; it owns, also, one of Steinway's excellent grand pianos. Its present prosperous condition may be attributed to the exertions of its indefatigable President and Treasurer, as also their Conductor, Mr. Bristow.

One feature of this Society is particularly worthy of attention. Although there is nothing in the constitution or by-laws to that effect, it is generally understood that no professional musician—excepting, of course, the conductor—shall hold office, and to this regulation it is generally conceded that the society owes, to a great degree, its success—as the proverbial cliqueism which ruins all societies is by this means avoided.

The "Mendelssohn Union"—one of our best societies—was formed in the year 1853, by a number of ladies and gentlemen who felt the necessity of an institution which should study and bring before the public works of more varied class than any then existing. The great design of those directly interested was mutual pleasure and improvement, and a desire to elevate the musical taste of its patrons.

As its name indicates, the society has bestowed the larger share of its labors to the production of the works of Mendelssohn. It was first organized with Dr. James M. Quinn as President, and the talented Messrs. H. C. Timm and George W. Morgan, as alternate pianists and conductors. Mr. Morgan has been without interruption, the conductor since its foundation, and Mr. William Berge—the distinguished organist of St. Francis Xavier's Catholic Church in Sixteenth street—the regular pianist during the past five seasons. It only admits to membership professors, and such amateurs as are competent and correct readers of music at sight, and now numbers nearly one hundred performing members, who, with the celebrated organists and pianists, Messrs. Berge, Currie and Beal, form a company equal to the requirements of almost any of the grand works of the great composers.

A new and peculiar feature which has been added to their season performances consists of an aquatic moonlight festival and concert, for which purpose a large steamboat is chartered. The first of these, inaugurated in the summer of 1859, was so highly successful and popular, that another was undertaken last summer; and it is probable that they will be continued annually.

Its founders intended that the society should be self-supporting, through the yearly dues of its members and subscribers, without any appeal to the public by sale of tickets at concerts or otherwise. This plan was eminently successful until the fifth season, when the plan of selling tickets was adopted, which resulted unfavorably. The "Union" has since adhered to the course originally marked out, and its present financial condition clearly demonstrates this as the most successful mode of establishing such a society upon a firm basis.

The rehearsals are held every Thursday evening, in the lecture room of Rev. Dr. Ganse's church in Twenty-third street, and within a year or two have become matters of interest, attracting large numbers of visitors and lovers of music. During the past five months, the choruses of Wallace's new opera, "Lurline," have been in rehearsal, and it was successfully produced at a public concert last Saturday evening. It is proposed to take up next the "Amber Witch," Wallace's latest work, by many thought to be superior to "Lurline." Mr. Bergé is writing an oratorio, "St. Peter," and Mr. Morgan is also engaged upon one, to be called "St. Paul"—both for this society. Neither is as yet completed.

Among the works practiced and performed by the "Union," are Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," "Elijah," "Lobgesang," "Loreley," "Athalie," "Walpurgis-night," etc.; Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," Haydn's "Creation" and "Seasons"; Mozart's celebrated "Requiem"; Rossini's "Moses in Egypt" and "Stabat Mater"; Spohr's "Last Judgment"; Costa's "Eli" and Stoeppel's "Hiawatha." Of these, "St. Paul," the "Creation," "Loreley," "Eli" and "Hiawatha" were accompanied by full orchestra—the last named at the Academy of Music, and all of them in a style equal to anything previously heard in this city.

The "Union" is now in its seventh season; its list of yearly subscribers has slowly, but constantly increased, and we trust that the time is not far distant when its design will be appreciated by lovers of music, and that it may be placed on a sure footing among the permanent institutions of the city.

The New York Philharmonic Society, which is, without exception, the first society of the kind in this country, was organized in the year 1841, and is consequently now in the twenty-first year of its existence—an honor and an ornament to our city.

It is made up of the best resident musical talent, and is very thoroughly drilled and ably conducted by Messrs. Theodore Eisfeld and Carl Bergmann, under whose direction fifteen public rehearsals and five concerts are given at the Academy of Music each season, affording to its subscribers an opportunity of hearing the greatest chef d'œuvres of musical art and some of the finest specimens of vocal and instrumental execution.

This society now numbers 27 subscribing members or those who pay ten dollars per season and are entitled to three tickets to each of the five concerts; 1128 associate members, who subscribe five dollars per season and receive a ticket to each of the public rehearsals and one to each of the five concerts; and 304 professional members who pay a fee of three dollars, and are entitled to the same privilege as the associates. The orchestra numbers about 80 performers.

In my next, I shall speak of some of the societies in Brooklyn, and the German societies in this city.—Transcript.

Musical Literature.

What shall the next generation do without a Scudo? and what musical student is there who has not on his book shelves, or scattered among the heaps of music on his table or piano, the various volumes of "Critique et Littérature Musicale," "Année Musicale" and "Chevalier Sarti"?

The contents of these books are articles collected from various French reviews for which Scudo has been writing for many years. The Revue des Deux Mondes continues almost monthly to have one of his charming criticisms, which we may read scoldingly, probably, but always with pleasure and profit. These criticisms are often full of dogmatism, prejudice, and sharp, severe, even bitter judgment; but every liberal minded, good-natured artist cannot help liking them, nevertheless; must consult them, and rely on them as authority.

He brings to his critical duty a highly cultivated and well stored mind. Liszt and Berlioz and Lacome write charmingly about music, but they write like rhapsodists many times, and always like musicians, interesting the musical student only, so do Wagner and Schumann, and several others; but the musician who desires to see his art better comprehended by the intelligent and refined, by those who enjoy painting and sculpture, and architecture, and all the other grand chapels in the superb cathedrals of art, must rejoice most over Scudo, for he writes upon music sensibly and without nonsense or ecstasies, giving to our divine art a literary dignity and charm, that its sister arts have long possessed, a species of æsthetic criticism, which is written in such an intelligent and agreeable style, that men and women of refined tastes and reading habits, who may not be musicians even, can enjoy it as they do the writings of a Winckelman, a Schlegel or a Ruskin, and through it comprehend better this great art of Palestrina, Pergolesi, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven.

His most ordinary articles, those which are simply notices of new publications, have their own peculiar cleverness, and the regular reader of Scudo never passes them over hastily, for one always feels sure of finding something suggestive in them. In the Revue des Deux Mondes for the first part of January of this year, is a short one on Hengel's edition of Semiramis for voice and piano, M. de Vaucorbeil's songs, Cherbuliez's Collection of Sacred Music and M. Mathias' (the pianiste) edition of six grand symphonies of Mozart.

When noticing the new edition of Rossini's Semiramis, he gives a running critique upon the manner in which Mmes. Penco and Albani sang this opera, this winter, at Theatre Italien, in Paris, which he says they did with un bonheur d'exécution that deeply touched the audience. Mme. Penco's true feeling and perfect comprehension of the grand rôle of the Queen of Babylon made M. Scudo pardon her shortcomings in the way of voice and vocalization, and he thought her especially clever in the first part of the grand finale of the first act.

Albani was a little too elegiac in Arsace—that is what she was thirteen years ago, according to M. Paul Scudo. In his fine article on "L'Art du Chant en Italie," written in January, 1848, while giving the then young cantatrice almost enthusiastic praise, he said, "One only desired in such an exquisite talent, a little more force, accent and depth," in this same part of Arsace. But she must have advanced some little at least in this part, for he says she sang the grand duo in the second act with Semiramis (Mme. Penco) with rare perfection, the Ehben a te ferisci! which was one of Mme. Pisoni's triumphs over thirty years ago, when this opera and its creator were young, and the musical world was drinking its first draught of this celebrated Cyprus wine, the fruit of a revolutionary vintage, for Rossini was the result of that time, as the melodramatic Verdi is of the intervening one.

Scudo compliments M. Hengel by saying of him that he is an intelligent editor and very zealous for the interests of the artists he loves to gather around him. This edition of Semiramis he has had arranged for voice and piano with much care, from the score as they sing it at the French Opera; the French translation follows the Italian text of the libretto; and the book is adorned with two fine lithographic portraits of the great maestro author, Rossini, "one of him at the happy age of twenty-eight, with a smile on his lips and his eyes sparkling with genius, the other representing him as he can be seen daily, enjoying peacefully his incontestable and imperishable glory."

He winds up his notice of this Semiramis book with a remark that shows his nice, exact taste—that, after all, the Semiramis, as represented at the French Theatre, even with the two sisters Marchisio and the fine choruses, compare with the true Semiramis, such as was given at the Theatre Italien, only as a good translation of a fine poem compares with the original.

The notice of M. de Vaucorbeil's songs makes one wish to hear them; not that they receive good, hearty praise, but enough to create interest. French songs of society, "ballads," as we call them, are, for the most part, delicious. They have all the tenderness without the monotony and solemnity of German songs. Who does not remember Bérat's "Nor-mandie" and Grisar's "La Folle" and that little green and gold album of Masini peeping out on the music shelves reminds us of "Ou ra mon ame" and "Tom image" delicious creations of this "Ballini de la Romance," as Scudo called this charming song writer quite ten years ago.

But to return to M. de Vaucorbeil. Scudo's remarks on him are worth translating; he says:

"An amateur, a man of taste, a quasi artist, who has for a long time hesitated between a certain literary world, where his mind has developed, and the purely musical one into which he enters but timidly, M. de Vaucorbeil has published a collection of melodies which are more remarkable for the elevated, poetical idea which has preoccupied the author, than for any freedom or novelty in the musical phrase.

"The first time that I happened to hear in a drawing room some light compositions of M. de Vaucorbeil, sung by M. Roger, I was struck by the disparity between his conceptions which is sometimes elevated—as in "Les Chœurs d'Argos," for example—and the representation of his thought, which is meagre and expressed with a character of préciosité, showing more of the literary man than the musician.

"Nevertheless, M. de Vaucorbeil understands music. He loves and knows how to appreciate true masterpieces, and his refined taste does not allow itself to be easily taken with fallacious theories. But his compositions want life, and have not that healthy air which pleases every one; they cannot be sung with success except before a select and artificial society; before women, men of letters, painters, artists, in a word, who are pleased with ingenious creations of the mind, and the casuistry of cœur incompris.

"M. de Vaucorbeil will be astonished, perhaps, when I say of him, with all due respect to his own individuality, that he is subject to the same style of illusions which are peculiar to M. Berlioz. He believes he has expressed in his songs thoughts which have haunted his delicate imagination, but which he only reveals to us in an incomplete manner, and under a form which has in it less of the musician than of the poet. M. de Vaucorbeil is too young and too intelligent not to be able to make a victorious reply sometime in the future to our objections."

In speaking of M. Cherbuliez's collection of sacred music, Scudo alludes to the deplorable state of religious music, in France; a state it is in almost everywhere; and the attempts that are being made to restore it to its primitive devotional form. These attempts, though laughable, are almost in vain, one might fear. There is little of the tranquil, pious spirit of old Christian art remaining in either music or painting. Then the hardest thing an artist has to struggle with now is the total absence of deep, simple, childlike faith in, and feeling for, anything—which characterizes our time—"deep feeling which that profound æsthetic master, Schlegel, said well, was the only true source of lofty art."

The whole world, the old world and the new, seem to be in every point falling into what the French political writer, Forcade, calls a vast work of dissolution and into something which is at least the symptom of a general revolution, if it is not a revolution itself."

Then in such unsettled times, when all faiths are shaken, political, social and artistic; old monarchical governments seek liberty and bestowing freedom; young democratic countries questioning the wisdom of their free institutions, everything in a state of feverish ferment, how can we expect to see reproduced anything like those works which were the pure quiet growth of a simple believing age? "Every effort will be useless, it seems, unless artists and their audience, the world, shall be completely transformed, and become endowed with earnest, religious feeling, genuine devotion, and immortal faith. Fancy sporting with the symbols of catholicism, uninspired by that love which is stronger than death, will never attain exalted Christian beauty." So wrote Schlegel about painting at the commencement of this present human phase of affairs, and very well it applies to music now. But let us hear what M. Scudo has to say.

Religious music, the expression of that profound but indefinite feeling which the soul experiences when collecting itself and howing before the grand idea of God, and which feeling encloses so many mysteries, has always pre-occupied a great number of distinguished minds. Of all styles of music, religious music in France is in the most deplorable state. A Congress has been formed at Paris to consult upon the means of elevating religious art and to know what should be done for the restoration of that chimera called the Gregorian chant, and to give to the Catholic faith the musical form which belongs to its spirit.

"We shall follow the labors of this Congress, without indulging in any illusions, however, as to the result of their debates. The cause of this evil which is being deplored is not a simple one. As to our opinions, we propose some day, in a moment of leisure, to develop them, at present we shall only say some words on a collection of sacred songs for one and several voices, which, under the title of Allodia, has been published by M. Joel Cherbuliez.

"It is the pious and careful work of a protestant minister, M. Theodore Paul, who lives in the environs of Geneva. Composed of the finest passages of Handel, Mozart, and above all of the great Sebastian Bach, this collection is divided into two series, forming two well engraved volumes with French and German words. The second series, which is a more remarkable selection than the first, contains, forty-two passages taken from Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Weber, Leo, Marcello, Lotti, Victoria, &c.

"We might very well make some remarks on the merit of (and often strange prosody of) the French words which the author has put above the original text; but we will refrain and only ask why did not M. Paul indicate the particular works of the Masters from whom he has selected these passages. There is no fear of being too explicit in these sort of publications, which address themselves to the humblest minds."

The Organ.

THIRTEENTH STUDY.—QUALITY OF TONE CONTINUED, AND ITS SECOND PRINCIPAL CAUSE, FORM—THE FREE REED.

The quality of the tone of reed pipes does without doubt most especially depend on the relative proportions of the pipe, the tongue, and the reed; but it depends, above all, on the way in which the reed itself is constructed. It is well known that reeds are of two kinds, the free reed, and the striking reed. This last kind produces a sharp metallic quality of tone, and this mainly arises from the tongue striking sharply against the edges of the groove. That sharp, trumpet quality of tone, which so takes the fancy of those who admire orchestral music, has for a long time been a cause of offence to persons who are not so wholly prejudiced in its favor, especially when they meet with it in a church of small dimensions, where there is but little sounding room, and they or others have often compared its tones, harsh and ill-proportioned to the size of the place, to the grating sound which is produced by dragging a heavy wooden bench over a stone pavement. Nor was it until long after science had ceased to devote its energies exclusively to the interests of ecclesiastical art, that, at the beginning of this century, when the sacred fire of zeal for the ancient traditions was again lighted up, a certain learned admirer of organs, M. Grenié, was inspired with the means of softening the quality of the reed pipes used in their construction. This he did by so arranging the tongue, with regard to the reed, that one might pass evenly within the other without meeting with any resistance. The two pieces are in fact so exactly fitted one to the other in his system, that the tongue would seem to be cut off the reed. Its action may be described as follows:—When the tongue, which is a thin piece of metal, is set in motion by the wind, on its passage upwards from the foot of the pipe into the reed, it gives way under its pressure for so much of its length as is pliant enough to do so, and is then brought back to its former position by its own spring-like nature. This alternate action of air upon the tongue, and of the tongue upon the air, lasts as long as the wind is supplied to the foot of the pipe, and results in the production of a quality of tone as delicate as it is penetrating. The tones also of a reed thus constructed are far better suited to blend with those of the flue pipes than those of reeds made in the ordinary way.

There is little more than the above to say about the free reed. It is generally fitted to pipes, the bodies of which are made to a length which has been found by experience to be the best for the still further development of its tones, and somewhat shorter than those of the striking reeds. These last speak best, as is well known, with pipes which are three quarters of the length of flue pipes of the same note, while the free reed speaks well with a pipe which is not more than half the length of the flue pipe. With even shorter pipes than these, M. Grenié has made free reeds, which speak the note of a 16-foot open pipe, with all the regularity and vigor which is required of them, though not with a tone which is equal in these respects to that of the French reed-stop, called the bombardo.*

The dimensions of the tongue, with regard to length, width, and thickness, are of as much importance in the construction of free reeds, as they are in that of the striking reed. If these details are not attended, it will be subject to various irregular movements in its wrestling with the wind. As the end, when the tongue of the free reed is fastened, is firmly fixed, no amount of wind can possibly make it vary in pitch; but this does not prevent it from being affected by an accident to which all metals are liable, namely, a change in the temperature, and to this it is most sensitive. Hence heat makes it get flat, cold makes it get sharp, so that in winter a free reed will sometimes be as much as a quarter of a tone sharper than it is in summer. An extra pressure of wind has no more effect on the free reed than to widen the range of its beats, and consequently to give greater vigor to its power; a diminished pressure has, of course, a contrary effect; but in neither case is the pitch of the note altered. The ease with which its sounds may be thus augmented or diminished, according to the pressure of the wind, has given rise to its being used for the production of those effects of expression which are generally understood by the words crescendo and diminuendo. These effects are not, it is true, wholly inadequate for the expression of human feeling, though, after all, in a very imperfect way, and to apply them to the great organ, whose tones are throughout even and equal, is as contrary to the qualities of music in general, as it is to the traditions of music of the church.

We would allow, then, the introduction of the free reed into an organ intended for the service of the church, not as an expression stop merely, by which the feelings of the faithful may be moved, or their attention distracted, but because it points out to us a way, as brilliant as it is sweet, by which we may get rid both of that hard quality of tone of the striking reed, and because it will tend to put a stop to the noisy clatter of French organ-playing leaving us with nothing to fall back upon, as is the case with the Germans, but the dull monotony of wood and metal flue pipes. It may be added, that the introduction of free reeds into our larger church-organs, is, in the first place, due to a member of the French magistracy, M. Hamel, a judge at Beauvais. Of his skill and practical knowledge we have already had occasion to speak in terms of praise. In the year 1827, he superintended in person the building of the large organ of the cathedral of Beauvais, and for the first time applied the free reed system to this very remarkable instrument.†

* This system may be found reproduced in the organ's expression made by M. Muller, Rue Ville l'Évêque, Paris.

† It appears that, in the organ built by M. Hamel, the free reed stops were supplied with wind from a bellows of their own. For we find, in an account published by M. Daulon for the Orange Building Society, of which he says he has the artistic direction, an additional fact in the history of the origin of the free reed. "The firm of MM. Daublanie, Callinet, and Co.," writes M. Daulon, "offers to our notice, at this moment (1844), an improvement in organ building, which consists in employing for the production of expression on their stops, the wind from the ordinary organ bellows. The extra pressure required for this wind is got by means of a pedal, which is at the command of the foot of the player. Henceforward, then, a separate bellows for these expression stops is no longer necessary. For this interesting invention the firm of MM. Daublanie and Callinet has received a patent."

Mimetic Music.

When Joseph Haydn, in his days, was composing the music of Bernardoni's ballet, "Le Diable Boiteux," a sea storm, incidental to that piece, as Madame Dudevant tells us, cost him a world of pains, the remembrance of which would make him laugh at fourscore. Bernardoni wanted the tempest to be an out-and-out—a regular high-flying hurricane—a witches' hurly-burly of thunder, lightning, wind and rain—in the very best marine manner. But Joseph was no mariner, and felt as though any such marine piece was beyond him. He was at a loss how to describe in crotchets and quavers what he had never seen, and could only land-lubber like guess about. So we read that his good friend and ally, the Porporina, pictured to honest Beppo the Adriatic in a storm, and sang the mournful plaint of the waves, those sad sea waves, not without laughing at the imitative harmonies which require to be aided by blue cloths, shaken from scene to scene by vigorous arms—a very sad sort of sea waves indeed. One night, however, the young German's perplexity was happily relieved by a colloquy on the subject with the experienced maestro, Porpora himself. That able authority assures Haydn that he might labor for a hundred years with the best instruments in the world, and the most intimate knowledge of wind and waters, without being able to translate the divine harmonies of nature. This, contends the master, is not the province of music, which is merely guilty of folly and conceit when it runs after noisy effects and endeavors to imitate the war of the elements. Its domain he affirms to be that of the emotions: its aim is to inspire them, as its origin is from their inspiration. What the young composer has to think of, then, is of a man abandoned to the fury of the waves, and a prey to the deepest terror: he is to imagine a scene at once frightful and sublime; the danger imminent; and then, placing himself in the midst of this distress, this disorder, this confusion and despair, to give expression to his anguish, assured that his hearers, intelligent or not, will share it. "They will imagine that they hear the groaning of the timbers, the shouts of the mariners, the despair of the helpless passengers. What would you say of a poet who, in order to depict a battle, should tell you in verse that the cannon uttered boom, boom, and the drums dub, dub? It would be a better imitation than any image, but it would not be poetry. Painting itself, descriptive art par excellence, does not consist in servile imitation. The artist would trace in vain the dull green sea, the dark and stormy skyline, the shattered bark. If his feelings do not enable him to render the terrible and poetical whole, his picture will make as little impression as any alehouse sign." And therefore would old Porpora have young Haydn, on this tentative occasion, seek to inspire his whole being with the idea of some great disaster; for thus, and only thus, would he make his storm-scene tell on the feelings of others. Thus and only thus, might and must his sea-piece

Suffer a sea change
Into something rich and strange, instead of remaining poor and common.

Ariel's song reminds us by the way, in connection with the same subject, but in the case of another great German composer, that Beethoven is said to have hinted that Shakespeare's "Tempest" was in his mind when he composed his Sonata Appassionata (which has been described as shining resplendent among his other sonatas, like Sirius amongst the stars). And musical critics hold that the fancy will find much to support this derivative suggestion. The first movement for instance, wild and gusty, has been compared to the course of a vessel over a boundless ocean, now pelted with storms, and anon scudding cheerily before the gale; while the second, "solemn and dirge-like, with its mysterious bass—in which certain singular retardations are introduced, giving an effect somewhat like a peal of bells, recalls Ariel's song, "Full fathom five thy father lies." The depths of the ocean, with its hidden splendors, seem to be opened to us." The last movement is one prolonged storm, suggestive of a sea on which no ship can live, of powerless endeavor and remorseless wreck.

Mr. Hogarth's Musical History contains an account of Haydn's early difficulty, in finding himself "at sea" (in a double sense), or in a composer's sea of troubles—in hardly a metaphorical one,—which is more prosaic and less elegantly didactic than that introduced in George Sand's æsthetical romance. Haydn's own report of the matter, in after years, is that upon which our musical historian's narrative is based. Neither the librettist, Curtz by name, nor Joseph, had ever looked on the sea, so that their notions, individually and conjointly, of its appearance when tempest-tossed were necessarily somewhat vague. However, they must brew a storm between them, somehow: so Haydn sat at the harpsichord, while Curtz paced about the room, and tried to furnish the composer with ideas. "Imagine," said he, "a mountain rising, and then a valley sinking,—and then another mountain and another valley;—the mountains and valleys must follow each other every instant. Then you must have claps of thunder and flashes of lightning, and the noise of the wind; but, above all, you must represent distinctly the mountains and valleys." Haydn, meanwhile, kept trying all sorts of passages, ran up and down the scale, and exhausted his ingenuity in heaping together chromatic intervals and strange discords. Still Curtz was not satisfied. At last the musician, out of all patience, extended his hand to the extremities of the keys, and bringing them rapidly together, exclaimed, "the deuce take the tempest.—I can make nothing of it." "That is the very thing!" shouted Curtz, in rapture at this chance-medley solution of the problem. Curtz and Porpora had different ideas of high art and sound practice.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Waltz by Chopin, Op. 64, No. 3.

Concert of the Handel and Haydn Society in aid of the Government.

Arts as well as laws are silent when the country is under arms. Our readers, therefore, can expect but a meagre chronicle of musical matters for some time to come. Indeed, it would be almost impossible to find any one who could calmly sit down to hear a concert, and still more impossible to find one who could calmly write about one. When the blood is boiling with indignation at the humiliation of our country's flag before the army of traitors who beleaguered its little band of defenders, when every heart is beating with one patriotic pulse, when but one voice and one mind exists throughout this people which has risen as one man to the defence of the Nation's Capital, and to vindicate the honor of the Nation's flag, at such a time, there are few who can listen patiently to the instruments of peace, when the clang of the trumpet, the stirring beat of the drum and the shrill voice of the fife are heard in our streets, calling to arms.

Our readers will notice the advertisement of the Handel and Haydn Society, which, with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society and the Germania Band, will give a concert at the Music Hall, of miscellaneous, patriotic and national music, this evening. Every thing connected with this concert is freely given, and the proceeds are to be handed to His Excellency the Governor of this Commonwealth, for the purpose of aiding in the arming and equipping of troops. The programme will be found on the first page, and in these times such music will be sure to touch a chord of patriotism in the heart of every hearer who is disposed in this way to contribute his mite for the common good. We trust that the Music Hall may be crowded as it never was before, and that a substantial sum may be handed over to the treasury of Massachusetts.

Concerts.

We have to record three concerts since the printing of our last issue, all of which had but a slim attendance, and one afternoon concert with a goodly number of hearers.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, gave an extra parlor concert at Cambridge in Lyceum Hall on Friday, April 19th, offering on their programme two such sterling pieces as Beethoven's Septette and Schubert's Octette.

1. Septette, in E flat, op. 20..... Beethoven
For Violin, Viola, Violoncello, Bass, Clarinette, Horn and Bassoon.
- Introduction and Allegro—Larghetto—Minuetto—Theme, with variations—Scherzo—Finale, Adagio and Allegro.
2. The celebrated Adagio, ("God save the Emperor," with variations from Quartette No. 77..... Haydn
3. Fantaisie for violin, on Hungarian themes.... Mollique Wm. Schulze.
4. { Adagio, from the Second Quintette in B flat, op. 87 Mendelssohn Song without words in G. No 4, 5th book Mendelssohn
Arranged for Quintette, by Thomas Ryan.
5. Octette, in F. op. 166..... F. Schubert
Scherzo, and Finale, Adagio and Allegro.

The first of the two might have received in the pp. passages and in those places where staccato notes occur more attention from some of the performers. The portion of the Octette from the Scherzo beginning, which was the only one performed, was played finely. So were the other pieces, Mr. Schulze rendering his solo with the true Hungarian impetuosity. At the close of the concert the gentlemen played patriotic airs to the great acceptance of the company, who rising to their feet applauded heartily, almost succeeding in an encore.

MISS MARY FAY'S MATINEE, took place at the Hall of the Messrs. Chickering at noon on Saturday, April 20th. We were not personally present, but learn from a friend that the audience was much pleased with the performance, in which Miss Fay was assisted by Messrs. LANG, EICHBERG and FRIES.

1. Piano Trio in C minor (Op. 49)..... Mendelssohn
2. Allegro et tto—Andante con moto—Scherzo—Allegro
3. Reminiscences de Linda de Lammermoor..... Liszt
4. Andante con Variazioni, from Sonata in A dur (Op. 47)..... Beethoven
5. Bolero..... Hiller
6. Grand Fantaisie on Norma, for two pianos..... Thalberg
7. Fantaisie on Mozart's Egypt..... Thalberg

A musical friend reports to us his utter astonishment at an occurrence which ought not to go unnoticed. This most unusual feat was the introduction of the wonderful variations from Beethoven's Kreutzer-Sonata by some measures of a tune commonly called "Dixie." We should really like to know what object the fair concert-giver had in doing so? Other comments seem to be unnecessary.

THE ORPHEUS MUSICAL ASSOCIATION gave a concert on Saturday evening, April the 20th, at the Music Hall, assisted by Mrs. KEMPTON and Mr. Wm. SCHULZE.

- PART I.
1. Chorus—The Lord is my Shepherd..... Schubert (281 Psalm.)
2. Aria—From Tannhauser..... Wagner C. Schraubstaedter.
3. Chorus—Abschied vom Walde..... A. Kreissmann
4. Cavatina—All Seelato..... Mercadante Mrs. Kempton.
5. Chorus—She is mine..... Hartel
6. Fantaisie on a Scotch theme, for the violin..... David Wm. Schulze.
7. Aria—From "Die Entführung"..... Mozart A. Kreissmann.
8. Walzer—(By request)..... Vogel
- PART II.
1. Chorus—The Cheerful Wanderer..... Mendelssohn
2. Song—O Welcome Fair Woods..... Franz A. Kreissmann.
3. Chorus—"Das Kirchlein"..... Becker
4. Quartette—Serenade..... A. Kreissmann (By request.)
5. Song—We met by Chance..... Kücken Mrs. Kempton.
6. Trio—From "Die Entführung"..... Mozart Messrs. Kreissmann, W. and C. Schraubstaedter.
7. Chorus—Auf den Bergen..... Abt

They sang the choruses and solos with their usual excellence. Mrs. Kempton in the song by KÜCKEN and in the second verse of the Star Spangled Banner, which was substituted for the Chorus of Abt, retarded and accelerated the movement constantly. We think this wrong. Such simple airs as that by Kücken and people's songs require as much of evenness, naturalness and simplicity in their rendering, as compatible with sentiment and expression.

Mr. Schulze played a difficult solo by Concertmeister DAVID of Leipzig finely, and with commendable purity of intonation. Mr. Kreissmann sang "O welcome fair woods," beautifully.

The concert was given for a benevolent object, in aid of the Christian Unity, a society for the assistance of the poor, of which Rev. E. E. Hale has the management, and we are told there were tickets enough sold to fill the hall; but it was the day after the second battle of Lexington, and in such times cannon and drums are more congenial sounds than the sweet concord of tones.

THE WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERT, April 24th, was well attended. The programme was excellent.

- PART I.
1. Overture—"Coriolanus"..... Beethoven
2. Concert Waltz—"Marian"..... Lanner
3. Symphony, No. 8—(Scotch)..... Mendelssohn By request. (Op. 70.)
- PART II.
1. Marcia Funebre..... Chopin (By request.) Arranged for the Orchestral Union by Kopplis.
2. Solo on the English Horn Performed by A. L. DeRibas.
3. New Polka—"Apropos"..... F. Suck

In this point, indeed, these concerts are unsurpassable, considering the price of admission. To have Coriolanus, Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony and Chopin's funeral march in one afternoon is a boon to music-lovers. As to this last piece we would say, that the first part, in B flat minor, which sounds by far better on the piano, than in the arrangement, might be made more effective by the bass instruments holding the B flat D flat of the bass, extending over the first 14 measures, their full length. The upsoaring phrase in D flat major, which follows on the contrary sounds better with the orchestra than on the piano. The second part, in D flat major, might have been played somewhat more tenderly and softly. And this is a remark which we have to make with regard to the playing of the orchestra generally. We find that pianissimos, even pianos are frequently left unheeded, the piano often sounding as loud as mezzo-forte ought to sound. It was noticeable in BEETHOVEN's eighth symphony, they played some weeks ago, and again very strongly in the MENDELSSOHN symphonies, the Italian and the Scotch. Fine effects are constantly lost in this way. To quote but one instance in the place of many. The fine climax at the beginning of the second part of the symphony where the rising of the angry winds and the turbulent waves is depicted in tones, from the perfect, hushed, expectant lull to the furious outbreak, was spoiled in this way by beginning mezzo-forte instead of pianissimo. The only part perfectly free from this neglect, and in this respect coming up to the expectations of the most exact critic, was the second movement, which delighted us much. And the second melody was as fine a pianissimo, even after the string quartette was joined by the reeds and brass, as one could desire. It is to be hoped that the Union will pay more attention to this point for the sake of the immortal masters and their own. Mr. Suck's Polka has some fine parts. Mr. RIBAS' solo on the English Horn was deservedly much applauded. #†

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, APRIL 22.—Mr. F. L. Ritter, leader of the St. Cecilia Society, gave a "Concert Symphonique" at the new hall of the Catholic Institute, on last Thursday evening. It was Mr. Ritter's intention to have made this concert the first of a series, the programmes of each composed of the chefs d'œuvre of the best masters; but the great political excitement that now absorbs all minor interests, may probably interfere with his plan.

Mozart's Symphony in F minor, Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Mendelssohn's "Athalia" march, Kalliwoda's Concert Overture; these were the orchestral selections, smoothly played by an orchestra of twenty-six members.

Howard Vaughan gave us a concerto by De Beriot; this young violinist is an acceptable soloist and will prove a valuable addition to our small number of reliable orchestra players. Weber's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was played with considerable aplomb by Mr. H. G. Andras.

This concert, wholly as regards the selections, and partly as regards the execution of these, was the best we have had here for years. Such a programme as that of Thursday, refines the taste of the public and excites respect for the artists concerned in its arrangement and execution. Such noble music is a delight at any time; but in an hour of feverish anxiety like the present, it is a peaceful and elevating relief to ear, mind, and heart.

In spite of telegrams, and the patriotic volunteering, drilling, leave-taking, &c., going forward, the attendance at this concert was numerous and encouraging.

The new hall possesses admirable acoustic properties—at least so far as the orchestra is concerned. ARABESQUE.

Chopin's Mazurkas and Waltzes.

Our publishers have just issued a volume containing the Mazurkas and Waltzes of Chopin, which are universally recognized as among the most brilliant and beautiful works that have been added to the repertoire of the modern pianist. It is needless here and now to go into any description of these compositions, many of which are familiar to every accomplished pianist and to every intelligent listener to concerts of the best music. It is sufficient to say that the volume under notice is neatly printed, as our readers who recollect the specimen pages that have occasionally appeared in this Journal will admit, on good fair white paper, and neatly bound in cloth. Liszt's article upon Chopin, which appeared some years ago in these columns, is prefixed to the volume. Many of our readers will recollect this interesting criticism, which gives an idea of the personal qualities of the composer himself, by one who, of all men, was most fitted by nature, by kindred pursuits and by culture, to appreciate the rare genius of the composer and to describe him to others, so that they too might understand the character of the man and of his works. A biographical sketch of Chopin, by Mr. Davison, is also prefixed to the volume, adding much to its interest and value. We give in our music pages this week a waltz taken from this volume, (Op. 64, No. 3).

DR. GUILMETTE'S LECTURE ON VOCAL CULTURE.

—Having been prevented from attending this lecture, we copy from a daily paper, the following notice. We learn that Dr. G. has formed classes for instruction in this matter, so vitally important to every public singer and speaker, and indeed to every one, if considered simply in its relations to health and vigorous life.

A few days since we had occasion to commend a pamphlet on Vocal Culture, by Dr. Guilmette, of New York. On Tuesday evening we had the pleasure of hearing him expound and illustrate his views, in a lecture, at Chickering's room. His audience, as might be expected at a time when the minds of men are absorbed by one exciting theme, was small, but highly attentive and appreciating. The lecturer's personal appearance is of a kind which at once arrests and commands attention. He is a little below the average stature, but his massive build creates the impression of height. A striking head and face rises from shoulders of Atlantean breadth; and his deep, cubic chest is a practical commendation of his system of gymnastic training. The purity of his tone, and the distinctness of his enunciation, approved themselves to the ear as much as his aspect did to the sight. His English is nearly perfect in structure, and only a very slight foreign accent is perceptible. He commenced by asking the indulgence of the audience for the nervous exhaustion under which he was laboring, on account of the severe labors he had recently been through; but his fatigue was revealed only a very deliberate and quiet manner, which was exactly to our taste, and entirely appropriate to the matter of his lecture, which was entirely didactic and expository.

He proceeded to give an anatomical description of the organs of speech, aided by a model, in illustration of the cardinal doctrine of his system, that the voice is simply vocal breath. There is no analogy between the organs of speech and any stringed instrument. His expositions were very clear, and made extremely interesting by the model used in illustration. He explained the functions of the windpipe, the lungs, and the diaphragm in the production of vocal and articulate sounds; denying the assumed importance of the abdominal muscles. He gave a brief sketch of the literature of the subject; characterizing the writers who had treated of the voice, and stating their merits and defects. Many curious experiments were performed; and the lecturer gave a practical exemplification of his own capacity of expiration and inspiration. The latter part of the lecture was mainly occupied with a practical explanation of the various exercises used by the lecturer in his teachings, for the improvement of the vocal organs, and the strengthening of the muscles of the chest.

Dr. Guilmette combines qualities not usually met together. He is a good anatomist and physiologist, and also a professional singer of a high order. His lecture was at once instructive and interesting; free from everything rhetorical or extravagant; and his manner we should characterize in one word as very gentlemanly. We regret that he has come among us at a time so inauspicious to himself.

That Haydn—despite the old maestro's supposed harangue on the imitative powers of music—cherished a certain weakness for mimetic effects in orchestral composition, more than one mature production of his will sufficiently prove. Madame de Staël records how her enjoyment of the performance of his "Creation," at Vienna, by a band of four hundred, was marred by some of the composer's crotchets (not technically speaking). How at the words, "let there be light: and there was light," the instruments played at first very softly, so as scarcely to be heard, and then suddenly broke out into a tumultuous crash, to signify the genesis of the daylight:—upon which stroke of art a certain wit, homme d'esprit, pleased madame by observing that "à l'apparition de la lumière il fallait se boucher les oreilles." Then again Staël the Epicene, as Byron rather ambidextrously styles her, noted with disapproval how the music trailed and dragged while the serpents were being created, and recovered its brilliancy and animation with the birth-song of the birds. In Haydn's "Seasons," she complains, these allusions are multiplied exceedingly: concerti she calls them, which a healthy taste would reject. Not but that certain combinations of harmony can recall some of nature's many marvels, but these analogies (she maintains) have no reference to imitation, which is never anything better than a jeu factice.

The real resemblances among the fine arts one with another, and those which exist between the fine arts and nature, are dependent upon feelings of the same kind as those excited by them in our souls by a variety of means. One cannot but agree with Lady Eastlake that Haydn's servile representations of the tiger's leaps, of the stag's branching horns, of the pattering hail—why he gave a pert staccato triplet accompaniment to the rolling of "awful thunder" is not so easily accounted for. —are so many blots on his glorious "Creation." The verdure-clad fields, the purling brook, the mild light of the moon as she "glides through the silent night," delight us not so much from the correctness of the musical image, for the same music would express other words, as from the intrinsic sweetness of the melody, the exquisite song with which Haydn always overflows. But, as Lady Eastlake adds, his "rising sun with daring rays" is an utter failure—and is by her compared to a watchman's lantern striking down a dark alley, not the orb of day illuminating the earth.

Again, in the fine trio, "Most beautiful appear," while the bass voice sings the words, "Upheaved from the deep, the immense leviathan sports on the foaming wave," the lashing of the water by the animal's tail, as Mr. Hogarth remarks, is imitated by some whisking passages on the double-bass. "Then we have the roar of the lion, the sudden leaps of the tiger, the galloping of the horse, the whirl of the cloud of insects, and the crawling of the reptile. Nothing can be more ingenious than these imitative passages; but then they are amusing, which nothing ought to be in a work of this exalted class."

That Mr. Hogarth, provided the amusing be excluded, can go far enough in his estimate of music's potential imitativeness, is clear from his criticism on Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. In that work he tells us we seem to feel the freshness of a summer morning—to hear the rustling of the breeze, the waving of the woods, the cheerful notes of the birds, and the cries of the animals; to stray along the margin of a meandering brook, and listen to the murmuring of its waters; to join a group of villagers, keeping holiday with joyous songs and dances; to watch the sky grow dark, hear the thunder growl, and witness a storm burst on the alarmed rustics, whose cries of dismay are audible amid the elemental strife. "The clouds pass away, the muttering of the thunder is more and more distant, all becomes quiet and placid, and the stillness is broken by the pastoral song of gratitude. Nothing can be more beautiful or more true to nature than every part of the representation. It requires no explanation, but places every image before the mind with a distinctness which neither poetry nor painting could surpass, and with a beauty which neither of them could equal." It was remarked at the time, by an Edinburgh Reviewer, that in this passage the enthusiasm of the author had carried him off his feet; and that the concluding part of the last sentence put one not a little in mind of a certain captain mentioned in "Peter Simple," who describes his mother as being so splendid a pianoforte player, that upon one occasion, when she was delighting her friends with her performance, she introduced an imitation of thunder so exquisite, that the cream for tea became sour, besides three casks of beer in the cellar. The reviewer insists that this is scarcely more ludicrous than it is to say, that the descriptive powers of the Sinfonia Pastorale, great as they undoubtedly are, or any instrumental music unaccompanied by words, ever can place imagery before the mind, with a distinctness equal to poetry or painting. Beethoven himself, it is added in corroboration of this view, has furnished us with an explanation, in words, of the different scenes he intended to delineate; which implies his consciousness, that the graphic power of his pencil, without such explanations, could never be made to convey any definite idea of visual objects, or to give anything more than the general character of certain emotions, or to excite certain trains of association.† For executants of Lieder ohne Worte, who claim to see a perfect and unmistakable meaning in every bar, need to be reminded, in their too far-reaching clairvoyance, of the subjective philosophy of Coleridge's line,

O lady, we receive but what we give.

Grant that music may be said to paint nature: but how? Rousseau says that it commonly abandons the impossible attempt to paint nature direct, for the practicable one of throwing our feelings, by means all her own, into a state resembling that which the object to be painted would actually produce. Instead of painting a tranquil night, which is in itself impossible, music imparts to the soul the same sensation, by exciting the self-same feelings that a tranquil night is apt to inspire.

Goethe's way towards fixing an "aesthetic base" for music, in the shape of certain axioms which assume that it must be either sacred or profane, either solemn altogether or altogether joyous, has naturally been contested with spirit. M. Chasles, in his impeachment of it—beginning, "What! music can be nothing but either joyous or solemn! The expression of impassioned love and of tender melancholy pertains not to music! The wailings of wounded spirit are beyond its range!" &c., &c.,—goes on to maintain, that music is on the contrary, an almost infinite science, the domain whereof let no Goethe dare restrict or curtail; and concludes: "There are but two usurpations which must be forbidden to music:—the pretence of painting to the eye, which is an absurd trespass on the grounds of painting itself, and that of reasoning, which is a silly aggression on the province of thought."‡

Gustave Planche, again, in his critique on Mozart's masterpiece, argues at some length the question of the limits of musical expression. To seek in music for a means by which to translate the human passions, individually, one by one; to try to express by sounds, not only the tumultuous movements of the soul in their most striking generality, but also the details, and minutiae even, of those movements,—is nothing less, in M. Planche's opinion, than to ignore or betray the mission of musical art. But, on the other hand, to see in music a mere amusement, more or less lively, an occupation for the ear only and not at all for the brain; to exclude passion from the orchestra and from the voice; to derive nothing in the combination of sounds, beyond an ingenious artifice, designed to produce certain impressions which sometimes excite to an intoxicating degree, which at others are so voluptuous and nonchalantes as to induce balmy sleep; this he accounts a no less important mistake. He would have a musician abstain from trying to express, in dramatic music, sentiments of a limited or exact kind; such, for instance, as ambition or jealousy; and to choose the most general and indefinite, the most constant and vivid, of emotions, such as joy, anger, tenderness, and never to risk an entrance on those narrower routes which can be trod by the poet alone without stumbling.¶

For music, as all but those who have no music in their souls well know, is capable, in the words of Hartley Coleridge, of expressing and evoking any simple emotion; it may imitate the rapid succession or dazzling alternation of feeling, or, dying away to silence, may symbolise the fading of passion into pensiveness. It may also, to a certain extent, he says, express action, as action consists in motion; but beyond this it cannot go. "It cannot narrate, describe, or reason. It is of little assistance to the understanding, and though it may stimulate, it cannot inform the imagination. True, words may supply all these deficiencies, and true, there is no narrative, description, reasoning, or imagination, that is truly poetical, but what involves or engenders a pleasurable feeling, nor any feeling of which some modification of numerous sounds is not a conductor. But, nevertheless, those compositions will be found best accommodated to musical expression, for which music supplies a natural and universal language, and such are love, grief, and devotion; because in all these the feeling suggests the thoughts, and not the thoughts or imagery the feeling." These remarks are apropos of certain analogies of expression between music and poetry. and an anonymous essayist of Hartley Coleridge's school (if not Hartley himself), in a tractate on Poetical Description, has pronounced the imitative quality of poetry to differ altogether from that of painting, but to bear a strong analogy to that of music, her consort sister in days of old. While painting, as he says, "acts immediately upon the eye, and only mediately upon the intellect, music and poetry pay their first addresses to the ear, and both are capable of suggesting infinitely more than words can say. "Painting provides ready-made images. Poetry, like music, disposes the soul to be imaginative, by exciting sympathy." Virgil's line, imitatively graphic, with its five dactyles in a row.

Quadrupedante putrem sonitū quatit ungula campum, is meant to express the thundering gallop of horse, as Mr. deQuincey points out, in which the beats of the hoof return with regular intervals; and Homer in a celebrated line has sought to express mimetically the rolling, thundering, leaping motion of a stone. The critic just named assumes either poet to have sought a picturesque effect; but he reminds us that picturesqueness, like any other effect, must be subordinated to a higher law of beauty. "Whence, indeed, it is that the very limits of imitation arise for every art, sculpture, painting, &c., indicating what it ought not to imitate. And unless regard is had to such higher restraints, metrical effects become as silly and childish as the musical effect in Kotzwarra's "Battle of Prague," with its ridiculous attempts to mimic the firing of cannon, groans of the wounded, &c., instead of involving the passion of a battle in the agitation of the music."†† Yet how many of us, in our pianoforte days, held those "Battle of Prague" mimicries to be first-rate, and declared the accuracy of imitation to be perfect—especially (what we knew such a deal about) the cries of the wounded. Was it not your case, madam?—unless indeed you are, happily, one of a generation that are yet in their teens. You were impressed by the old-fashioned mimetics of that ambitious exercise, for they were impressed by the old-fashioned mimetics of that ambitious exercise, for they were childish and you were a child. And when you were a child, you, like others, apostles included, thought as a child, spoke as a child, understood as a child; but now that you are become a—woman of a certain age, you have long ago put away childish things, among them the "Battle of Prague." You will never wear pinafore or fight that battle o'er again.

Art, according to Goethe's English biographer, is picture painting, not picture writing. "Beethoven in his Symphonies, may have expressed grand psychological conceptions, which, for the mind that interprets them, may give an extra charm to strains of ravishment; but if the strains in themselves do not possess a magic, if they do not sting the soul with a keen delight, then let the meaning be never so profound, it will pass unheeded, because the primary requisite of music is not that it shall present grand thoughts, but that it shall agitate the soul with musical emotions."*

Music, then, must tell on the feelings to be music at all. And as an instrument of expression, it deals with feelings in general classes, not in individual illustrations. Sydney Smith rules that music "can express only classes of feelings; it can express only melancholy, not any particular instance or action of melancholy." The tune of Lochaber no more, for example, is referred to, as expressing the pathetic in general; actual words must be employed before we can recognise in it that particular instance of the pathetic, where a poor soldier takes leave of his native shore, and his wife Jean, with a presentiment that he shall see them never again. Whenever we hear an air to which we know no words, it can inspire only general emotion; when poetry applies the general emotion to particular instances, musical expression has attained its maxim of effect. It is said, continues the portly priest of St. Paul's, "that the 'Pastorale,' of Corelli was intended for an imitation of the song of angels hovering about the fields of Bethlehem, and gradually soaring up to heaven; it is impossible, however, that the music itself can convey any such expression—it can convey only the feelings of solemnity, of rapture, of enthusiasm; imagination must do the rest."‡ Had the Reverend Sydney happened to be in his average mood of jocularity, one can imagine the exuberance of fun he could have poked at, or out of the pseudo-pastoral theory about Corelli's Pastorale.

A fellow reviewer of his, starting from the same text, of Scottish melodies, indulged in some reasonable strictures on that craving for novelty which has led composers into the field where music is weakest,—that of direct imitation of natural sounds by musical notes,—a species of rivalry, the hopelessness of which makes us feel the good sense of Agesilaus' answer, when asked to hear a man sing who could imitate the nightingale,—"I have heard the nightingale herself." Musicians are shown to have attempted not merely to imitate sounds by notes, but even to represent motion—to describe the seasons—to convey the impressions of color—or even to narrate the incidents of a battle or a campaign; for the ingenious organist of Ferdinand III., Froberger, is said to have presented a very striking musical representation of Count Thurn's passage over the Rhine, and the danger of the transit, "in twenty-six cataracts, or falls of notes."§ Indeed, adds our reviewer, "when a taste for this sort of mimetic music is once introduced (the proper sphere of which would be the comic opera), it is wonderful how even the greatest genius gives way to the contagion, and follows the herd,—for a greater than Froberger, Handel, has now and then ventured upon similar tricks of sound. In the 'Messiah,' at the passage, 'I will shake the heavens and the earth,' he has introduced a sort of musical pun, by repeating the word several times on a chain of musical shakes, 'as if,' says a critic, 'the quivering of the voice could represent the commotions of the world.' And in his 'Israel in Egypt,' he has undertaken to represent, by musical notes, two of the plagues of Egypt, viz. the buzzing of flies and the hopping of frogs."¶

‡ Compare, or contrast, with this cavil at Haydn's Fiat Lux, the following ardent tribute to the present King of Hanover:

"But, above all, how impressively, with all the powers of music, does the composer delineate the moment—And there was light—called forth by the creative words Let there be light! At these words the orchestra breaks out in a truly electrical manner, producing an entire bewilderment. The listener feels the full impression which the actual happening of this awe-inspiring miracle of the Almighty would make upon him, and that sublime achievement is thus most speakingly and convincingly brought home to the senses of the earthly man, through this picturing by tones, in the only mode in which a sensible image of it could be presented to him."—Ideen und Betrachtungen über die Eigenschaften der Musik. Hannover, 1830.

To which estimate of a musical Monarch may be here appended that of a critical Queen's Counsel:—

"The burst of a fine orchestra will seldom fail to produce an electrical rush of feeling, faintly reflective of the actual occurrence of the miracle; but the sole resemblance will be found to consist in the fullness and suddenness of the shock."—Hayward's Biog. and Crit. Essays, II. 223.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

If thou must sing to-night. Molière. 25

By the composer of the sterling oratorio of "Abraham" lately received in England with the greatest praise. A master-hand shows itself in trifles as in the above song.

Commencement Day. (Greeting and Valedictory). For a Young Ladies' School. E. Falk. 1,25

A composition, which, we should think, meets a great want. It is just the thing for the occasion. The whole is effectively devised, and although written for female voices only, yet by interspersed solos for various classes of voices, change of rhythm, &c., the interest is constantly kept up. The melodies are well invented.

Instrumental Music.

America. Brilliant transcriptions of Hail Columbia, Star Spangled Banner and Yankee Doodle. Charles Foss, each 35

Fine arrangements, such as every good player should now-a-days have at his fingers' ends. They are short and to the point. The well-known airs come out with all the brilliancy modern pianism can give them. They are treated in truly grand style, yet only moderately difficult.

St. Petersburg Quadrille. (Colored Vignette.) D'Albert. 50

A stirring Quadrille of this favorite writer of Dance music introducing national airs of Russia. The title-page is handsomely illustrated with a colored view of the palace-studded capital of Russia.

Rainbow Waltz. L. O. Whitney. 25

A pleasing piece of moderate difficulty.

Galop from the "Masked Ball." Verdi. 25

The capital Galop in the famous ball-scene of the last act, a piece which is remembered with pleasure by every one who has witnessed the opera.

Books.

COMPLETE COLLECTION OF MAZURKAS AND WALTZES. By Frederic Chopin. To which is prefixed his Biography and a critical review of his works, by Fr. Liszt. Bound in cloth. 3,00

Of these brilliant and altogether inimitable productions of the subtle genius of Chopin, Mr. Davidson, the eminent English critic, and editor of the London Musical World, says: "Chopin excelled less in works of long measure than in those of smaller pretensions. His Valse, his Nocturnes, and, above all, his Mazurkas, are quite enough to save him from oblivion. The variety with which in the Mazurkas he has said the same thing some fifty times over, will go further than anything else to prove that Chopin's genius was decidedly inventive. Some of them are gems, as faultless as they are attractive; others are less happy, but not one of them is destitute of points that appeal to the feeling, surprise by their unexpectedness, fascinate by their plaintive character, or charm by their ingenuity." It may be well here to remark that this is the only really complete edition of both Mazurkas and Waltzes, ever published. The publishers have taken the greatest possible precaution to guard against errors, and can safely pronounce this edition correct.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

COMIC OPERA.

We come now to Adrien Boieldieu one of the first glories of the French school. He was born at Rouen, December 15, 1775, son of a secretary to the archbishop, and began life as a singing boy in the cathedral. He was a pupil of Broche, the organist of the church, whose pitilessness and severity filled "little Boiel" with such terror at even the sight of him, that one day, having accidentally let a drop of ink upon a book belonging to his ferocious master, he fled alone on foot to Paris to escape the danger to which he was exposed. At the age of sixteen he was already a very fair performer upon the pianoforte, possessed happy melodic ideas and some slight knowledge of harmony.

Meantime a passion for the theatre was becoming strong. His slight savings were used only to enable him to hear the works of Gretry, Dalayrac and Mehul; and often for want of money he contrived means to hide in the theatre, during the morning before a performance.

A comic opera, which had proved successful at Rouen decided Boieldieu to go and try his success in Paris. He therefore disappeared one day at the age of nineteen from his father's house with his score under his arm, thirty francs in his pocket and hope in his heart. On the second day he entered Paris, covered with dirt and worn out with the fatigue of his foot-journey. The Opera Comique was naturally not anxious to put a work of an unknown author upon the stage; he had therefore nothing to do but wait, search for a new text, give lessons and for want of scholars to tune pianofortes.

He had however faith in himself. The Erards received him kindly and he also made the acquaintance of Rode, Garat, Mehul and Cherubini. He began to have a reputation in society. Garat and all the amateurs delighted in singing his graceful romances, for which his publisher paid him the insignificant sum of twelve francs each. In 1795 Fiévée gave him to compose la Dot de Suzette, a little opera in one act, which had a success, thanks to the freshness of the music and to the fine and spirited performance of Madame Saint Aubin. The next year Boieldieu composed La Famille suisse, a score in which reigned a style simple and natural, and a charming gracefulness.

In 1798 Zoraine et Zulmare, a drama in 3 acts, established the author's position upon the stage of the Theatre Feydeau. At the same time his instrumental works,—a concerto for the pianoforte, sonatas 1, 3, 4, 6, 7 and 8, four duets for the harp and pianoforte, concerto for the harp, and three trios for harp, pianoforte and violoncello—led to his admission into the number of the professors of the pianoforte at the conservatory Beniowsky, and le Calife de Bagdad—the latter of which has been performed over seven hundred times, fixed forever the high reputation of the composer. In 1802 Ma Tante Aurore was the fashion to an unexampled degree; but Boieldieu, unhappy in marriage, which had joined him, March 19, of that year, with the danseuse Clotilde, went off to Russia in April, 1803. The Emperor Alexander gave him the appointment of chapelmaster, on having met him upon the frontier, and the composer wrote for the imperial theatre of St. Petersburg Rien de trop, la jeune Femme colere (a comedy by Etienne), Amour et Mystere, Abderkan (text by Andieux), Calypso, Aline reine Golconde, les Voitures versées, Un Tour de soubrette and music to the choruses of Athalie.

The political clouds between France and Russia having been dissipated, Boieldieu felt a desire to see France again; he obtained his dismissal towards the close of the year 1810, after seven years' residence in St. Petersburg. On reaching Paris he found the sceptre of the Opera Comique in the hands of Nicolo. Dalayrac was no more; Catal had nearly given up composition; Cherubini, disgusted with the obstacles which met him in his career, had ceased to write; Mehul displeased with the inconstancy of the public seldom gave a new work to the stage. Nicolo alone exhibited an inexhaustible fecundity; it was in contesting the field with his new rival, that Boieldieu's genius took a novel and magnificent flight. Two female singers at this time divided the favor of the Parisian public; one Madame Duret possessed a voice of great extent, sonorous and, even but slightly thick and her respiration was short; the other, M^{lle} Regnault (afterwards Madame Lemonnier) had a charming voice, great intelligence and a marvellous facility of vocalization. Nicolo had given both opportunity to distinguish themselves in his Cendrillon; but the preferred the talents of Madame Duret which was one reason for Boieldieu to give M^{lle} Regnault the powerful aid of his genius. Jean de Paris, represented early in 1812, obtained a splendid success at the Theatre Feydeau; Elleviou, Martin, Juliet, M^{lle} Regnault, and Mad. Gavaudan seconded the composer by an irreproachable execution. The connoisseurs noticed in the score a correct style, and an instrumentation brilliant and full of color. Le Nouveau Seigneur de Village, performed in 1813, gave its auditors a new model of scenic perfection. Then followed a number of occasional pieces, after which the public received with great applause La Fête du Village voisin. Notwithstanding the poverty of the text, the music embroidered upon that canvass is full of spirit and melody. Boieldieu had aided Herold in gaining a footing upon the stage by writing with him the opera Charles de France; at a later date too he sought and obtained for Catal the cross of the Legion of Honor.

In 1817, after Mehul's death, the Institute having elected Boieldieu to the vacant chair, the new member felt himself obliged to justify their choice by a new masterpiece. Le chaperon rouge (July, 1818) was a perfect triumph. Its style is grander, ideas more abundant, and color more varied than in the author's preceding works. But the great labor bestowed upon it, threw Boieldieu into a state of health, which made a long period of rest necessary. For a time he retired into the country; but, being appointed a professor of composition in the Conservatory, he amused and recreated himself by imparting to the young pupils the result of his long experience.

In 1821 he joined Kreutzer, Berton, Cherubini, and Paër in the composition of Blanche de Provence. In 1824, he composed also one act of Pharamond. At this time Boieldieu doubtful of the public favor hesitated to re-enter the theatre with a work entirely of his own composition.

Guilbert de Pixérécourt, then director of the Opera Comique, persuaded him with much difficulty to make the experiment, and Boieldieu composed La Dame blanche which was received with unanimous transports of enthusiasm, Dec. 10, 1825.

This masterpiece has never left the stage and is, we believe the only work, which never was omitted from the list of acting works after its first representation. Nothing new can be said upon its solo pieces, its duets, trios, chorus and finales. It belongs to that type of the Comic opera which can never grow old, no more than Richard, le Deserteur, Montano, and Joconde. Simple its modulations, with no forced harmonies, and full of real melody, this score retains the grand style of its author, who remains always himself, in the midst of the general movement impressed upon the music of that time by the influence of Rossini. But in this work Boieldieu's power culminated; he dreaded the idea of producing inferior works.

He therefore caused the text of des Deux Nuits, entrusted to him by Bouilly to be revised by Scribe. But notwithstanding skilful and extensive changes, the play did not completely satisfy the public, upon its production in 1829. Hope deceived gradually brought Boieldieu to the tomb. Having resigned his place as professor pecuniary anxiety as to the future was added to laryngial pthisis. He made a journey to Pisa without benefit. Forced at length to return to his employment as professor, his health grew still more feeble. The baths of the South were ordered him; but reaching Bordeaux, he became frightened at the progress of his disease, and returned to his country seat at Jarcy near Grosbois where he breathed his last in the arms of his family and friends, Oct. 8, 1834.

The present King of Hanover signalized himself, while Crown Prince, by a treatise on Music, which advances not a few rather hazardous interpretations of imitative effects. His Majesty's blindness may have tended to intensify his quickness of ear, in catching at remote resemblances, and hearing a voice we cannot hear, and understanding in detail what only affects us in the mass.

This exceptional acuteness is observable in some at least, of his musical hermeneutics, while in others he but expresses what the average mind may be presumed to feel. One or two of his favorite examples may be worth glancing at. In Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" the royal critic sees presented the pride of a ruler, the arrogance of a priest, the affection severally of a father, mother, and daughter, the gentle ties of love, the courage of a hero, a people's cry for vengeance, the pains of separation, the agonies of death, the exulting overflow of rapture at unlooked-for deliverance, all exhibited not only with "inimitable art," but with incomparable completeness. Weber's "Summons to the Dance," as a musical representation of an incident in social life, is alleged to be remarkable for the truth and precision with which all the peculiarities and trifling occurrences of a ball are sketched; "the invitation of the gentleman, the acceptance of the lady, the dance itself, the conversation during the interval, the repetition of the dance, and the leading back of the lady to her seat, with the grateful acknowledgments of the gentleman—all this is accurately conveyed to the ear of the listener by the music." Est-il possible? may some stolid souls exclaim, who never expected a tithe of the meaning in Weber's pièce de circonstance. But all this comes of having good ears, and a working brain between them; just as some ingenious criticism on Shakespeare's text, or Spenser's, may be due to good eyes, not only of microscopic but of milestone piercing power. But once again, and more seriously; in the introduction to "Norma," we are told, may be found "the representation of a neighboring wood in the most exalted style of art. Beginning with deep tones, it unfolds in gloom-inspiring harmonies, and truly reflects the impression which the gloom of an extensive wood produces on our feelings. Occasional glancing and disconnected tones appear to betoken light, breaking through the darkness of the grove; and this is the first drop-scene of the opera—the grove of sacrifice—fitly delineated. Assuredly the striking qualities of this tone picture will still more forcibly suggest themselves to the reader, when I mention the exclamation of a person deprived of sight, who on first hearing this introduction, instantly exclaimed that the scene then actually represented on the stage must be a forest." The prince's Quarterly Reviewer inferred that he was doubtless himself the blind listener in question, and accepted the fact as one no-way surprising; for with an ear cultivated to the highest degree of delicacy, a memory stored with images of natural beauty, and a heart overflowing with sympathy, the slightest, faintest, train of association—a passage, note, or tone, indicating any one of the characteristic features of forest scenery—might suffice,

And as a sort to which belongers win
Unhoped-for entrance thro' some friend within;
One clear idea, center'd in the breast,
By memory's magic, lets in all the rest.

"But when it is formally inferred, from anomalous instances of this kind, that a succession of sensible images, including both sounds with their varieties and landscapes with their details may be brought home to the ordinary run (or even to any considerable class) of listeners, through the medium of instrumental music, our thoughts recur involuntarily to Dick Tinto's picture, or Lord Burleigh's nod, or those victims of mesmerism who undertake to ascertain the contents of a long letter by sitting on it. Set a chosen body of connoisseurs to hear Beethoven's 'Symphony' or 'Weber's Summons to the Dance' for the first time, without telling them what the composer is aiming at, and we much doubt whether they will exclaim in chorus, at the proper time, 'That is a troop of reapers, and that the rippling of a brook!' 'Now the storm is coming on, and now it is going off!' 'Now they are flirting between the dances, and now he is taking her back to her mamma!' It might be edifying to summon a large jury of good men and true, in matters musical—say a septuagint of them—to investigate the meaning of some fresh and untried Lied ohne Worte, in all its broad lights and supersubtle shades of symbolism and significance—to shut them up, each man in a separate cell, like the Seventy of Alexandria, and require from each man separately a full and particular account of what language the music under examination did verily speak. The result—an amalgam of three-score and ten interpretations—would surprise some people, the composer himself not the least; for he, honest man, would no doubt be quite as much astonished at finding all he meant, without meaning it, as ever was Monsieur Jourdain himself, at the incredible apocalypse of his lifelong (but hitherto unconscious and unpremeditated) achievements in prose.

Knowing ones there are, beyond all question, connoisseurs and something more, who could throw new and dazzling light on the meaning mentally attached by Mendelssohn to every movement in his overtures, say, for example, that to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." Neither would they be persuaded though he rose from the dead to deny it. Of course that allegro vivace is Philostrate (master of the revels) stirring up the Athenian youth to merriment. Of course that pomposo passage is Theseus wedding Hippolyta with pomp, with triumph, and with revelling. That roulade is Puck putting a girdle about the earth in forty minutes. That prestante bit is Helena on the scamper after Demetrius. That moto contrario expresses the perplexity and cross-purpose of the lovers in the wood. Surely you recognize at once in that fantastico interval the craze of Titania for ass-headed Bottom? And who can fail to identify that carezzando movement with her stroking his amiable cheeks, and sticking musk-roses in his sleek smooth head, and kissing the fair large ears of him, her gentle joy? As unmistakably does that asprezza betoken the coarse prosaic manner of bully Bottom, as though he were actually (as he wished) munching your good dry oats, and disposing audibly of a peck of provender or a bottle of hay. That allegro vivo as literally represents the ministrations of Peasblossom, Cobweb, Moth, and Mustard-seed. Nor less manifestly does that burlando or burlesco import the performance, by Quince & Co., of the most lamentable comedy and most cruel death of Pyramus and Thisbe—including the agitato of the nervous Prologue, the debile of Flute's small voice, the furioso of Bottom's bluster, and the con veemenza of Lion's roar.

It has been observed by one whose words come with authority, on a subject like this, that, properly speaking, the whole science of music is a storehouse hung round with materials of expression and imitation, for the use of the composer; but it depends upon his instinctive feelings whether the object to which he devotes them lie within the legitimate province of music. "Delusion in music, as in painting, is only the delight of the vulgar." We may love the idea of the dance conveyed in a light, tripping measure, or the "sense of the fresh echoing greenwood given by prolonged bugle-like tones;" but we have another feeling for the mimicry, instrumental or vocal, of the greenwood choir, pretty warblers as they are. Let not him therefore who, in this sort of servile imitation, and mechanical mimicry, would tune his merry note

Unto the sweet bird's throat, let not him come hither, come hither, come hither, but betake himself elsewhere, out of hearing—"anywhere, anywhere out of the world" of art and good taste. As an accomplished critic, already quoted, has remarked, the mind feels the exceeding sorrowfulness of the "Lachrymosa" in the Requiem, the faltering tones of "qua resurget," which seem to remind the hearer that here the dying Mozart burst into tears; our hearts sink as we hear how "the children of Israel sighed!"—sighed!—sighed!—by reason of the bondage;" but we care not for the closest imitation of a sob given in the duet of the Gazza Ladra. "The broad humor of the catch and glee family, as well as the practical buffoonery of the time, led to a great deal of burlesque imitative music, both in Germany and Italy, in the seventeenth century. The cackling of hens all on one note and ending with a fifth above, the mewling of rival cats in nice chromatic order, with a staccato of course by way of a spù, were favorite pastimes of the severest German contrapuntists; and even Marcello, the Pindar of Music, as he was called, has left two elaborate choruses, one for soprani, the other for contralti, which baa like like sheep and mou like oxen. These were the avowed absurdities of men who liked occasionally to drop their robes of dignity; but at all times the close power of imitation which music affords has been a dangerous rock for the musician." † Dulce est desipere in loco; but even the sapient are liable to trifle occasionally out of place.

It is agreed that all dramatic music must be full of imitation; and herein has been said to lie its greatest charm and its greatest snare. The vague yet forcible suggestiveness of really characteristic melody, may be illustrated by what Mr. Thackeray remarks of Irish scenery—that he thinks it just like Irish melodies—sweet, wild, and sad, even in the sunshine. "You can neither represent one nor the other by words; but I am sure if one could translate 'The Meeting of the Waters' into form and colors, it would fall into the exact shape of a tender Irish landscape. So, take and play that tune upon your fiddle, and shut your eyes and muse a little, and you have the whole scene before you." ‡ Henri Beyle discourses admiringly on certain cantilènes which express the passions, and avers (in contradiction to an argument we have previously referred to) that jealousy is expressed by the aria Vedro ment' io ruspiro, sung by Count Almaviva in Mozart's Nozze di Figaro: he adds, § that in the whole of Rossini's Otello he can discover nothing so expressive of jealousy, "ce tourment des cœurs tendres," as in Mozart's air aforesaid. Of that passionate serenade in the Don Giovanni, Deh vieni alla finestra, which "breathes the very soul of refined sensuality," Mr. Leigh Hunt once said, that you see the gallant before you, with his mandolin and his cap and feather, taking place of the nightingale for that amorous hour; and you feel that the sounds must inevitably draw his mistress to the window. "Their intenseness even renders them pathetic; and his heart seems in earnest, because his senses are." ¶ The notes of the dramatic composer must tell the incident as well as the text, often instead of it, says Lady Eastlake; the composer must give us definite thoughts; his skill lies between defining them over much and over little; it is his art so to treat the subject that you feel it is subservient to him, not he to it—making you forget even the thing imitated in the resources it has developed. Of this, "what grander example is there in the world than Handel's Hailstone Chorus? It begins with the closest imitation. There are the single decided ominous notes, like the first heavy lumps of ice striking the earth in separate shots. They fall faster, yet still detached, when from a battery which we have felt hanging suspended over our heads,

Down comes the deluge of sonorous hail, shattering everything before it: and having thus raised the idea, he sustains it with such wonderful simplicity of means—the electric shouting of the choruses 'Fire! Hailstones!' only in strict unison—the burst of the storm changing only from quavers into semiquavers—the awful smashing of the elements only the common chord of the key, and that the natural key—till we feel astonished how the mere representation of the rage of the elements should have given occasion for one of the grandest themes that musician ever conveyed." **

So writes one of the devoutest of devout Handeliens, one who is, perhaps, more than a little kind, not to say just a little blind, to a lapse or a foible here and there, on the great master's part, in the exercise of his mimetic faculty. Handel, as another critic observes, must have felt prouder of the vague tumultuous feeling of awe and veneration called forth by the choruses in his "Messiah," than of the resemblance discovered, or thought to be discovered, between a passage in one of his serenatas and the walk of a giant ††— and the "attempt to represent the sun standing still, in the oratorio of 'Joshua,' almost reduces him to the level of the ingenious inventor (first brought into notice by the late Charles Mathews), who, to illustrate his scheme of imitative action, used to give his hands a rotatory motion at the mention of the globe."†† In every art and science there are quackeries afloat, by which quacks make a name, and from which genius has not always the self-respect to turn aside.

See what ample strides he takes;

Some themes there are which, by their very nature, afford a tempting subject to imitative ingenuity—and an indulgence in which is not without apologists among even the strictest sect of high-artists. Storms and tempests, for example, convey a sense of sublimity which, "however frequently vulgarized by the mere tricks of performers," must ever, as Lady Eastlake§§ says, make them favorite subjects for audiences and composers. Freely she avows that even that old favorite, Steibelt's Storm, in spite of strumming schoolroom associations, when the lightning used to break time, and come in at the wrong place, and then have to begin all over again, has a moral as well as a dramatic meaning which justifies the predilections of childhood. It was not, she says, the noise and din of two handfuls of notes with all the pedals down, which juvenile amateurs declare to be "just like thunder," but at which she felt inclined to stop her ears with an instinct of the profaneness of the attempt; but it was the gradual lulling of the winds and hushing of all nature which preceded the crash, and then the clearing of the air after it, the tinkling of the rain-drops all sparkling with light that is bursting out in the west, and finally that happy chorus of birds in the return of the gay chirping rictornel, in four sharps, which tells you all is over and no harm done to any one. Beethoven's Tempest also, in his Pastoral Symphony—which, by-the-by, is like Thomson's Seasons set to Music—is the grandest and most fearful of storms, as M. Oulibichef says, "which ever thundered in the basses, whistled in the flutes, bellowed and blustered in the trumpets, and lightened and hailed in the violins;" but who can resist the sweet enchantment of those modulations, when the thunder is heard retreating in the distance, and timid sounds of inquiry rise up from leaf and flower, and birds answer, and steps emerge, and in a moment

Its beauty all, and grateful song around!

At the same time, her ladyship contends that it is not from any work of imitative music, however enchanting, that the highest musical pleasure can be derived. The grand object and highest prerogative of all the fine arts, according to another Quarterly Reviewer, is, or ought to be, the same: to present the images of power, beauty, and sublimity, capable of expanding, refining, or elevating the mind; and excite passions, feelings, affections, or emotions, corresponding with those which the most striking scenes in nature or the most touching passages of human existence might call up. "Even in painting, necessarily the most imitative, mere facility of imitation is a vulgar quality at best; and Parrhasius's curtain, which his rival attempted to lift up, or the supposed door at Greenwich Hospital, which visitors were wont to run against, rank in art far below the most outrageous libel on nature which Fuseli himself ever perpetrated. We would therefore rather rest the fame of the acknowledged masterpieces in musical composition . . . on the broad general impression produced by them than on their imitative facilities."|| It is not, avers the fairer critic, in the likeness of anything in the heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth, that the highest musical capacity can be tried. "It is not the dipping passage like a crested wave in 'The flood stood upright as an heap,' or the wandering of the notes in 'All we like sheep have gone astray,' in which Handel's intensest musical instinct is displayed; for beautiful as are these passages, and full of imagery to eye and ear, they smack of a certain mechanical contrivance; but it is in the simple soothing power of the first four bars of the first song in the 'Messiah,' which descend like heavenly dew upon the heart, telling us that those divine words, 'Comfort ye,' are at hand. This we feel to be the indefinable province of expression, in which the composer has to draw solely upon his own intense sympathies for the outward likeness of a thing which is felt and judged of only in the innermost depths of every heart."¶¶ Comparatively speaking, one might say of mere imitation, as Hamlet of flute-playing that 'tis easy as lying,—and too many of us know how easy that is, especially if white lies may count. But the eloquence of real musical expression is of another quality—the gift of the elect—one of those prerogatives which pertain to the chosen few, and mark them out a right royal priesthood, a peculiar people—the chartered expositors of a language which the adroit many can second-handily imitate, but which only themselves can originally and adequately express.

The "Liederkränze," formed in 1847, is the oldest German Society in the city, and now numbers 600 members, of which number about 200 are active and take part in the rehearsals and concerts. The whole society meets for rehearsal twice each week, and the male voices meet once alone for the practice of glees, etc. They are able, with patient and careful drilling, to perform most of the classic music of the old masters. Three or four public performances are given each season, and they are frequently called upon to sing the choruses at the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society. They have done so twice this year, and are at present rehearsing Schumann's new work, "Paradise and the Peri," for performance at the next Philharmonic concert. It is a first-class society, ranks high as being one of the most careful and well trained in the city. They are ably conducted by Mr. A. Pauer, and have for President Mr. Fred. Rapp. Whatever is undertaken by them is sure to be done well. They have been quite prosperous, and are about to build a hall for their own accommodation. The proceeds of their public concerts are devoted entirely to charitable objects.

The "Arion" Society is also composed of Germans, and was formed in January, 1854, from the "Liederkränze." It now numbers 150 members, of which 50 to 60 are singers—all males. They are conducted by Carl Bergmann and Carl Anschütz—two of the most popular German musicians in the city—and meet for rehearsal Tuesday and Saturday evenings. They give three vocal and instrumental concerts each season. This year they have been particularly successful, and were sustained by an orchestra of 50 performers, with some of the best soloists to be found in the city. The music was of the highest order, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt and Wagner being represented in the programme. They are sometimes called upon to sing the choral parts of the opera at the Academy of Music, and 40 voices from this society rendered the famous drinking chorus in the first act of Halévy's opera, "La Juive," with fine effect, when it was produced here last winter. In July of last year they took the prize at the great musical festival held at Buffalo.

The "Teutonia Männerchor," another German society, was formed in 1852, and numbers about 100 members male and female. They are prosperous and enterprising, under the lead of Mr. J. Mosenthal, the distinguished organist of Calvary Church, and meet twice a week for rehearsal.

The Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn was incorporated pursuant to a general act of the Legislature, on the 5th of May, 1857, since which time it has been steadily increasing, both in size and public favor, and now numbers 948 associates, 150 professional, and 100 complimentary members—in all 1198. Five public concerts and fifteen rehearsals are given annually. During the past winter, each of their concerts given within their spacious auditorium of the Academy of Music—an enterprise, by the way, that originated in the success of this society—was attended by upwards of 3000 persons; their programmes comprised the highest class of musical compositions, rendered by a full orchestra of 40 performers, and the best vocal talent of the opera troupes of New York.

All pecuniary receipts over and above the expenditures are devoted to elevate the character of their performances. Mr. Theodore Eisfeld, here, as with the Philharmonic Society of New York, officiates as conductor at both rehearsals and concerts, and Mr. J. Noll as leader.

A Society styling itself the "Polyphonic Association," was organized for the purpose of the encouragement and promotion of music and musical talent in Brooklyn, Oct. 4, 1860, which has increased rapidly in size, and bids fair to become a large and influential society. It already numbers nearly 200 members, among whom are some eminent artists and professors, though it is composed mainly of young men, amateurs, who derive much benefit from it as a means of musical intercourse and social advancement. They meet twice each week for rehearsal, and hold semi-monthly "reunions," to which members with their friends only are admitted. Besides these, they give five private concerts, to which none but members of the association are admitted, and all the pieces are performed by artist and amateur members. Five public concerts are given each season. These are rendered attractive by the auxiliary aid of artists who do not belong to the Society. At the last one, given at the Brooklyn Athenæum, Dr. Clara W. Beames, with his pupil, Miss Marie Brainerd, Mr. George Simpson, and Mons. Henry Appy, the violinist, all from New York, assisted. Its government is vested in a board of 25 directors, chosen annually, who appoint the President and other officers. A different musical conductor is appointed for each concert. It is supported by entrance fees, fines, assessments, proceeds of concerts, &c.

Unlike most of the older associations, this one combines instruction with practice, and classes are taught by Professors who are members of the Society. This is an excellent plan, but the present system of teaching is sadly defective, and we regret to observe that upon this subject much ignorance prevails among our countrymen, which it will require time and experience to remove. Many persons argue that not all, but only a select few can learn to sing, on the ground that all do not possess the voice. Even professors and teachers fall into this error, and most unphilosophically undertake to cultivate the voice without any reference to the ear and understanding. Two years ago, when a large free class for musical instruction was formed in this city, from two to three hundred applicants were refused admission, because the "Professor" in attendance decided that they had no voice! Many who aspire to learn, and feel that they are capable of attaining a great degree of proficiency, are denied the pleasure, as well as deterred from undertaking it, on account of the difficulties to be surmounted and obstacles overcome. This arises from the want of method and system in the usual mode of teaching, which presents it as an empirical, rather than a positive and truly mathematical science, which it really is—a science as easily accessible to all as chemistry, mathematics, or any other of its departments.

That all who are able to speak, are also able, with a proper system of instruction, to sing; and that all should be as well able to read music at sight, as to read language, has been abundantly proved, as well by the experience of our public schools,—in almost all of which music is successfully taught,—as by the more complete and decisive experiments which have been in continual operation for upwards of ten years in Paris and throughout France. The classes of Monsieur Emile Chev ,—whose system has been adopted by the Conservatoire, and is now recognized by the highest authority throughout Europe, as the only scientific and practical method of teaching music,—numbering from 800 to 1000 pupils, (composed mainly of the ouvrier population of Paris) can sing part music at sight, in the most difficult intonations of the major and minor modes with perfect aplomb and command of voice, without any instrument to guide them; and not only do they become one and all executors, but complete masters of the science. As an illustration of their capabilities in this respect, I annex a paragraph, translated from "L'Opinion Nationale" of March 13th, 1860:

"One evening, a few weeks ago, Mr. Richard Wagner presented himself at Monsieur Chev 's class-room, where eight hundred pupils were hearing a lesson, and handed to the professor a manuscript piece which he had just composed and desired to hear read. M. Chev  gave his class in charge to his son, went into an adjoining room, transcribed Mr. Wagner's composition (a fugue for eight voices), on a huge blackboard, and had it taken to the pupils. Instantly, the whole class, without the aid of any instrument, without any other indication than the tone by a tuning-fork, sang Mr. Wagner's music—note, Mr. Wagner's music!—and sang it with such ensemble, such perfection of intonation, solidity of rhythm, and correctness in the shades of expression, that it was more like finished execution than reading at sight. Monsieur Wagner went away confounded with astonishment, after having thanked the unique choristers and their admirable Professor, saying he had never witnessed such a feat in his life.

Such results are truly extraordinary. Pupils of a course where hundreds are taught together, where all who present themselves are received without any choice whatever, do what artist choristers of the Conservatoire Society and of the opera could not do. But some will say, such results can be obtained only after years of labor. We answer: the pupils of the course held by M. Chev , at the Polytechnic School, as we ourselves witnessed, read at first sight in parts after a very few lessons. After a few months they were able to read at sight without any hesitation, all the pieces of the repertoire of choral music."

A powerful contrast is here presented with our societies, where notwithstanding the members are picked, and none admitted except those who are supposed to be able to read music at sight, a piano accompaniment—or one of some kind—is obligato, and an incessant drilling is required to attain even mediocre perfection.

Perhaps the best illustration of our poverty in this respect is to be found in the small, weak and inefficient choruses which appear at our operatic entertainments, offering a strong contrast with the powerful and well trained corps of the Haymarket, London, the Grand Opera, Paris, and others on the Continent. There is no reason why ours should be so much inferior, except that from want of a proper system of teaching, the science has not yet been brought within reach of the masses. A great error, to which our people are liable, is to suppose that noise and velocity constitute music.

Such ideas as these were suggested by listening to the performance of an oratorio, a short time since, and observing the imperfect manner in which it was rendered, in spite of the regular weekly rehearsals of the same piece, during the previous five months.

If my space permitted, I could give some interesting facts concerning the shallowness of some of our "reputed" musicians, their lack of real knowledge of the science, and the mode pursued by them to hide their defects; but these must be reserved for another occasion.

To all who perceive the great influence music is destined to exert in furthering the development of race, and reflect upon the significant truths above quoted, this subject commends itself as one of some importance.—Transcript.

Eugene Scribe.

During something like half a century, the bright and indefatigable dramatic author—who has just died suddenly—filled the stage of Europe; and with works of such a variety, in every prose form of composition as to suggest the presence of a well-spring of perpetual youth in the man who could be so fertile, so buoyant, so ingenious to the last. Instead of our wondering at his living held out so long, the surprise of his having died late or soon, comes like a shock.

Of the story of Scribe's early life—his parentage and training—we are not in case for the moment to speak. Probably since the year 1815, or thereabouts, the only biography of special interest which could be written of him would be a list of his plays. On many of these it would be interesting to annotate with reference to the changes which have passed over French society during the last marvellous fifty years. In his earlier works will be found traces of the Empire, with its confusion of ranks and families, for the arrangement of which even the first Napoleon's strong will and grasp over organization proved insufficient. Then came the reigns so fondly looked forward to by the nobles of the Faubourg as periods of blissful rehabilitation for their order, and which proved, when they came, so unsatisfactory in any thing like progress or fulfilment. Their conventionalities, too, will be found reflected in Scribe's "Th  tre," which, during its first twenty years of production, was principally restricted to pieces of a limited scale and peculiar quality befitting a minor theatre at Paris. Such was the Th  tre de Madame, in spite of its protection from La Duchesse de Berri. It was not till Louis Philippe came to the throne that those with Academical honors in view—the quest of which has turned so many a staid French brain—Scribe entered on five-act prose plays, which were to bring him into comparison with Beaumarchais and other predecessors who had eschewed verse. Of these, the first, and the most famous, perhaps, was "Bertrand et Raton." In this, an amount of sly, political satire was put forth, such as, under the reign of Charles Dix, Scribe knew his world to well to have ventured. There is a group of these heartless comedies, all more or less clever. From this style the academician, once set in his seat, passed into those dramas of intrigue and complicated incident by which we have most lately known him. It may be doubted whether anything analogous to these is to be found in any other literature—whether any other dramatist has ever employed so much power of their interweaving into a tissue countless incidents, which never could happen in one and the same history—and this with such exquisite adroitness and hardihood, that the spectator was enthralled into forgetfulness of the absurdities inherent in the combination. Scribe worked much with collaborators; and, provided that any inexperienced man brought him an idea or a situation (character, of course, in such authorship can go for little), he could find in those sufficient material and suggestion. Then, he had the art of commending the compound and the structure by an ease of style, a common sense—a common-place, too—of sentiment—a neatness of sentiment—a neatness of reply, a use of wit, sparing and never soaring, which went far to reconcile the wildest contradictions. There was no depressing genius or superiority about him, to stir antagonism among the gifted, or to oppress the thoughtless by too deeply troubling them to think.

One more outline must be added to the above few and rapidly sketched ones of a man whose complete portrait must wait for some future day—this in commemoration of Scribe, as a writer for music. His opera-books are many; the verse in all of them is miserably flat and prosaic; the stories of some are excellent—of one (we mean "La Juive") incomparable. In this capacity M. Scribe will go down to posterity as the companion of MM. Auber and Meyerbeer.

The outward man in society was cheerful, simple, and gay—rarely, if ever, brilliant. The fortune he amassed by his dramatic rights and copyrights must be something very large—it being understood that, as regarded all matters of gain and profit, he knew how to bargain shrewdly as well as to save discreetly. For better, for worse, however we see at present no one within or without the precincts of the French theatres in the least qualified to take his place.—London Athenaeum.

Abbe Vogler and his Pupils.

(From the German, by J. H. KAPPEL.)

Almost every morning, about ten o'clock, even in stormy weather, a short, thick, somewhat stooping man, in the simple black dress of an Abb , might be seen hastening either into the castle or old theatre of Darmstadt. Usually, a number of young men were collected around him, with whom he joked and laughed. In the theatre, he conducted rehearsals for morning concerts and theatrical representations; in the castle, he conversed on musical theory, with the grand duke, who, since the year 1807, had employed him in Darmstadt, as spiritual counsellor and court chapel-master. Together, they played the newest duets, criticized operas, or counselled concerning their chapel. Occasionally, the grand duchess Louisa would be present, and participate in the conversation of the thoughtful artists. Since the Prince had left the military service of Russia, and undertaken the government of his own lands, music had been the favorite art, into the depths and purity of which, he had penetrated far, by his own study and the aid of Vogler.

At that time the means necessary for bringing out a great musical work were, indeed, scarce. An orchestra must be created, a theatre constructed, and a musical library founded. Vogler quickly conceived a plan to accomplish these objects.

The most skilful hautboist, who had been employed in the army, was elevated to the post of court-musician, and accomplished masters of a single instrument were attracted thither from all parts of Germany. Vogler understood the establishment of a chapel quite perfectly, for he had already called into existence a similar institute at Mannheim and Stockholm. Still, male and female singers were required, by whom the chorus of the opera and mass could be performed. These also were soon supplied. The prince collected in one of the great halls of his castle, the so-called concert hall, many females from the most cultivated families, and gave to all the best advantages for a musical education. Numerous male amateurs soon presented themselves, and music became to many an individual the stepping stone of promotion.

By desire of the grand-duke, Vogler had constructed an immense organ, according to a simplified plan of his own, upon which he conducted a choir. The grand-duke stood, usually, by his desk in the middle of the hall, gave the time with his baton, and thus directed the whole performance. On Good Friday, these sacred concerts reached a calminating point. All the company were then collected in the concert hall in mourning dresses. Vogler elicited from his gigantic instrument the deepest notes of pain and joy; and two hundred cultivated, noble voices sang a requiem of the great master's. More sublime and highly finished music could not be heard at that time, in all Europe; and it is said, Vogler oft-times strove in vain to conceal the tears which his own playing excited.

The power of his masterly execution is further illustrated by the following incidents: During one of his long journeyings, he stopped at Swabia. There he heard that the gifted Schubert, whose songs and poetry for the people he greatly admired, had been already ten years in Hohenasberg condemned to trial for a political offence; there, in a rocky prison, far from music and song, of which he possessed profound knowledge, he disgracefully pined. The commander of the castle, after many entreaties, permitted Vogler to see and speak to the fettered Prometheus, on the plea that he was a poor musician, who desired to make trial of his skill on an instrument of his own invention, the Orchestron, before so competent a judge. Vogler began to play, permitted the tones to resound with tremendous power, then die away in gentle cadences. One might hear the thunder roll, the storm howl, and the rain pour down. Schubert could no longer restrain his emotion, but, falling on the musician's neck in an ecstasy of delight, he cried "Either you are the devil or Abt Vogler." And from that hour the two became intimate friends. Schubert soon after received his freedom and a situation as chapel-master in Wirtemberg service.

At one time, also, the study of Vogler's great pastoral mass was pursued with all musical skill and diligence, in the city church of Darmstadt. The master himself played the organ, and, in rehearsals, the grand-duke stood, with head bent forward, the baton in his hand, upon the chancel opposite the organ. The effect of the interludes was so impressive, that after the conclusion of one such, the grand-duke exclaimed in the highest excitement: "Thunder and the devil, Vogler, play not so skilfully; no one can sing after such playing, and I surely cannot keep time!"

A circle of remarkable young men had gradually collected around the first composer and theorist of his time. They were come from all parts of Germany, in order to become initiated into the depth and purity of the musical art, under him who had been a pupil of the great Father Valotti at Padua.

To Vogler, it was reserved to revive an old, almost dead art, and to give each and every piece a peculiar character, by his skilled instrumentation. In this his greater pupil, C. M. von Weber scarcely approached him.

In the year 1810, circumstances brought together, as pupils of Vogler, those young men, who, at the present day, are regarded as masters in the musical world. They were Carl M. von Weber, G nsbacher, Meyerbeer, Peter von Winter, and Freiherr von Poissl. The first three dwelt with Vogler in his own house, which the grand-duke had caused to be vacated for his use. There this artist family practised a strange housekeeping. The earliest morning found all the company assembled in the saloon, where they conversed Socratically on musical composition and the art of singing. Each brought to the teacher his recent exercises. Vogler condemned or praised without reserve, while he always gave reasons, or pointed out errors, according to his own system. Sometimes he corrected with his own hand, and gave many striking examples from the old masters. Here was truly a musical academy. Many times Vogler, in enthusiastic excitement, would step before the table, the young men standing around in a circle, and extemporize profound lectures concerning the art of composition, fugues, and singing. His pupils listened in silent amazement, for, at those times, words flowed from his lips, such as could not be daily heard. When the hours of labor were passed, lighter performances succeeded, but those usually led to earnest study.

Vogler was accustomed, in order to test the genius of his pupils, to place before them such exercises as the following: He would take one of his numerous musical snuff-boxes, place it upon the piano and cause it to play. The pupils must then extemporize variations to the snuff-box, upon the piano, violoncello, violoncello or flute.

In this ingenious art of musical improvisation C. M. von Weber principally excelled; and him he always declared to be his most productive scholar.

Vogler never permitted an entire opera to be composed under his direction, but induced his pupils to study—to investigate thoroughly the most difficult music by the best authors, and thus to comprehend the true spirit of the art. "You must think freely and independently," he would always; "your genius must be restrained by guidance. When you are able to spell, you can learn to read by yourselves." In this manner Von Weber transposed Vogler's opera Samori, for the piano, and also composed many variations. Meyerbeer wrote his cantata, "God and Nature;" also later in the same place, but independent of Vogler, the opera "Jephtha." Günsbacher wrote organ pieces. By careful analysis of the most superior works, the pupils were led to discriminate; and by never attempting any great work of their own, they acquired skill in originating musical ideas, and secured the aid of Vogler in the great art of instrumentation.

After the conclusion of theatrical or concert-rehearsals, Vogler usually hastened into the castle to dinner; for he was a constant companion of his princely friend, at whose table the graces and muses always presided, and where keen wit was esteemed the best seasoning. Whenever Vogler appeared in state costume, he was an object of undisguised amusement. Short and thick, with head somewhat bent forward, his long hands, with long fingers, (which in their full extent, could reach two octaves) hung almost to the ground. In the character of an Abbé and Knight of the golden spur, his dress consisted of short black trousers, terminated by stockings one red and the other white, black shoes, with a golden spur on the right foot. From the collar of his wide-skirted dress-coat fell the little mantle, upon which was affixed the sign of his order, and with which the wind often made wild sport. On a red band he wore the emblem of merit from the house of Hessen Darmstadt, and on the left side, a huge sword. While now the jovial master devoted himself, at the rich table of his friend, to the enjoyment of the repast and social conversation—to the spirit of Champagne and Hockheimer, the gifted scholars, at home, stormed the well-filled cellar—and destroyed the life of many a bottle, until one after another, as evening approached, looked around for a quiet little place in which to repose. When the master returned, late at night, he always noticed with alarm the death-like stillness of the house. He knew immediately that strange spirits had been at work—and in order only to preserve the reputation of the house, though inwardly smiling, he sometimes reproved in this manner, "You little children, what have you been doing here?" To which they humorously replied; "Papa would you pull your own?"—thus, in the language of an old adage, the staggerers triumphantly put the staggerer to bed.

The richest among the young men was Meyerbeer, the poorest Carl M. von Weber—but as all possessed one spirit, so they all carried but one purse; and, in after years, under all pressing circumstances, the noble Meyerbeer became a banker for his friends.

Each one was accustomed, after having completed his work to engage in some favorite pursuit. Meyerbeer, for instance sat often for the whole day, in some one of the various pleasure gardens and listened to the singing of birds. Von Weber delighted to spend an hour, frequently, at a famous inn, opposite the castle, especially because there, the country people from the Odenwald, Oberhessen or the Rhine found accommodation. For he loved the peasant life, and ever listened with pleasure to their simple ballads. There it was, from the lips of those peasant vocalists, that he procured some of the most beautiful melodies for the songs and later operas.

Vogler loved his pupils as children—they him as a father. He flattered none, but expressed to each an opinion of his peculiar ability. Thus, he foretold to the composer of "The Freischütz" and "Oberon," a splendid future—and he assured Meyerbeer, that he was possessed of remarkable talent which by untiring industry, would enable him to accomplish great things—and that he would become distinguished for the original construction of his music.

On the 6th of May 1814, Vogler died, from a sudden stroke of apoplexy. Two priests and a few friends followed his coffin ornamented with a golden Lyre and a laurel wreath to the grave, in the old church yard, near the chapel, where his princely friend caused a marble monument, with a suitable inscription to be erected to his memory. His pupils had been previously scattered in various parts of the world, but the fame of their increasing celebrity had reached the ears of the old master. One of them, before his journey to London, in Jan. 1826, visited the burial place of his revered instructor. Little did he then anticipate, that his own spirit, so consecrated to music, would ere five months should elapse be enjoying the harmonies of a higher sphere. Yet so it was, and his body soon lay mouldering in Moorfield's chapel London.

Günsbacher lived as a valued organist in Vienna. Polsal conducted, for many years the opera at Manich. Winter died in the same place having acquired an enviable reputation. Meyerbeer has celebrated his world's triumph in the world's metropolis according to the prediction of his prophetic teacher.

The Star Spangled Banner.

In 1814, when the British fleet was at the mouth of the Potomac River, and intended to attack Baltimore, Mr. Key and Mr. Skinner were sent in a vessel with a flag of truce to obtain the release of some prisoners the English had taken in their expedition against Washington. They did not succeed, and were told that they would be detained till after the attack had been made on Baltimore. Accordingly, they went in their own vessel, strongly guarded, with the British fleet as it sailed up the Patapsco; and when they came in sight of Fort McHenry, a short distance below the city, they could see the American flag distinctly flying on the ramparts. As the day closed in, the bombardment of the fort commenced, and Mr. Key and Mr. Skinner remained on deck all night, watching with deep anxiety every shell that was fired. While the bombardment continued, it was sufficient proof that the fort had not been surrendered. It suddenly ceased sometime before day; but as they had no communication with any of the enemy's ships, they did not know whether the fort had surrendered or the attack upon it been abandoned. They paced the deck the rest of the night in painful suspense, watching with intense anxiety for the return of day, at length the light came, and they saw that "our flag was still there," and soon they were informed that the attack had failed. In the fervor of the moment, Mr. Key took an old letter from his pocket, and on its back wrote the most of this celebrated song, finishing it before he reached Baltimore. He showed it to his friend Judge Nicholson, who was so pleased with it that he placed it at once in the hands of the printer, and in an hour after it was all over the city, and hailed with enthusiasm, and took its place at once as a national song.

We add to the original words the new verse (the 5th), by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Oh, say, can you see, by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming?

Whose broad stripes and bright stars, through the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watched, were so gallantly streaming;
And the rockets' red glare, the bombs bursting in air,
Gave proof through the night that our flag was still there:

Oh, say, does that Star-Spangled Banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?

On that shore, dimly seen through the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,

Where is that which the breeze, o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, now conceals, now discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,

In full glory reflected now shines in the stream:
'Tis the Star-Spangled Banner; oh, long may it wave,

O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

And where are the foes who so vanishingly swore
That the havoc of war, and the battle's confusion,
A home and a country should leave us no more?
Their blood has wash'd out their foul footsteps' pollution;

No refugee could save the hireling and slave
From the terror of flight, or the gloom of the grave;
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph doth wave

O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

Oh, thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand Between their loved homes and the war's desolation!
Blest with victory and peace, may the heaven-rescued land

Praise the Power that hath made and preserved us a nation!

Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust."

VERSE BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

When a land is illuminated by liberty's smile,
If a foe from within strikes a blow at her glory,
Down, down with the traitor that dares to defile
The flag of her stars and the page of her story!
By the millions unchained when our birthright was gained,

We will keep her bright blazon forever unstained!
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave

While the land of the free is the home of the brave!

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 22.—There has been no winter, in my recollection, when we have had so many really good concerts as during the past. I have again two to record. On Thursday the third concert of the Arion took place, with the following programme.

PART I.

1. Sinfonia in C—"Jupiter,".....Mozart
2. Thurmerlied, Double Chorus and Orchestra. (First time).....G. Rebling
3. Fantasia for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra. Beethoven Solo Piano, W. Barth, member of the "Arion." Ladies Chorus of the N. Y. Sing Academy and "Arion." (First time.)
4. Choral Overture.....O. Nicolai Organ, Chorus and Orchestra. (First time.)

PART II.

5. Overture—"Rienzi".....R. Wagner
6. The Church, Chorus without accompaniment.....Becker
7. Drinking chorus—"La Jolie".....Halevy
8. Racy March.....H. Berlioz

Several of these pieces were new to us, which made them all the more interesting. In the Fantasia of Beethoven, the choral part reminds the hearer strongly of the fourth movement of the Ninth Symphony; the airs are similar, the whole treatment of the one is very like the other, and the resemblance even holds good in the difficulty and unsingableness of the vocal part, which is extremely high and fatiguing. This is one of the reasons that the performance of this number was not as satisfactory as all the others. The piano, too, was in the hands of a gentleman who played well for an amateur, but could not give the artistic rendering which the composition needs to make it thoroughly appreciable.

Another interesting feature was Nicolai's Choral Overture, of which Mr. Dwight has spoken so ably in one of his several letters, that I need not touch upon it further. The choruses were admirable, and the orchestra did ample justice to the compositions which it was their part to reproduce.

I must turn to upon the all-absorbing, exciting topics of the day even here. The music of the drum and fife is understood by every one, and is at this time fast superseding all others. The spirit of the times was manifested at the Philharmonic on Saturday night, as it takes the first place everywhere else. Owing to the departure of many members of the Society and frequenters of the concerts with their several regiments, the audience was not quite as large as usual; but there were still quite enough persons present to represent the general enthusiasm. In the audience almost every one, lady or gentleman, wore the red, white and blue, in some shape, and the members of the Liederkränze were all decorated in a similar way. The concert was an uncommonly fine one, and had the merit of being just long enough. Mozart's G minor Symphony opened the programme—and was exceedingly well played. Then followed an aria by Mendelssohn, "Infelice," from Miss Brainerd. This lady, who has but rarely appeared before the public of late, and kept herself so quiet that some of her friends do not know where to find her, sang very well indeed, and looked all the better, in the eyes of the patriotic audience for wearing a sash of the Union colors across her breast. When she had finished her aria, there was a call from various quarters for the "Star Spangled Banner," upon which Mr. Eisfeld came forward, and announced that the piece desired would be sung by Miss Brainerd and the Liederkrans, with accompaniment of the orchestra, at the end of the programme, and that the audience were requested to join in the chorus.

Mr. Saar next played a solo on the piano. This was a transcription of his own, from Tannhäuser, a most effective piece, eminently characteristic of the whole opera. The Overture to Egmont, the martial elements of which made it quite appropriate, ended the first part. The second part consisted of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Nacht, very finely sung by the Liederkrans. It made a much finer impression, with a large chorus, and full orchestra, than when it was sung some years ago by the same Society, then not as large as now, for a charitable purpose. The solos, however, with the exception of the tenor, Mr. Steinway, were hardly worthy of so fine a chorus. The music must be heard more than once or twice to be appreciated; it does not fall easily upon the ear, like most music of Mendelssohn's. The last two choruses, however, are uncommonly fine.

This finished, Miss Brainerd reappeared, sheets of paper with the words of the song were distributed among the audience, the American flag was suspended from the proscenium, and the orchestra played the introduction to the Star Spangled Banner. Unfortunately it was set very high for Miss Brainerd, which marred the effect of the solos; but the choruses were grand! Four or five verses were sung, and during the last the enthusiasm rose to the highest pitch. Flags and handkerchiefs were waved, cheer followed cheer, and there was a tumult such as the decorous, sober Philharmonic has never yet witnessed. It was soul-stirring and exciting to the last degree, yet underneath lay the mournful thought of how many of these brave large hearts would be stilled, how many others would bleed with anguish, before another winter would reassemble some of us within those walls!

ST. LOUIS, APRIL 28, 1861. — This is the programme of our last Concert but one. The musical year ends in May.

1. Overture, "Don Juan".....Mozart
2. { a Chorus, "Lord! thou alone art God!" } Mendelssohn
3. { a Chorus, "To God on high" } Beethoven
4. Cavatina, "Come per me sereno,".....Sonnambula.....Bellini
5. Violin Solo, "Première Concerto".....De Bériot
6. Chorus, "Crucifixus".....Lotti
7. Overture, "Meeres-Stille und glückliche Fahrt".....Mendelssohn
8. Duo for two Pianos, "Variations brillantes et Rondo".....H. Herz
9. Andante from "Symphonie in C".....Beethoven
10. Duo from "Othello".....Rowini
11. Finale from "Lucresia Borgia".....Donizetti

Next year our only music promises to be that of military bands. It may not come to the worst, and should we escape war, we may again have a "Philharmonic." This concert was in nothing behind the others, and as to care and effectiveness a good way ahead, in some things. The Overtures could hardly have been better, and the Andante was perfect. The orchestra proper was composed of only fifty-one performers, as the theatre orchestra has gone. The chorus number now over one hundred. The Cavatina was sung by Miss ANNIE DEAN. The violin solo was by Mr. KARST, CHARLES BALMER at the piano. These were executed in a style and with a finish that left little to be desired. The Duo for two pianos, by Mr. BODIE and Miss LIZZIE CUTTER, an effective arrangement of Dolce Conento, was received with great favor, and was indeed well played. It being a very warm evening and warmer political times being also on hand, there were only about 2,600 in the audience.

The finest block of marble buildings in the West has just been erected by Mr. DARBY, and in them the Society have secured new and elegant rooms, finished expressly for them and furnished with every convenience. They are the best rooms I ever saw. Their first year will soon end. It has been a perfect success, being conducted by musicians, having talent, energy and money. As to the second year, we shall see what we shall see.

Prof. SABATZKY gave a grand amateur concert here for the benefit of the church of the Annunciation. It proved to be a success, and lightened their hearts while weighing down their purses. Every such concert develops more latent musical talent than I ever gave this city credit for. One young lady played a beautiful air on the harp, a thing not often done. I have commenced a series of articles on the "Churches and Church Music of St. Louis." We have some splendid organs, together with first-class organists and choirs, and I intend to make several readable articles out of and concerning them. More anon.

Blind "Tom," the celebrated negro boy pianist gives a grand concert here next week, and we shall see how he bears out the puffs we have so often read. "BROWX."

Fine Arts.

Athenæum Gallery of Fine Arts.

This is the first time in our experience when anything in public affairs has made it seem of doubtful propriety to bestow especial attention upon topics belonging exclusively to the fine arts. In this day of threatening, undefined calamity—in this hour of peril to law and order, from accumulative treason and organized outrage—in this moment of mortal conflict between the positive principle that upholds liberty and equality by order self-imposed, by individual freedom and opportunity voluntarily limited for the general good, and which secures stability by organic subordination of the parts to the whole; and the negative principle which would displace them by tyranny of a class and slavery of the mass, it seems almost like treason to think of aught that does not directly concern our national danger. And yet it must be proper to take some thought about its possible consequences to the institutions of the State in its normal condition, thus rudely broken, among which art holds an important place and demands particular consideration as being more seriously menaced by the advancing misfortune whose front aspect proclaims the overthrow of the only existing government that maintains the inestimable blessings of law and equal rights, and the loosing in its place, fell anarchy! whose demoniac shape now hovers on the Southern horizon, with fiery eyes glaring upon us all through the lurid clouds of civil war.

We are to note, this is not an ordinary war. War has its different phases of evil and virulence; and its most malignant, hateful form appears when members of the same national family (all alike blessed with unprecedented prosperity) engage in mortal struggle—the one side, for mere defence of life, the other for desecration, destruction and spoil. The simple state of hostilities, when one nation is contending with another, by means of their regular armies, upon territorial or commercial pretences; or, as we may say, arguing questions of national privilege with their bayonet tongues and cannon mouths, does not necessarily, or even ordinarily preclude the continuance of peaceful occupations. This should be observed, although the actual presence of any war is always, certainly inimical to art—especially to its domestication. But even in such cases, still the labors of the artist are often the highly valued auxiliaries to the soldier's harder duties,—as the deeds of destruction of the latter frequently afford the potent matter for the former's most successful creations. Works of art in music and poetry, if not also, in painting and sculpture, in their power of varied inspiration, are oftener than might be supposed, the prime cause of the noblest deeds and aspects of arms in "glorious war." In true chivalric combat, the warrior's invincible mail is woven with the subtle threads of sentiment from the poem's web, and his heroism repays that service with themes for new warp and woof in the poet's lofty strain, which shall again sweep round to become the hero's strength and nobleness. But in a war like this now over the country, threatening return towards barbarism, and involving all classes in its dire scope, no citizens are more vitally interested in the speedy victory of the right than the artists. Revolution, aiming at anarchy, in its progress—imprisons art; in its triumph—annihilates it. Perhaps, in even this calamitous kind of strife, many or all the mechanic arts, with agriculture and local trade, may live and here and there, sometimes thrive amid the havoc of hostile armies; but the fine arts, with poetry, literature and pure science, sink or perish with sudden blight, touched by the bloody hands, or darkened by the sulphurous clouds of such a war. All the spiritual powers of order beauty, and goodness, are driven before the diabolical forces of sacrilegious riot. It is an unnatural convulsion, and its elements are chaotic. It rends the symmetrical fabric like an earthquake, and its work is ruin and horrible noise. It is unlike a disingenuous natural strife, of honest purpose, in its necessitous course, evolving power and beauty, and in its result establishing a new good for man; as the elemental tempest, in drenching the fields and ravaging the forests, purifies the air and increases the fertility of the earth. And as there may be music in the wildest war of wind and water, a tuneful note in the "rattling thunder;" so in the mere clash of arms, there is a melody in the cannon's roar, time and dreadful rhythm in the rallying drum-beat or the deadly "coughings of musketry;" but before the infernal howling of a mob, all the ministers of harmony, strong or weak, vanish from the disastrous land.

The passing evils of war, in respect to art, are as nothing to its possible consequences in the subversion of righteous government. Immaculate law of freedom, government, serene in power and permanence of right, with order of enlightenment producing unity, are only the first of the essential conditions to the existence of a true and prosperous art. Exchange of these for anarchy, not merely removes them (which with all other conditions, are blotted out) but it destroys the very life of art in its germ. An illiberal, even a tyrannical government, if stable for a period, is not incompatible with some show of grand art. Artists, in many instances, have achieved brilliantly, if not nobly, under despotic law, which seemed secure; but without law, and within the baleful folds of rebellion and revolution, they are lost and forgotten.

There is another view which it is expedient the artist should take at this conjuncture. In time of general war, art should not, nor can it be projected from its source in the mind and feeling to appear on external matter; but it ought to work within, and by its inspiration amalgamate art with man's personality to embody itself in his acts, which will then be heroic, poetic or pictorial. Nay, more, there is a moral beauty in self-sacrifice and noble deeds of men, on the perilous field, which developing in combined movements along the marshalled lines of battle flow into measured and sweet cadence, and the "still, sad music of humanity," living and tangible, rises and swells to a sublime strain with the watchword of civilization, liberty and law!

In contemplation of their own relation to this crisis, they should not be unmindful of the fact, while all classes must be ready to make sacrifices for the common cause and eager to respond to the call of duty however dangerous, that not themselves alone must give up their cherished pursuits, their honorable culture, and their exalted hopes, perchance, at the moment when years of self-imposed discipline have prepared for successful effort, and turn to devote themselves to the strange, abhorred task of self-defence against savage, unprovoked attack. * *

We must ask indulgence for having so far delayed the leading purpose of this article, which was to refer to the somewhat novel impressions we have derived in visiting the Athenæum Exhibition at this exciting and momentous period.

In other times, in the presence of collections of works of art, our thoughts and feelings were wholly impersonal, having reference only to external matters and abstractions. Now, we feel a social element perhaps, allied to the sentiment of friendship; as if their presence somehow isolated and protected us from the actual circumstances which surround us so distressfully without. The personifications, and embodied characters of art, seem to look out upon us from these silent scenes, with expressions of sympathy. And for that, they become more beautiful and dear to us. The quiet and the harmonious repose of the galleries, cast a grateful influence upon our over-excited minds, under which too active thought is soothed to the resting state favorable to the happy sway of emotion and imagination. And, as we have seen, in the real world, the fragrant morning dew impart purity and brilliance to the soft or rugged forms of nature, so do our moistened eyes shed upon the mimic scenery of art a more tender brightness and a more winning splendor, revealing, withal, many charms unseen before. The motionless faces of familiar portraits, beam upon us with unwonted beauty or strange tenderness of significant expression. Landscapes grow more alluring, their fields appear in softer verdure, their untroubled skies seem clearer with brighter gold and deeper sapphire, and the shadows of the clouded heavens wear a melancholy cast. And in the subjects of human import, the various tableaux seem to hint a strange meaning, showing sometimes an almost startling reference to eve is now passing and not complete.

Allusion has been made, above, to the unfortunate necessity which compels the artist from his settled vocation and all its attendant habits. But, of course, not every individual is likely to be included in the practical requisition, and not all of those who are will experience the change to the full or an equal extent. Very many will still be privileged to ply their art in some way; and to all these the changed course of events will be portentous of change in the spirit and matter of art.

It has already been observed that the exigencies of the times were developing fine traits in mankind, not new, perhaps, but seldom shown in times of peace. In every direction, self-sacrifice, courage and other noblenesses, are constantly being manifested, which will afford matter for the artists' work, of far greater potency than exists in the subjects which have most engaged them during the last ten years. Life episodes, of thrilling interest, of melting pathos, and of grand import, will supersede the hacknied idealities of sentimental or romantic art, the commonplace materials and compositions of genre, or landscape, or the yet lower objects of still-life. And the pantheistic or materialistic method and tendency of the present schools, may rapidly give place to the higher and more vital influences of the new schools, which will reestablish the severed union of art and nature — of the ideal and the real. And, haply, on the return of the armies, whose going forth gave the motive of the change, men shall behold on the painter's canvas and the sculptor's marble, renewal of the scenes and acts of life in which themselves were actors, or deeply interested witnesses.

Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA, assisted by Mrs. J. H. LONG, gave a social musical Soirée at the rooms of Messrs. Hallot, Davis & Co., on Wednesday Evening last, April 24. We regret that we were led to suppose that the concert would not take place as announced, and so did not attend. We learn, however, that it was well attended, and that Mr. P. won good opinions from his hearers.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

The Star Spangled Banner.

It would be difficult to say how many times we have heard this, the best of our national airs, within the last two weeks; at concerts, declaimed with fiery energy by accomplished fingers, in the streets and in the public meetings by the sonorous tones of brass bands, often sung in spontaneous chorus by all who had heart to feel or a voice to sing, it has met us everywhere, and everywhere it is heard with a loyal enthusiasm and earnest excitement that prove that there is something in it, something that has, perhaps, been overlooked and not sufficiently appreciated. On another page will be found the words and an account of the circumstances under which they were written. In the days of peace that have gone by, this generation has perhaps thought these lines to be bombastic, and that they deal in forced and artificial figures of rhetoric, but none can read them now, with the commentary furnished by contemporaneous events upon the record of our earlier history, who will not find the glow of truth in every line, who will not see a terrible reality in what we had thought to be only far fetched and exaggerated figures of poetic speech, who will not feel in every word the ardent glow of a patriotic fire which burns as brightly now as it did in the breast of him who penned them long ago. And to-day, there are thousands who not long since may have inquired with a sneer if we have any national airs, whose voices will tremble with emotion as they join in the stirring strains and whose eyes will kindle with fire as they behold the stars and stripes flaming through the air wherever they may turn their gaze. Two weeks have proved the existence of an universal loyalty, without exception or reservation, to the sacred Flag and the Government whose emblem it is.

The song has great merits that have not generally been allowed to it heretofore. A competent critic says of it —

This song has one of the noblest melodies ever written. In breadth and grandeur of theme, in intensity of musical effect, in magnetic inspiration, it is almost unrivaled. It is far in advance of the French Marseilles Hymn, the British "God save the Queen," or the Austrian "God save the Emperor," and its only rival in the world is the Russian national hymn by Lvoff. But unfortunately, it has some defects which injure it for a popular melody.

In the first place, it is not American in origin. In the next place, the melody has so wide a range from low to high that few voices can be found capable of singing it with effect.

And thirdly, the tune is not capable of an easy and convenient arrangement into parts, so that it can be sung, in chorus, by male voices alone; for it is, of course, by such that it must be given, as a general thing.

The English Anthem is much better in all these respects, though it lacks the fire and spirit of the Star Spangled Banner.

The flag is looked upon with a loyal veneration and enthusiasm that in our day, at least, it never knew before, and the song has taken a place in the hearts of this people that was never given to it before and from which it will be long before it can be displaced. With all its faults, it has taken that place, and the poet and the musician will be indeed immortal whose genius can give us a better.

Concerts.

That of the Handel and Haydn Society on Saturday evening, in aid of the Government was quite well attended, and we are told that the receipts amounted to nearly 400 dollars. Three concerts by Morris Brothers, Pell & Trowbridge's Minstrels gave $525, and a performance at the Howard Athenæum, on Saturday evening, yielded some $300. A very substantial result for these patriotic efforts. The Handel and Haydn Concert went off with much spirit, as may be well imagined from the programme, which was given in last week's Journal. The patriotic airs were brilliantly given, and applauded with the utmost enthusiasm. Some stirring Handel choruses were well sung, and the audience joined in the noble strains of America with the Society and orchestra.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION Concert on Wednesday was poorly attended. The more solemn music of the Dead March in the streets claimed the attention of all who had ears to hear. The next Concert, and last but one, will take place Wednesday Afternoon, May 8th.

Mrs. VARIAN has come here at an unfortunate time. Public attention is turned into other directions than to any form of art and has no curiosity for any new thing or person, so that the large and refined audience that assembled on Friday evening (of last week) was a most flattering evidence of the desire to hear her.

Mrs. Varian showed herself to be quite a remarkable singer, in extent and power of voice, certainly, and in the spirit and intelligence with which she sings. Chickering's room is too small, however, for her to appear to advantage, and the Music Hall would give a wider scope to her best points. Every song was much applauded and several were encored. At the end of the concert she sang with fire and effect, "The Star Spangled Banner," giving the new verse by Dr. Holmes, which the reader will find on another page. A scarf of the stars and stripes, and the Phrygian cap of Liberty on her head, made a graceful and appropriate costume and added to the effect. The song was prodigiously applauded and cheer rang through the hall, at the close. Mr. SIMPSON gave great pleasure by his expressive voice and his singularly sweet and sympathetic style, such as no tenor among us possesses. Mr. HOFFMAN showed himself a skillful pianist, and was cordially applauded.

We would fain inscribe Joachim's name in letters of fire in the heaven of art, for all those who have sought only passing comets and meteors, where a vivifying sun sends forth its warm beams. Let us allow the most glorious phenomena of a single day with their satellites and attendant moons, to pass by; they never loved art, and were never penetrated with its sunny rays, for the light with which they shone played on the surface only, while all within is cold and dark. What is Hecuba to them? If, by means of the hollow Trojan horse of their vanity and desire to please, they can subdue the multitude, the Troy of art itself may afterwards be ruined, and the high queen perish for what they care. Among the very few apostles of music who preach the pure unsophisticated doctrine of the divinity, and whose soul is filled with faith and enthusiasm, we must reckon, without question—Joseph Joachim. Look at him yonder, with his quiet, unpretending demeanor, externally resembling a bronze statue, though he is inwardly a flaming volcano, which speaks electrically, through his finger-tips, to your heart! Not producing momentary heat, but permanent warmth; not dazzling but illuminating, not merely extensive, but much rather intensive—such is Joachim's play. That he is the greatest violinist of the day is a fact attested by all who by greatness, understand—greatness of soul. What coyness, incomparable purity and neatness, there is in his execution! It seems as though Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven, whose quartets he plays in such an unrivaled manner, could all be heard at once, in his feeling and ravishing tones. In the most difficult passages, or in the simple sustained tone, it is the same—in every instance we find song; in every instance the deeply penetrating determination to produce music, and music alone; nowhere is there the slightest ostentation displayed in difficult and rapid passages, which the unprofessional hearer does not remark—nay, the existence of which he does not even suspect—and which sweep by us with the same placid repose as a fleet upon the wide ocean. Of all living violinists, Joachim is the most perfect representative of the classical style; nay, his whole being is classic and sterling merit itself. With the greatest outward calm he executes the most elevating, feeling, and powerful productions that musical art can produce. Not only do the great composers live again in him, but also the old Italian violinists, such as Tartini, Pugnani, &c., telling us how in times gone by, they played and trilled before the devil himself, Trille du Diable.

Berlin.

The Singakademie gave, at their late concert, Rudolph Schachner's oratorio, Israel's Return, a work preceded by so favorable a report as to excite great expectations in musical circles. Emanuel Geibel has arranged the text from Moore's "Sacred Songs," with connecting passages from Holy Scripture. The oratorio describes in four cantos, named respectively "Captivity," "Deliverance," "Reconciliation," and "Promise;" Israel's fall into sin and subjugation, its release from the Babylonian captivity, the returning favor of God, and His call to his chosen people. The idea of the oratorio has, in the oldest times of church-music, found the most various interpretations; and in the freedom which the composer has permitted himself with regard to the old established rule of church-music, we cannot therefore see any authorized subversion of its principles, nor can we in any way represent the work as faulty in its own peculiar department. With regard to the strictness and form of the music, the composer as a rule adheres to the main conditions of the oratorio; he oversteps, however, in many respects, the customary uniformity of the biblical elegiac mode of composition, and gives to his work the general lyric form, which produces more warmth, and excites deeply the sensibilities of the hearer. In but one instance have we to criticize the composer for having overstepped the usual limits in this respect; it is in the quartet and chorus at the end of second part, "So when the dread clouds of anger." Here he has exceeded the general boundaries of sacred music, and has fallen into the operatic style. The general impression of the work is, however, that the composer has been perfectly equal to his difficult task, and that he has gained for himself a good name among the first composers of sacred music of the past and present. We think more highly of the work, as it moves in a certain freedom of invention, without in any way transgressing the main principles of its allotted sphere. A most imposing effect is produced by the choruses of male voices in unisons, with orchestral accompaniment, quasi-recitative, a style we meet sometimes in Glück's and Weber's works. In its lyrical element, the work is remarkably rich and exciting; it is likewise so in the language of sound, whether in expressing the deepest feelings, or in describing the situation. The effect of Herr Schachner's being perfect master of the most modern instrumental effects assists not a little in giving this work an advantage over many solid older compositions. Schachner's inventive genius and his thorough musical accomplishments are most fully seen in the chorus, No. 13, "Go forth to the mount," with the (as fugato treated) "Since the time." We hope soon again to have the pleasure of hearing this well-deserving work. As to its performance by the Akademie, we may say that it was performed in such a manner as to procure the best introduction to the composer's work. The solos, in the hands of Mad. Harriers Wipperf, Fraulein Boer, Herren Geyer and Krause, left nothing to desire.—Berliner Blatt.

Vienna.

Joachim has taken leave of us, but, we trust, only to return very soon. This worthy man, as genuine and admirable in his private as in his professional character, must, on his side, have contracted friendly feelings for a city, which, like Vienna, has been so lavish in its marks of approbation. The recollection of Austria will, we feel sure, follow him like some warm spring breeze from the south, as far as the heaths of Lüneburg. May Joachim soon experience home-sickness. This is the only ill we wish him. His third concert, the last but one—in the Musik-Verein—began with Spohr's concerto in E minor, Op. 7, played with all the roundness and sweetness by which Spohr himself once enchanted his hearers, and, at the same time, with a grandeur of tone peculiar to Joachim. Beethoven's Violin Romance in G major followed as pendant to that in F, which was performed some days previously. A Fantasia with full band (Op. 131), by Schumann, was new to us. As Joachim possesses none of the vanity of a virtuoso, it was, we suppose, a feeling of tender respect that induced him to select this piece which is as difficult as it is unsatisfactory. Schumann wrote it in the decline of his faculties, and dedicated it to Joachim. It is a dark chasm, over which two great artists stretch out their hands to each other. Tortured, gloomy and obstinate, the Fantasia drags on its length in continuous figuration and with very little melodic substance. It is extremely seldom that the wearisome effect produced by it is broken by a clever instance of harmony or orchestration.

On taking leave of the Viennese public, Joachim followed up the more select soirées in the rooms of the Musik-Verein, by a grand musical rout. Since the concerts of Jenny Lind, we never remember having seen the grand Redoutensaal so full, or the Josephsplatz so besieged and barricaded by carriages. On the occasion, Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus merely served as a march to usher in the numerous late-comers, who wandered in long files to their places. The audience were not perfectly settled before the "Hungarian Concerto." This, which Joachim had performed at his second concert, was repeated by desire. In so doing, he rendered a service to the public, and to his own reputation as a composer. The "Hungarian Concerto" is one of those characteristic pieces which interest us at first time of hearing, and please at the second or third.

Like many others, we ourselves thought the work more expressive and sympathetic than we did at its first performance, which, by the way, was given in two confined a space. Grand and richly scored compositions, like fresco paintings, require distance in order to be properly appreciated. In the first movement there were many lengths—among them the cadence—the existence of which we can no more deny than the restless monotony of the finale, but the pathetic grandeur, which pervades the entire work, the marked character of the motives, and the clever manner in which they are worked out, not merely greatly excited our feelings, but, moreover, satisfied us, artistically speaking. The remaining pieces Joachim played were a fugue by Bach, and Mendelssohn's oft-heard concerto in E minor. Joachim's great aim was the plastic and well-marked expression of sustained melody, and grandeur combined with unity of style. How perfectly the softest tenderness and the most transient brilliancy may be united with the above qualities was proved by his rendering of the adagio and of the final movement—the latter being taken in the most rapid time. The public seemed to find it a difficult task to part from him. It was not till he had been called on several times that he took leave of us—a conqueror and a friend.

MSS. OF BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES.—Can any reader of the Musical World give information where the original manuscripts of Beethoven's First Symphony (in C), second ditto (in D), and Sixth, the "Pastoral," are now preserved?

The score of the "Pastoral," was sold in Vienna some years ago to a "gentleman in Holland," according to the statement of one of the firm of Artaria & Co., the well-known publishers. Should the ms. be still preserved in that country, its possessor would confer a favor upon the public by publishing its title exactly, together with the date, if (as Beethoven was in the habit of doing) the composer has dated it himself.

Ries says of the ms. of the Second Symphony that Beethoven presented it to him, but that some one borrowed and never returned it. As it is not likely to have been destroyed, any information relating to it would be of importance, especially the date of its composition.—A. W. T.—Musical World.

HERR FORMES.—This great German bass arrived in London yesterday. There is no longer any doubt about his engagement at the Royal Italian Opera. The probability expressed in the Covent Garden prospectus is changed to a certainty. Herr Formes will make his first appearance at the new theatre—his first at the Royal Italian Opera for five years—next week, or the week following, as Walter in Guillaume Tell.—Mus. World, Apr. 6.

FESTIVAL OF THE THREE CHOIRS.—The arrangements for the next festival of the three choirs of Worcester, Hereford and Gloucester (to be held at Hereford), are complete, so far as the engagement of the principals, band, and chorus, and the fixture of the programme is concerned. Mr. Townshend Smith, the conductor and talented organist of Hereford Cathedral, has succeeded in securing the services of the principal vocalists: Mlle. Titiens, Miss Louisa Pyne, and Mrs. Weiss, sopranos; Mad. Sainton-Dolby and Susan Pyne, contraltos; Mrs. Sims Reeves, Signor Giuglini, and Mr. Montem Smith, tenors; and Mr. Weiss and Mr. Winn, bass. This is an unusually bright array of talent for Hereford, but the festival is to eclipse all that has gone before. The performance of sacred music will be as follows: First morning, Mendelssohn's Elijah: second morning, The Last Judgment and part of Samson; third morning, "Spring" (Haydn), "Requiem" (Mozart), and Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise: fourth morning, Handel's Messiah. There will be morning prayers at the cathedral each morning, as at Worcester last year. At the evening concert Benedict's cantata Undine will be given, among the instrumental pieces will be Beethoven's pastoral symphony, and Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, with the overtures to Euryanthe (Weber), and Anacreon (Cherubini).

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

That handsome volunteer. Emile Berger. 25

A song for the times. It is very pretty and will doubtless become popular.

Memorare. Quartet and Chorus. Lambillotte. 50

A fine Offertory for Catholic Church service. Lambillotte's compositions for the church, on account of their flowing melody, simplicity of construction and the little difficulty they offer to organists and singers, have long enjoyed the greatest popularity among choirs of moderate ability, and need no recommendation.

The birds' awakening. Trio for female voices.

Concone. 30

Can be sung by single voices or by a chorus of fifty on a part. This and the other numbers, forming a set of similar pieces, under the title of "Les Harmonieaux," are adapted to operatic selections by Concone, author of the celebrated Singing exercises, and are highly popular in the female academies of France.

Sing for the night. Song & Chorus. H. Pond. 25

Simple and pleasing.

Moon behind the hill. (Guitar accompaniment.)

T. B. Bishop. 30

A well known song and a great favorite.

Instrumental Music.

The girl I left behind me. Quickstep. Turner. 25

This old air—none the less pretty for that—has received new significance in the present times. All the bands play it. This Quickstep is very prettily arranged, easy of execution and should be committed to memory by every patriotic young lady.

Merry midnight Polka. Henry Farmer. 25

A fresh, graceful little Polka, very good to dance by.

Miserere, from "Il Trovatore." Transc. C. Voss. 35

Notwithstanding the large number of arrangements of this air, which are now circulated, this piece will soon obtain precedence with advanced pianists. It is a perfect adaptation, bright and finished.

Young Recruit Grand March. Brinley Richards. 35

A lively march with Kuehn's spirited air for its principal theme.

MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE DRUM, containing Full Instructions and a Choice collection of Music for the Fife and Drum, including all the Signals and Calls used in Military Service. By O. W. Keach and B. A. Burditt. 50

This work is offered to the public as a thorough and concise method of learning the art of Drumming. Hitherto, books intended to give instruction in Drum beating, have been almost useless, owing to the unintelligible manner or system of instruction. In the "Modern School," the System of Professor Keach, (recommended by Edward Kendall, who excels as a Drummer as well as a Bugler), is adopted as being the best, imparting to the pupil, who faithfully adheres to the rules and practice, all that is needful to make a good Drummer.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

COMIC OPERA.

1830—1860.

HEROLD, ADAM, AUBER, HALEVY.

The desire of giving some analysis of the finest works of the French school forces us to pass in silence the names of composers of the second rank; and yet, although our attention must necessarily be given to the best composers, there appear, from time to time, works, which though of inferior excellence, cannot well be omitted from the library of a man of cultivated musical taste; such works are included in our list of select comic operas, given as an appendix to the present work. We confine ourselves here to compositions of superior merit.

Herold, son of a pianoforte teacher, originally from Germany, was born at Paris, Jan. 28, 1791. Notwithstanding his natural disposition to music, his father did not destine him to that difficult and ungrateful career. He was placed at the age of ten years in the school of M. Hix, rue de Matignon, and there the precocious child distinguished himself in those solid studies, which are so useful, however much one may be gifted by nature, to enable a man the better to comprehend and impart to others the ideas to which he may devote himself. Herold learned art as an amusement, but the premature death of his father led him to adopt it as his vocation. In October, 1806, he entered Louis Adam's pianoforte class in the conservatory, and obtained the first prize at the examination in July, 1810. He studied harmony under Catel and composition under Mehul with such success that after one year and a half of study he was able to obtain the first prize of the Institute, in August, 1812. His composition on this occasion, Mademoiselle de La Valliere, exhibits proofs of a remarkable genius for music. In November of the same year, Herold journeyed to Rome, where he spent the three happiest years of his life. He then went on to Naples. Here its beautiful sky, pure air, and the enthusiasm of the people developed in him an irresistible desire of production. This found vent in a two-act opera, which was brought upon the stage entitled la Gioventù di Enrico Quinto, and which was quite to the taste of the Neapolitan public.

Upon his return to Paris, toward the end of 1815, Herold found in Boieldieu, who had discerned his genius, a generous protector. That master gave him a part of an occasional piece Charles de France, to compose, and, under this high patronage, in 1816 he made his first essay upon the Parisians; his share of the music was so successful, that the text of the Rosieres was immediately confided to him. We feel in the three acts of this work the inexperience of the young man, but still certain strokes of fancy are strikingly beyond the general average of the music of that day. La Clochette followed. In the score of this work there is far more dramatic force and passion than in its predecessor; there was immense progress also in his instinct for scenic effects, but the novelty of his instrumentation was not at once comprehended. During the next eighteen months Herold wrote fantasias for the pianoforte, and other works of the kind; tired at length of waiting for a good text, which is not always at hand, he at last wrote the music for the Premier Venu, a cold though intellectual comedy in three acts, which Vial had received from the theatre Louvaia. In spite of an excellent trio by three men, feigning sleep, the opera obtained no success. Abandoning the text writer, Herold adapted new music to the old opera of the Troqueurs; but that superannuated form was not to the taste of an audience of 1819. A fatality seemed to pursue the great composer. A piece entitled L'Amour platonique reached its general rehearsal; but then it was found to be so feeble that its author withdrew it, and it was never performed in public. In 1820 Planard gave Herold L'Auteur mort et vivant. This comedy was not adapted to music and its success did not equal the hopes of the composer. Discouraged Herold gave up dramatic writing for three years, composing music for the pianoforte and filling the duties of accompanist to the Italian opera. But the desire to write for the stage began again to torment him. Le Muletier, brought out in 1823, established itself after a struggle in the list of acting works, and was followed by Lathénie and Vendôme en Espagne, which forced a just recognition of the author's talents. Le Roi René and le Lapin blanc failed; for Herold had allowed himself to fall into an imitation of Rossini. But Marie, an opera given in 1826, marks his return to his own style. Almost all the several pieces of this work gained a deserved popularity. He had now become the director of the vocal music at the opera, and wrote ten ballets and the fine overture of Missolonghi, executed with success at the Odeon. L'Illusion, a piece full of charms gained Herold the decoration of the Legion of Honor. Emmeline, brought out in 1830, was unsuccessful. The next year Zampa came and placed the author in the first rank of the French school. We find in this work an abundance of themes, dramatic force, and a genius for instrumentation and accompaniment, which have not yet been surpassed. The subject is one peculiarly fitted for opera by the amplitude of its forms, and the richness of its concerted pieces.

Meantime the health of Herold began to fail. After la Medecine sans Medecin, a little piece in which one feels the touches of genius, le Pré aux Clercs was brought out just before the death of the French Rossini. The man of genius had no time in which to enjoy his triumph. He died of consumption, Jan. 18, 1833, at Thernes, near Paris, and was buried in the cemetery of Pere Lachaise, not far from his master Mehul. He left one unfinished score, Ludovic, which was completed by Halevy and given successfully in 1834.

Adolphe Adam was born in Paris, July 24, 1803. His school education was begun at the establishment of M. Hix, where he was a fellow-pupil of Herold, and concluded at the College Bourbon, his family intending him for either the law or medicine. But the bent of his nature was towards dramatic music. His earnest importunity at length obtained for him a teacher of musical composition, M. Widerker. In 1817, he entered the conservatory, studying the organ with Benoit harmony and counterpoint with Reicha. Boieldieu afterward instructed him in free composition. To this excellent course of instruction he owes the freedom of his melody, the clearness of his accompaniment, and that brilliant and lucid orchestration, which always serves as a relief to the voice, but never smothers it. His father who knew the difficulties of a musical career, still opposed him, but Adam persevered, became an organist, then entered the orchestra of the Gymnase as triangle player, was soon advanced to the kettledrums, and then became chorus leader at the same theatre. During this period he composed a great number of graceful airs for the Vaudevilles, most of which became popular. Everybody remembers la Bateliere, Hussard de Felsheim, Mal du Pays and other pieces famous at that time. Having obtained the second prize of the Institute in 1825, Adam, now 22 years of age, made a journey to Holland, Germany and Switzerland, where he had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of Scribe. The celebrated author proposed to the young man to compose the airs of one of his vaudevilles destined for the Gymnase. Adam accepted the proposition with joy, obtained a great success, and refused the money sent him by Scribe, with the remark that he was fully paid by the honor of having been joined with him in a work. This disinterestedness gained him in process of time, the excellent text, le Chalet, which made and fixed his reputation throughout Europe.

Adam's first appearance as composer at the Theatre Feydeau, was in February, 1829, in a piece by Saint-Georges, entitled, Pierre et Catherine. He then composed Danilova, Josephine, le Morceau d'Ensemble and le Grand Prix, after which he went to London and brought out an opera and ballet. But the fogs of the Thames were not to the mind of Adolphe Adam.

Le Proscrit and Une bonne fortune announced his return to the Opera Comique; and on Sept. 25, 1834, he brought out le Chalet. This is in every respect a success, a masterpiece; it is the type of a complete whole, which has not been equaled since. We shall not undertake to give a complete list of Adam's operas; but will cite such as obtained the most decided success. They are la Marquise, le Postillon du Lonjumeau, le Fidele Berger, le Brasseur de Preston, la Reine d'un jour, le Roi d'Yvetot, le Toreador, Giralda, le Farfadet, la Poupée de Nuremberg, Si j'étais Roi, le Bijou perdu, le Sourde, and finally, les Pantins de Violette, which latter was brought out anonymously at the Bouffes Parisiennes. He also finished Lambert Simmel, which the unfortunate Monpou author of the Deux Reines and Piquillo, had left incomplete. Nor must we forget a long list of ballets for the Grand Opera, of which should be mentioned la Fille du Danube, Giselle, la Jolie fille du Gand, le Diable a quatre, Orfa, and le Corsaire. In 1846, Adam founded the Theatre Lyrique, and thus opened a new sphere for young composers. He also revived the Aline and Felix of Monsigny and many other old works forgotten by the present generation. He was Berton's successor in the Institute. Among his pupils are Saint-Julien, Poise, Cohen, &c. He wrote many pieces of church music full of sentiment, and handled the critic's pen in the Constitutionnel and in l'Assemblée nationale with a spirit, erudition and impartiality very remarkable. Struck down suddenly in the midst of all these labors, Adolphe Adam died May 3, 1856, regretted by his family, his friends and the Parisian public, which knew and loved the inextinguishable fire of his eminently French style.

Although Auber, born at Caen in Normandy, Jan. 29, 1784, was nineteen years older than Adolphe Adam, we have spoken of the latter before the present head of the French school, because pitiless death so prematurely put an end to the career of one of our most fruitful and graceful composers. We now come to the most illustrious of our contemporaries. Auber, the son of a picture dealer, and pupil of Ladurner upon the pianoforte, was sent while still quite young to London, to enter upon a mercantile career. Returning to France, he wrote as an amateur, romances, a trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, concertos for the latter instrument for Lamare and one for the violin, which was played by Maras at the conservatory. Julie, a comic opera with quintette accompaniment, had a success in a private theatre, and a second work with orchestra composed for the theatre of Prince de Chimay presaged the future glory of its author. He studied composition with Cherubini and wrote at that time a mass for four voices from which was taken long afterwards the noble prayer in Masaniello. Reverses of fortune led him to devote himself to art, when to use his own simple expression, he had the happiness to become acquainted with Scribe. For a dramatic composer it is a necessary condition that he find in the writers of his texts, that analogy of ideas and sentiments, which may give to their works the unity without which is no durable success. In 1813 Auber brought out his first work for the stage of the Theatre Feydeau, a piece by Bouilly entitled le Sejour militaire. Six years after, le Testament ou les Billets doux was unable to sustain itself upon the boards of the Opera Comique; but la Bergere Chatelaine, Emma, Leicester and above all la Niece (1823) made the talents of the young master most favorably known. Le Concert a la Cour and le Maçon, masterpieces of sentiment, spirit and taste obtained for this author in May, 1825, the well merited cross of the Legion of Honor. Fiorella followed and then the year 1828 saw the birth of two more masterpieces totally opposed in style, but of the first order; La Fiancee, a comic opera as graceful as it is excellent and La Muette (Massaniello), which had the glory of preceding Guillaume Tell and Robert le Diable, and still maintains itself side by side with those immortal works.

Fra Diavolo, an opera in three acts, introduced its author to the Institute in April, 1829. With le Philre, le Serment and Gustave followed, and Lestocq and le Cheval de bronze gained new successes at the Opera Comique. In 1836, Aceton, a delicious piece, introduced the celebrated songstress, Madame Damoreau, to the public. She triumphed anew in l'Ambassadrice and le Domino Noir. Les Diamants de la Couronne, la Part du Diable and la Sirene (1844) are the last works in what may be called Auber's second style. Delicacy, subtlety and an intellectual art take in them the place of the sentiment and breadth of expression, which are so preëminent in Le Maçon, La Muette and Fra Diavolo, the masterpieces of his first manner.

Haydée, to our apprehension, marks the third and last manner of the author. In it the comic opera is ennobled and almost touches the line of the grand opera. Marco Spada (1852) gave Bataille the opportunity of winning laurels, and Jenny Bell and Manon Lescaut have since given Mlle. Duprez and Madame Cabel scenes in which to bring out in high relief their peculiar excellences and exhibit their admirable talents. Marco Spada and Le Cheval de Bronze have had ballets added to them and have been transferred to the stage of the grand opera; they still delight the ears of the public with the immortal freshness of their melodies.

Auber's style never grows old. His vocal music is always fine; his harmony is irreproachable for its skill and purity; his instrumentation is clear, elegant, and sonorous; it is still a model of style for the French comic opera. His overtures are generally excellent. The auditor feels that his style is formed in the school of Mozart, Haydn and Rossini. It is neat, precise, firm, always original, never extravagant. His music is always recognizable from all other. He possesses individual character, and this is the stamp of genius with which the deity seals his elect. Auber has also written religious music in the purest taste. At present he is the chapel master of Louis Napoleon and director of the Conservatory.

We have already spoken of our illustrious master, Fromenthal Halévy. He was the son of Israelitish parents, and was born at Paris, May 27, 1799. The "French Meyerbeer" was admitted into the conservatory and joined the sol-feggi class of Cazot, Jan. 30, 1809. He studied pianoforte with Charles Lambert, harmony with Berton, counterpoint, fugue and composition with Cherubini. He was allowed to contest the prizes of the Institute in 1816, and three years later bore off the highest with a cantata entitled Herminie. After two years in Italy, Halévy made his first theatrical attempt at the Theatre Feydeau, in 1827, with l'Artisan, a comic opera in one act, text by Saint Georges.

This essay was followed by le Roi et le Batelier written in conjunction with Rifaut; then by the Dilletante d'Avignon, which gave the young artist a favorable reputation. La langue Musicale came next, text by Saintine; in 1833 he gave at the Opera Comique Les Souvenirs de Lafleur, text by Martin, and then produced the Ludovic of Herold, the score of which he had completed. He was appointed professor of sol-feggi at the conservatory in 1815, and succeeded, in turn, Daussoigne as professor of harmony, and Fétis as professor of high composition. In 1835 La Juive and L'Eclair, two works, totally diverse in form, opened the doors of the Institute to Halévy.

He was elected as Reicha's successor in July, 1836. In L'Eclair universal applause was bestowed upon the duet of the two sisters, in which the characters of the coquette and of the sentimental girl are so happily contrasted; the air of the sailor, where the vicissitudes of his calling are so finely brought out; the delicious duet of love, "Ah! si tu voulais finir ma peine"; and the sweet melody "Quand de la nuit l'épais nuage." Elevation of idea here is combined with delicacy of sentiment.

Le Guittarrero gave the tenor, Roger, opportunity to display his remarkable talents, which afterward shone with such lustre in Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, a delicious work brought out in 1846. Le val d'Andorre was a new success for its author; Bataille, who created the part of the old goatherd, made of that eminently picturesque character a striking type of truth and nature.

La Fée aux roses and La dame de pique brought out all the light and easy vocalization of Mlle. Lefebvre and the great talents of Madame Ugalde. Then came Le Nabab in which Couderc played so finely, in which Bussine and Madame Miolan sung with such perfection: this was followed at the Theatre Lyrique by Jaguarita l'Indienne for Madame Cabel, and at the Opera Comique by Valentine d'Aubigny, in which Mlle. Duprez played the principal part with her usual distinction. At the opera was brought out the Juif Errant and La Magicienne.

M. Halévy is the only composer who has had equal success both at the Grand and the Opera Comique, a double glory too rare not to deserve particular notice.

Moreover, the illustrious professor has produced a school already numerous and distinguished. Among his more known pupils, we may name Boulanger, Gounod, Bazin, Victor Masse, Deldevez, Danola, Hignard, Delioux, Mathias, Semet, &c. We close this notice with the remark that Halévy is a man of high education, and is a fine writer, as his notices of David d'Angers, Paul Delaroche and Adolphe Adam prove.

The duties of perpetual secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts could not be confided to a man more capable.

Musical Education and Instruction.

By Dr. MARX, of Berlin.*

THE RIGHT OBJECT AND THE RIGHT MEANS.

What is really the proper object of all musical education and employment?

Joy in the Art—we declare as the first object. A joyless occupation in it—and how frequently do we meet it! how common is the observation, unfortunately, that in the learning and practising of music, the original delight is quickly extinguished, never to be felt again in its pristine vigor and productiveness—is fatal to the artistic sense, and is, indeed, more injurious than total disoccupation, since it not only misapplies the time which might have been otherwise profitably employed, but also destroys our capacity of receiving satisfaction from art.

But the joy must be really artistic—not foreign; and still less must it be opposed to art. We would hereby deprecate the tickling vanity which loves to make a display of extraordinary technical facility, and plumes itself on difficulties overcome. Nothing is more foreign nor further than this littleness from true art, whose high calling it is to raise us from the narrow limits of personal feelings, into the region in common, of universal joy, love, and inspiration; nothing is more inimical and destructive to the true sense and enjoyment of art, than this poisonous mildew, which overlays artistic activity and its productions. Nothing more surely draws the mind from the purifying atmosphere of art, into the petty, narrow strivings and contentions of self-seeking vanity; than this eager ostentation of personal skill; and, in fine, nothing manifests more clearly to an intelligent mind, the wide gulf which separates vain from true art, than this exchange of its outward means, for its inward soul and object. How general, however, is this striving in our parties and concerts! How rarely is the joy of the listeners the object of our concert players and amateurs! How much nearer have they not at heart, to astonish the less proficient, and to startle the unartistic crowd with newly invented contrivances, with a technical composition of a Chopin, or a study of a Thalberg, or whatever the latest finger-artist may be called. And how often is it not the teachers who urge their pupils to this pernicious competition, simply in order to obtain more scholars! The lowest, most unreflecting, merely corporeal pleasure of music, the most superficial enjoyment of a skipping dance, is more artistic, more productive and nobler, than this monstrosity, which is so widely diffused amongst us. The feeling performance of the most trivial song or the most simple waltz, is a stronger proof of the ability of the scholar and of the teacher, than those precocious and forced, though in reality cheap productions of vanity.

The corporeal pleasure caused by art, awakens by itself a spiritual participation; and this spiritual participation in art, we regard as the highest object to which our employment therein is to be directed. If we do not close our heart and sensibilities, by caprice and ill-directed exertion,—if we do not ourselves destroy our feelings, and the natural operation of our minds, emotion will spring of itself from the corporeal apprehension of the artistic work; a more elevated life will flow through our nerves, and joy through our mind, such as the pure enjoyment of art alone can produce: the assurance of community, of well-being, will loosen the hard crust of egotism from our hearts, and bind us the more closely in sympathy and affection with the friends who participate in our pleasures. The heart opens itself willingly to new sensations and an altered state of mind occasioned by works of art, and receives them devotedly, pure, and free from all dross and sharp asperities of real personality; it is a communion of one soul with others, full of the internal feelings of humanity, and yet exempt from all oppressive materiality, or other disturbing objects. And thus this shadowy being, invoked by the musician's art, waves its life of high significance before us; we live in it, in pleasure or pain, as the spirit of the artist wills; with him, faultless and untouched, our personality becomes involved in a manifold spiritual existence, and we experience in ourselves the countless riches of this spiritual life, together with our narrowly limited corporeal reality. Herein we behold long-departed beings and circumstances—those pure forms which Gluck evoked from Greece and the enchanted East: the patriarchal simplicity and dignity of that people, out of whose darkness the light of the world was to come, in Handel's songs: the mad confusion of the Pharisees and their party, before the holiness of the new covenant, in Bach's immortal works. All these pass before us; ages long in oblivion, seem sensibly present.

Whatever can move the human heart in innocence, joy, delicacy, and childish humor, the most lovely play of the imagination, and the most mysterious sensations of our spiritual essence,—all that Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven could feel or imagine, is laid open to us, and becomes our own.

The real indwelling in art, and sincere devotion to it, are essential conditions in artistic education; without them we cannot participate in its inestimable gifts; they are absolutely indispensable.

It is not the possession of great artists, nor of great works of art, which insures to a nation or to its gifted individuals, a genuine artistic education, and thereby the full enjoyment of the art. If such were the case, no nation could be more assured than ours of the highest musical education; since, during the last century, at least, our musicians have produced the most lofty and most pregnant ideas that have ever been embodied in sound. We have, on the other hand, experienced within a single century, after three noble exaltations, in the day of Bach and Handel, of Gluck—Haydn and Mozart,—and of Beethoven; also three several depressions from our upward flight; nay, if we will believe the loudest and most numerous voices of the day, it would seem that in many minds even the remembrance were lost of what in former days were universally acknowledged to be our brightest landmarks to excellence.

Playing and hearing only, cannot be relied on as a sufficient means of education, although they must be the foundation and companions of musical cultivation; for we hear bad music as well as good; and we know that the weak and the spurious produces its effect (often quicker and to a greater extent) as well as the elevated and genuine. We must herein the more readily acknowledge the power of sound, that even in its perverted employment it still exerts a vast influence over the mind and senses,—apart, moreover, from the effect of secondary objects, of prejudice, and of fashion. Indeed, it is not to be denied, that the corporeal effect of sound acting in large masses, in conjunction with considerable talent, magnified, perhaps, by partiality into great superiority, in the performers, is capable of producing from very moderate or indifferent works an effect which may surprise artists of judgment; but the cause of that effect is not in the composition—it is the attributes of the large body or volume of sound, and of the influential partiality for the performers. Hence we may perceive how small the claims may be of many a vaunted work of art, whose pretensions have been estimated by its immediate consequences. Those persons, however, are acting very injudiciously, who desirous of no further struggle, seem contented and satisfied with the good that exists. It will indeed endure, without further exertion. It will be conveyed from artist to artist, and the magnificent structure of art will be completed, so far as may be permitted to humanity. But the communication the participation of artistic, and therewith civilized elevation in our contemporaries, cannot be allowed to remain stationary. The history of the world is reckoned by centuries, and at wide intervals. The moments of improvement progress like stars in the heavens, and with them as they roll; but the limited space of human life cannot dispense with its portion of their beneficent illumination.

In fine, the mere external, technical, mechanical, formal education, does not reach to the deep spring, where the lifestream of art is generated and preserved. It is but too often observable, unfortunately, how empty and unproductive this false external cultivation leaves the mind; how, in its pursuit, year after year, full of the noblest germs of life, and capable of the highest joys of art, are allowed to fade and wither away. It has been remarked but too frequently, that these disciples of technicality, these virtuosi, these amateur dilettanti, these thorough bass cognoscenti, and æsthetic critics, have the most unsatisfactory conceptions of art, that they have little sympathy with it, and are utter strangers to its nature and operation.

True artistic education, like true art, is not concerned merely with the technicalities, which make only a handicraftsman, nor with mere outward consideration, which, instead of living art, produce nothing but dead abstractions. It is governed by the essential nature of its duties, and assumes for its object the bringing into life and action the highest and fullest conception of art in each individual, and in the greatest number of individuals in the whole nation. In the pupil, it searches for the germ of artistic susceptibility and capacity. This spark it cherishes and frees from obstructions, and nourishes and strengthens into the power of life. It then contemplates the regions of art, and examines what has hitherto been produced. Of all this, and of that which is most worthy, it endeavors to convey as much as possible to the scholar, according to the power of each individual. This education does not move the hand and fill the ear alone, but penetrates by the senses into the soul; through the deeply moved sensibilities it awakens the inward consciousness. And now the waves of sound may surge and roll—what the inward consciousness has apprehended, that which has become a sentiment and property of the mind, can be safely preserved and extended.

This, in brief, is the object of true artistic education,—to elevate the capabilities, mental and corporeal, to the highest point. This is the indispensable process, without which, high attainment in art is not possible. This is more or less the enlightened struggle of all who either wholly or in part devote their life and powers to artistic employment; this, whether it be acknowledged or not, it is the absolutely undeniable and indispensable obligation of all teachers to produce.

Shall it be considered an empty dream to desire for our country, so deeply gifted in the art of sound, a general popular education in music, in that high and only true sense? Does not this want and right proclaim itself from the deep in-born feelings of the people, from the overflowing abundance of their conceptions, from our countless artists, from our display of the richest productions of art in advance of nations? Shall our festivals be never more joyous with our national songs, which are more abundant, more varied, more melodious, and more deeply touching than those of any people on earth? Shall the evangelical church be perpetually deprived of her own appropriate music, which centuries ago was created for her? Shall the Catholic church, in whose sacred service music assumes so important a function, suffer in our country so deep a degradation as it has endured in Italy, where movements from Rossini's and Bellini's operas, and Auber's overtures, disgrace the most holy moments of the service? Or in Spain, where in recent times, church music is dumb, even to the psalmody of the priesthood? We fear it not, and those who with us have a higher trust, will labor incessantly with all their strength, and on all occasions, to attain the highest object. We, a laborious people, strong in body and mind, must strive for a higher elevation than tender nature has conferred on her southern children to amuse their happy hours.

In so important a matter, however, the word or deed of individuals can do but little. The State only can produce the accomplishment of our aspirations. From this source much must be expected, if to good will, the power of finding fit agents,—not handicraftsmen who would propagate their own peculiarities, but men who would add the spirit of art to its form, mind to technicality; in short, men who have made true art the object of their lives.

We must at the same time, acknowledge that the condition and progress of art are entirely dependent upon the state of the political and moral relations and movements of the people. This has been already observed by many in the direction of art during the last ten years. But the history of art proves that her destiny in this regard has been governed by the highest wisdom and goodness. Let, therefore, each individual in joyful confidence do all he ought, and may, and can; and tranquilly await the result of doing his duty.

Joachim as a Composer.

It is in vain we listen for the most distant approach to a false note; it is in vain we wait for the slightest trick, such as those now practised by modern virtuosos, who, by false sentimentality, by distorting the notes, or by inordinately raising or lowering them, parody the feelings; it is in vain we seek to read on his features how difficult this or that passage is; it is not thus that he announces what he is going to play; he expresses in eloquent, true and warm words. It is not, however, only as an instrumentalist that he occupies the highest position; he does so also as a composer, as he has proved by his "Concerto in Ungarischer Weise." Thus artistically, and, above all, nobly connected, Hungarian music has a truly great future in store for it. Joachim has taught us how great and elevating a work of art may be created out of the pregnant materials of Hungarian music, rendered on the violin. This is the means by which the type of Hungarian national music will ripen into artistically historical and universal significance; and we have a double reason for being delighted that Hungary possesses in its patriotic countryman a great instrumental artist, who bears the spirit of Hungarian music upon eagle's pinions through the wide world.

The concerto consists of three parts: "Allegro maestoso," "Romance," and "Finale à la Zingara." We might fancy we were enjoying the effect produced by a Symphony of Schumann's, in so correct and searching a mode has Joachim treated his Hungarian theme. The solo violin is the Speaker of the House, who descends from his official chair to commence with the other members—the orchestral parts, the debate, the members often obtaining, with their objections, the best of the argument. But the logic of reason, respect for the laws, and perseverance achieve a victory. The sparkingly free fancy of the first movement is succeeded by a wonderfully beautiful romance, while in the last movement the ennobled shades of Lavata, Csérnak, Bihari, and Rózsavölgy fit up and down, in inspiring staccatos and runs, before us. The difficulties to be overcome in playing the concerto can be appreciated only by violinists. The success achieved by its performance was truly something extraordinary; we trust it may induce the "composer," Joachim, to continue his labors in the branch of his art, to the glory of his fatherland and of Hungarian music. Bach's Chaconne and Tartini's Teufelsdröcke were the other pieces selected by the concert-giver. Did we not fear having already afforded the artist's extraordinary modesty grounds for recrimination by the above true, though weak expression of our feelings, we would speak only in dithyrambic verse; but we forbear, and on this occasion will praise the audience, who knew how to honor not only patriotic sentiments but art in the artist—art which, it is true, by the way, streamed forth with most overwhelming power. Bach's Chaconne, notwithstanding the fact that Schumann and Mendelssohn wrote pianoforte accompaniments for it, is certainly more characteristic without any accompaniment at all, as it originally stood, and as Joachim played it. The combination of the conflicting parts, the strong and truly antique conception, and the sublime earnestness of the old master, can be grasped only after such an interpretation of them. Who can have played this difficult piece in Bach's lifetime, we wonder! We fancy that the Chaconne could, in those days, have been performed as a trio or quartet at the utmost. A no less sterling composition is Tartini's Trille du Diable. The inspiration and poetry exhibited in the execution of the first andante movement, which is so unaffectedly simple, weigh down a whole legion of virtuoso tricks. The last movement with the double trill which the devil played to Tartini in the latter's dream, and whence the sonata afterwards sprang, enjoyed, in truth, a demoniacal success. The audience, even when the piece had been repeated, would hardly leave the rooms. But who likes to part with such an artist, who keeps in his magic bow a host of spirits, all obeying the soul of their master, Mlle. Métyr kindly assisted the concert-giver by singing several songs.—Pesth Lloyd Zeitung.

Mason & Hamlin's Melodeons and Harmoniums.

The manufacturing of these instruments in Boston has become a branch of industry of much importance, calling into requisition no small amount of capital and giving employment to numerous operatives. We presume that everybody knows that they are extensively used in churches and public halls in place of the more expensive and cumbersome organ; in fact, nearly all our village churches now use the Organ Harmonium, an instrument not much larger than a pianoforte, but which gives the full swell and volume of sound of an organ itself. (?)

The principal manufacturers of these instruments, Messrs. Mason & Hamlin, of Boston, have just completed an entirely new and extensive manufactory on the site of their old one which was destroyed by fire, and in so doing have shown that degree of Yankee energy for which Massachusetts men are so celebrated. Their old works were burned down the 14th of last January, on the 10th of April following, less than three months after, a large five story building was completed on the same spot, corner of Cambridge and Charles streets, complete in all its departments, with machinery of the most approved description. The new machinery and improvements in this factory, give it a decided advantage over any other of the kind in the country.

The whole building throughout is heated by steam, supplied by a splendid 20 horse-power steam-engine, made by the Corliss Steam Engine Co., of Providence, which also drives all the machinery of the factory; the boiler is situated in a building entirely separate from the main building, the shavings and fuel kept in a fire-proof brick vault, and other precautions taken to render the premises secure against accident by fire.

The lower or basement floors contain large drying rooms, where the stock used in the manufacture of instruments is subjected to a thorough heating and drying process; a portion of the first story is used for the wareroom and offices, while the other half is occupied by numerous planing machines, circular saws, jig saws, turning machines, boring machines, &c., of the latest and most improved description. Upon this floor is also the testing or finishing room, in which every instrument is thoroughly examined and tested by an expert before it is packed for transportation, in order to prevent all mistakes and ensure satisfaction to the purchaser.

Above, in successive stories of the building, and in different rooms, the various departments of the work are carried on—the veneering, the polishing, fitting the keys, varnishing, action making, tube board making, turning, fly finishing, &c. Various machines are in operation in these different rooms driven by the motive power of the establishment, and performing work with almost human intelligence. In the glue, varnish and staining rooms the heating of those materials is done by steam, artificial heat being obtained from no other source. The ceilings in all the rooms are plastered, quite unusual in factories, but a further preventative against fire.

We have spoken above of the popularity of these instruments. We are informed by Messrs. Mason & Hamlin that some four hundred churches have, up to this time, been furnished with their Harmoniums, which are much preferred to pipe organs by churches of moderate dimensions. The instruments made by this firm have also been sold in every State in the country, besides being exported to Europe, Asia, Africa, South America and the Sandwich Islands,—like all Yankee inventions, penetrating every part of the known world. Their superiority is attested by the fact that they have invariably received the first premium where they have been brought into competition with others at exhibitions. No less than twenty-six awards have been received by the manufacturers the past five years from institutes, &c., in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and other cities. They are also preferred and recommended by all musical instructors and organists.

Of the Harmoniums there are five different sizes, made with from six to twelve stops, with and without pedal bass, at prices varying from two to five hundred dollars. Of the Melodeons there are eight styles. They are made with one and two sets of reeds, one and two banks of keys, and range from four to six octaves. The prices of these are from forty-five to two hundred dollars. The high reputation which these instruments have attained is due not only to a liberal expenditure of means, but also to the thorough and efficient manner in which they are made, the strictest attention and care being given to every detail in their make, thereby producing a perfect whole.

The establishment of Messrs. Mason & Hamlin is among the best appointed manufactories in the city limits. It is open, we understand for the inspection of the public, and is well worth a visit from musical amateurs and those interested in industrial progress a model establishment of the kind.—Commercial Bulletin.

Musical Correspondence.

TORONTO, APRIL 27, 1861.—Dear Journal!—

After a long drought in musical circles, we have at length been favored with a stream of gushing melody from that celebrated artiste, Madame Ines Fabbri, who not long since astonished your Boston public with her extraordinary powers of voice and dramatic execution. And it is to express my extreme satisfaction with all I have heard of her that I now write.

From all I can learn her fine talents are already sufficiently known and appreciated, in your city to render further comment on my part useless. But I would, nevertheless, add my mite to the ample store of praise so deservedly bestowed upon her by all American Journals, among which in regard to musical matter yours ranks first in Canadian estimation.

Mad. Fabbri is considered by most of our musical critics as the greatest artiste who has visited us since Jenny Lind. The wide range of her talents was evinced in her skilful rendering of the aria from the first act of Traviata, the tragic scene from Nabucco, and a grand scene from Martiri, all of which were produced in a style deserving of the highest encomium.

Herr Richard Mulder, is a pianist who ranks in our estimation very high, perhaps second to none. He surmounts the difficulties of the instrument with the greatest ease, and his fantasia on airs from Lucia, and "the Cascade," show him to be a fine composer.

Mr. C. R. Adams, of Boston, is probably well known to you. He possesses a fine tenor voice the peculiar sweetness of which renders all his selections exceedingly effective, and in the scene and duo from Martiri, with Mad. Fabbri showed also some pretensions to being an actor.

I enclose programme of the concert and until further news (musical of course) presents itself, remain

Truly yours,

BERTRAND.

The Universal Carnival—Mulder—For the Piano, executed by R. Mulder.
I Martiri (in appropriate costume) Grand Duo and Scene. Pauline..... Madame Fabbri
Polluto..... Mr. Adams

PARIS, APRIL 19, 1861.—A young artist has made her debut at the Italian Opera who promises to take her rank among the celebrities before long. Her name is Trebelli, her family name Gillebert. Thus it will be seen that her real name spelt backwards with the G left out gives her assumed stage name Trebelli. So much for an Italian termination. Young and handsome she proved the power of her voice and the excellence of her playing in Il Barbiere di Siviglia also in Rossini's Semiramide. Her voice is a mezzo-soprano and is pronounced by many here the equal of Alboni's, in some respects. Her success was decisive.

At the Théâtre Français M. Legouvé gives a new piece Un jeune homme qui ne fait rien—However this may be his Madone de l'Art which is still being played at the Odeon is not calculated to increase the fame of this illustrious academician. "The Madonna of Art" is simply a poor weak play that lives only by the talent of Mme. Ristori. An Italian actress Beatrix loves a German prince and is loved by him in return; but Beatrix is as virtuous as she is talented, she will not be his mistress, she cannot be his wife though he presses her to accept his hand. She is the first to show him the fallacy of such a marriage and with an excess of generosity not explained in the play she abandons all thoughts of love to become a Madonna of art. Such is the whole plot, good in its fundamental ideas, but weakly carried out. It was a happy thought however, for the Italian actress thus to appear for the first time in a French play in the character of an Italian. The very irregularities in her pronunciation thus cease to be a blemish, for Mad. Ristori has not yet divested herself of the intonations of the language of Alfieri. It is in the simplest phrases that this Italian tone, it would be too much to call it accent, is the most sensibly felt. When there are outbursts of passion that very cadence adds force to the evenness of the French phrase. One realizes how great is the talent of the artist who has had the courage to act in a language not her own when seeing her side by side with the artists of the Odeon, these who at other times appear so good, seem unnatural and forced in their play. There are in the Madonna of Art two episodes as it were in which Beatrix can show her power a little in spite of M. Legouvé. In that small unnamed German principality where she is a guest she is asked to recite some passage, she does so choosing a scene from Schiller's Joan of Arc and one from Romeo and Juliet. Here the author has merely weakened the original of both scenes and yet those are the passages in his play which alone enable Mad. Ristori to display a talent equal to the situation to be rendered. "La Madone de l'Art" is played five times a week and long before the performance commences every seat in the house has been taken.

At the porte St. Martin a Spanish legend has been worked up with all the extravagance of melodrama by G. Vaquerie son-in-law of Victor Hugo, the piece is called Les Funerailles de l'honneur. It was hissed at the first representation. This theatre is now closed for a few days as the Tour de Nesle is to be reproduced soon.

Of novelties there are few enough of importance. At the Bouffes Parisiennes Le Pont des Soupirs by Offenbach. At the Theatre Dejazet another parody on Tannhäuser by Clairville Le panse aux Aïres. At the Variétés L'Amour en Sabots, a vaudeville by Labiche and Delacour. At the Delassements Comiques, Photographies Comiques by A. Flan and Ernest Blum. At the Folies Dramatiques Cesarine Borgia vaudeville by Tréfeu and Les seize ans de Lucienne by Elie Trébut.

Three German operas are about to be produced. "King George," by Ehrlich—"Wittekind," by Raphael and "The Love Ring," by Stukersky.

A new opera "Shakespeare," by Maestro Benvenuti, is announced in the Italian journals.

Staudig the German singer died on the 24th of last month. His intellect has failed him a few years ago. In early life he was on the point of taking monastic vows. He never succeeded in the Italian opera.

For Easter music we have had at the opera Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The church music during holy week has been noticed in some of the Paris papers in connection with concerts &c.

The receipts of the theatre of the capital during month of March were 1,606,868 francs.

To night at the Opéra Comique will be given Royal cravate, music by the Duke de Massa, words by the Count of Mesgrigny. F. B.

Church Music in St. Louis.

ST. LOUIS, MAY, 1861.—In speaking of the churches of St. Louis we will take the church of Rome first, surpassing as it does in numbers, both of churches, congregations and wealth all others together. No other city in the world has so many nationalities, so equally represented, as this. Here, true to her principles, the Catholics in their appeals to the sense have spent immense sums on buildings and decorations, and of course, while so much is done for the eye, the ear has received its due share of attention, consequently we have the same fine old organs, and the same thrilling music we have so often listened to in the cathedrals of the old world. In our rambles let us stop first at St. John's Church, corner of 16th and Chestnut. This is a new church, one of the most costly, and has the finest organ and choir in St. Louis. Father Brannon takes the greatest interest in the choir. They have a nice room fitted up by the side of the organ, and furnished with sofas, easy chairs, a library of classical music, &c., &c. Nothing more comfortable. The first organ ever heard in public worship in this country was sent from London to the King's Chapel in 1714. The organist came with it, there being none in America. The first organ ever built in this country was made by Edward Bronfield, who died Aug. 18th, 1776.

The fact is stated on his tombstone. The organ in St. John's Church is excelled by few in the United States. We have not room for a detailed statement, but we question if there is an organ of two sets of keys on the continent which can be compared with this one in effectiveness. The number of pipes or stops is not always a true index of the capacity of an organ. In this organ there are no half stops. The largest metal pipe is 16 feet high and 39 inches in circumference its tone being C C C. The largest pipe is C C C C 32 feet Bourdon. The pedal organ contains double stop diapason, violoncello and viola or octave viol, being the most powerful in the country, except the pedal organ of the instrument in Tremont Temple, Boston. The whole number of pipes is 1529 and 34 stops. The organ is supplied with a set of composition pedals whereby the player gains the effect and variety of 3 banks of keys. The compass of the pedal organ is from C C C C to C C and the great and swell organ from C C to G in alt. The case is 21 feet by 33, beautifully finished in white, but space forbids us from saying more.

The organist is worthy of his instrument. He is a young man who used to play when a boy in Dr. Gray's church, Boston, and afterwards in the Tabernacle, New York. He has no rival in the whole West, and many a player have I listened to in, even your city, who could not hope to bear from him the palm. It would be useless for me to describe a first-class organ player, your readers know what that is as well as I do. His name is A. J. Ulman. No organist is better supported.

Arnold Scharvens, bass, is one of our best singers, having enjoyed all the advantages of Europe. It is impossible for us to notice each one in particular and to do each justice. A. W. Howe, baritone, Wm. Anderson, 1st tenor, Geo. Dennison, 2d tenor, are among our best singers. Anderson is also from Boston, and used to belong to the Handel and Haydn Society there. The soprani, Miss Virginia C. Ivory and Miss Fanny Lord and the alto singers, Miss Julia Orcutt and Miss Dora Sutherland complete the principal solo singers, the choir having an effective chorus. There is not in this city a better singer than Miss Ivory; we were very much surprised indeed when we first heard her, as we knew of no such voice in any choir. This choir sing all of the music of the Catholic church and while we have listened to the glorious music of Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini, &c., we could not but think, what we now affirm, that we would like to see the equal of this choir in the West. "Brown."

The World of Weimar.

It must not be supposed that because Schiller and Goethe are no more, and that because the happy contingency which united a literary circle in Weimar in the time of Karl August does not favor the times of Karl Alexander, that that prince is doing nothing to keep up the Athenian character of his tidy little capital.

It is now, if not the metropolis of literature, at least the metropolis of music; by no means, however, a republican metropolis, for the Government has become a perpetual dictatorship in the hands of Liszt, who reigns supreme as ever over the piano, and tells the prince and people of Weimar what they ought to believe in and to love. Whether Liszt however great a genius, may be called a great composer, some may be inclined to doubt; for the music in which this maestro glories is anything but composing, and, to uninitiated ears like my own, the nearest idea that it conveys is that of a melodious and harmonious thunderstorm, mixed with occasional broadsides from half a dozen line-of-battle ships. It is music which, a German critic has said, would make a deaf man hear, and a hearing man deaf. It is heard in perfection in those whirlwind operas of Wagner, in which the harmony mounts and mounts and mounts, with a swing and sweep which seems to take all the house up to the ceiling with it, until it busts and falls about our ears in a general explosion of brasses, scattering clapping of kid-gloves like crackers.

The apotheosis of this distinguished artist has taken place in his lifetime. He is everywhere the oracle on matters of musical taste. He has a fine house on a height commanding the city, said to have nine pianos among its furniture. Here he receives the homage of torchlight processions and gifts from fair maidens' hands. At every musical exhibition he alone, by common consent, is allowed the privilege of a "bravo," while his silence is the severest censure that any artist has to apprehend, unlike that of the severer count in Lord Byron's "Beppo." For Liszt is a thoroughly genial genius. When he appears in a room, with his long, large, enthusiastic face, spare figure, flashing eyes, and streaming hair, all know that the reign of matter-of-fact and daylight disagreeables is past, and the advent of the artist is hailed by all as the beginning of enjoyment, as might have been the coming of the musical sun-god Apollo, when he shed his vocal beam on Memnon's statue. He is surrounded by a host of lesser stars; and a greater treat for the ears can scarcely be conceived than any musical entertainment at Weimar under his auspices. He is in his glory at the court-concerts, where he directs the band. If Liszt is the prince of the piano, so we have here a fair muse of vocal melody in the person of the Frau von Milde. This lady's voice seems to have been created expressly for the Weimar theatre. It is never astonishing in its strength, like that of Grief or Alboni; but, without the exact measure of fulness, it approximates, in its weird sweetness and delicate flexibility, to that of Jenny Lind. But Jenny Lind would have been too much for our quiet little theatre, as we wish to dine pleasantly every day, and not to feast; so we are perfectly pleased, evening after evening, by the singing of our sweet prima donna. As an actress, she is not demonstrative, and rather falls short of than overleaps the mark in action; but in dignified quiet parts—the parts of princesses, especially in the romantic operas of Wagner—she is quite at home. By some she is considered beautiful, but none will deny that the expression of her countenance is as angelic as her notes. Perhaps the most pleasing of all her parts is that of Fidelio, the lady in page's dress who rescues her husband from death in prison. She is supported by another singer of very high merit, and a decidedly good actress, the Fräulein Wolf; and there are other ladies who sing well, as well as some who look very well—for instance, Fräulein Baum. The gentlemen, also, are fully adequate to the parts they have to sustain. We have the Herr von Milde, the fortunate husband of the prima donna whose imposing face and figure fit him well to sustain the parts of heroes and warriors; Knop, a Hungarian of sweet and delicately-managed voice, as barytone, the latter gentleman being also a very good comedian; Roth as basso, and, from his portly figure, a good king or emperor; Meffert as tenor. This gentleman's action, at first somewhat extravagant, has been moderated since his residence in the tasteful Weimar, and he often gives general satisfaction. Schmidt and his lady are also good, both as actors and singers. In fact, the whole singing staff, including the inferior parts, is excellent. When we pass to tragedy and "drame," we are pleased by the fine acting of Fräulein Daun, especially in such parts as those of Minna von Barnhelm of Lessing; while other parts, especially those where maidenly naivete is a characteristic, are appropriately rendered by Fräulein Röckel, a young, beautiful, and daily improving actress.

The weakest part of the theatrical repertoire is the ballet; the strongest is perhaps the band, as would be expected in the musical metropolis. This is generally under the direction of Herr Lassen, the composer of the opera of Frauentob, in the style of Wagner. Weimar has to lament the recent death of another distinguished resident composer, Monsieur Chelard, formerly "Capelmeister." His opera of Macbeth, altered from Shakespeare, is occasionally given, with vociferous applause from those who love the romantic opera, or Music of the Future, as it is somewhat quaintly called by its admirers, its claims being modestly allowed to be not fully admitted at present, or being more pretentiously put forward as too great for the understandings of the present generation.

Whether the operas of Wagner will ever be popular in England, depends much on the set of the tide of fashion—fashion being there in some measure independent of taste; and we should think it highly probable that before long they will have their day, and keep it till the fashion is over and the houses cease to fill. In France, however, I should doubt if the experiment, which is to be tried shortly, will succeed, French taste being as yet too strongly wed to the classical school of music; and French taste is one of those few things in France which is essentially conservative and unchangeable. The object of these Wagnerian operas is the reproduction of the costumes and life of the middle ages with the same faithfulness with which Kean has restored on the English stage the periods of the Shakspearian drama. This object is effected with success at Weimar by the diligence of the costumier, and the rich state of theatrical properties. Crowds of people are placed on the stage, till the actors nearly outnumber the audience, and long and splendid processions, civil and ecclesiastic, defile round; and there is great flourish of trumpets and loud music everywhere—in front, in the middle, and behind—with an echo also, if an echo is admissible by means of rocks or buildings. The spectacle is certainly imposing on these occasions, but there appears to be a proportionate sacrifice of individual parts. We are withal strangely reminded of the decline of Roman art, as complained of by Horace in his epistle to Augustus. And, strangely enough, what we have said of the stunning noise of these representations found its parallel in the Augustan age. But I need not say that the taste of Horace was, of course, classical; and I rather fear I shall be considered to be espousing the heretical side, and perhaps be burnt—at least in effigy—in front of the Göthe-Schiller statue, for the Wagnerists, like all new sectaries, are intolerant of opposition. Their noblest aims consist in endeavoring to give a more national character to the operatic drama and to infuse a high moral into it. * * *

The practical objections to these Wagnerian operas consist in the expense and trouble of putting them on the stage, as contrasting with what is required for those of simple construction, and in the sacrifice of melody to harmony, the individual voice being generally greatly subordinated to the tempestuous music of the band. I confess, possibly through ignorance, that Fidelio and the Barbiere di Sereglio give me more pleasure, even when sung in a German translation. What is called in England the legitimate drama still holds its own at Weimar. Shakspeare receives honors which are seldom accorded to him in the land which he has helped to make immortal. The adaptation of Winter's Tale, translated by the Intendant, the Herr von Dingelstadt, is truly admirable; and Lear is done full justice to by the new tragedian Herr Lehfeldt; while Fräulein Röckel is a perfect impersonation of Cordelia. On the occasion of the representation of that stormy and exaggerated piece The Robbers of Schiller, a singular scene is presented in the Weimar theatre. The students of Jena come over in large numbers, and sit in the place of the orchestra, distinguished by the motley caps which denote their native provinces. Then they join in the songs which occur in the course of the piece, and interpolate one or two of their own. The full burst of their young voices is a fine variation of the usual musical accompaniment. This eccentric privilege was first granted to the students of Jena by the Grand Duke Karl August. The Weimar theatre does not correspond to its world-wide fame, either in external appearance or internal decorations. No one would know it to be a theatre from the outside; if it were in England, it might be supposed to be a kind of building devoted to the miscellaneous and somewhat incongruous purposes of Exeter Hall, or perhaps a tabernacle for popular Spurgeonism, while we were ourselves misled, on entering Weimar, by the much more than trivial appearance of the pillared building of the Reading Museum. The double statue of Schiller and Goethe which stands before it in the Carlplatz, gives it, however, a dramatic character which it does not possess of itself.

Besides the Goethe-Schiller statue, there stand in the public spaces of the town two other statues, one of which represents Wieland standing near a fountain in the square called by his name, a kind of antiquated beau of benignant expression, and otherwise reminding the beholder of Voltaire; and the other, Herder, close to the scene of his labors, the large church of the town. This statue appears the least remarkable in any way, but it presented lately a very quaint appearance, when the head and shoulders were covered with snow, being as a contrast of a portentous black aspect.

While I have been taking you round to see the statues, I forgot the interior of the theatre. The Weimar theatre, though not beautiful, has a characteristic which has been often observed before, that of friendliness. It seems by its construction to make the whole audience what has been called "altogether." The Grand Duke's box par excellence is in the middle, opposite the orchestra, and he has two other private boxes at each side of the stage. When he is present, and supposed to be present, he sits, as also the Grand Duchess when she is present, in the exact centre of the state box. The right and left balconies diverge on each side. The people taking places in them are supposed to be in the company of their Royal Highnesses, and therefore in evening dress. When the Grand Ducal party arrive, they all rise and bow, their Highnesses bowing to the right and left; and the same ceremony is repeated at the close of the representation. When their Royal Highnesses are present, but supposed not to be, they sit in the private boxes, and in like manner do those members of the audience who wish to be incog., taking their places in the pit or the orchestra stalls. The gods in the gallery are the best-behaved Olympians that it has ever been my fortune to know of, forming a perfect contrast to the screaming, whistling, bear-garden of an English gallery. The utmost enormity they are ever guilty of is that of letting fall a play-bill or two on the heads of the inhabitants of the nether world. As for the actors and actresses, they are personally dear to the spectators, and seem more like private friends than artists ministering to their amusement. If they do not sing well or play well, one is sorry for them, but there is not a thought of expressing disapprobation. If they surpass themselves, they are called for and receive their homage gratefully and gracefully, and the hearty hand-clapping expresses less surprise at the performance than love of the performer. In connection with this loving relationship between the stage and public of Weimar, is the entire respectability of the lives of the members of the dramatic body at Weimar. Scandal would almost as soon dare to attack the established clergy.

In fact, the family-party nature of the Weimar theatre makes it a not much greater effort to feminine feeling to appear on the stage, than to act at private theatricals or to take a part in a charade. There is so much good-feeling that Hettstedt, the favorite comedian, interpolates jokes on his fellow actors, and even on the audience, which are invariably well received. In connection with all this good behavior, as connected with the performances, is the perfect accessibility of the theatre. Ladies come and go unattended with as much ease as if they were visiting at the house of a friend. The hats and cloaks are left in the corridors unticketed, and nothing is ever lost. The theatre at Weimar is a model of what every theatre ought to be in everything; but external and internal appearance, which might certainly be improved.—Blackwood for April.

BOSTON, MAY 11, 1861.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of "The Hymn of Praise," (Lobgesang), a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

Concerts.

MADAME VARIAN's concert last Friday evening drew a full house and was in many respects highly successful. We understand that she was seriously ill and therefore was not able to do herself full justice; still she showed her power and culture and was heartily encored in nearly every piece. Mr. Simpson has so sweet a voice that it makes one regret he does not sing better. He rarely uses his chest tones, and never opens his mouth sufficiently; and besides his lips are so immovable that it is impossible to understand whether he sings in English, Italian or German; he might as well give us a series of vocalises. As we said before his voice has a very smooth and pure quality of tone, and his taste is evident in every strain. It is a pity he could not open his mouth, articulate clearly, and enter with more spirit into the music. His selections were admirably made, and in spite of his defects he was heard with pleasure. Mr. Hoffman, the pianist, accompanied the singers tastefully, and in his solos showed some skill. His scales are even and true, and his power much beyond the average. We did not discover in his playing much sentiment or poetry, and his banjo-imitations in answer to an encore were far from agreeable to our ears.

BOSTON MOZART CLUB.—We omitted last week to mention the excellent concert given by this club, complimentary to their conductor Mr. F. Suck. The hall was well filled so that the compliment must have been a substantial one, as the Club departed on this occasion from its usual rule, and sold tickets.

The programme was an admirable one and performed throughout in a manner that would have done credit to many orchestras that we have heard here in old times. Especially full and strong in the strings, the club is weakest, as those old orchestras were, in the wind instruments. Doubtless skilled amateur players will in time spring up to fill those parts also, thus rendering it unnecessary to ask professional aid.

PART I.

1. Quartette for stringed instruments.....Haydn
Allegro—Minuetto and Trio—Andante—Finale, Allegro vivace.
2. Fantasia on an original theme. Solo for Violin, with Orchestral Accompaniment.....F. Suck
3. Concert Overture.....Kalliwoda

PART II.

1. Variations on the Austrian National Hymn for Stringed Quartette.....Haydn
2. Grand Symphony in D Major.....Mozart
Allegro Moderato—Andante—Minuet and Trio—Finale;
Allegro con brio.

The Mozart Club has made a most successful and creditable beginning. Another season will doubtless give it increased strength, and skill. We shall look forward to its next season's entertainments with pleasing anticipations.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION concert on Wednesday afternoon attracted a crowded house. The programme was one that deserved such an audience.

PART I.

1. Union March.....Fahrbech
Arranged by A. Hehncke.
2. 7th Symphony, (Op. 92).....Beethoven
1. Poco Sostenuto. 2. Allegretto. 3. Presto.

PART II.

4. Finale Allo con brio.
3. Overture—"William Tell,".....Rossini
4. Potpourri—From "La Juive,".....
Arranged by A. Hehncke.
6. Turkish March—From the "Ruins of Athens,".....
Beethoven
6. Grand Finale—From the opera of "Tannhäuser,".....
R. Wagner.

The Germania Band performed the first and fourth numbers of the programme in a very effective style. The Symphony was not played throughout with the same excellence with which the first movements were given. The Turkish March is the one to which Mr. Dwight referred in one of his recent letters. Its barbaric quaintness is exceedingly interesting and characteristic. The next concert is to be the last of the series.

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER.—Our types last week made Dr. Holmes's new verse to this song anything but what the author intended. We reprint it therefore, as it should be.

When our land is illumined with Liberty's smile,
If a foe from within strike a blow at her glory,
Down, down with the traitor that dares to defile
The flag of her stars and the page of her story!
By the millions unchained when our birthright was gained,

We will keep her bright blazon forever unstained!
And the Star Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave

While the land of the free is the home of the brave.

The original song by Mr. Key was first published in the Baltimore Patriot on the 20th of September, 1814, under the title of "The defence of Fort McHenry." The melody, we believe, is an old English one and in Moore's Melodies appears as "Anacreon in Heaven."

BOSTON MUSICAL FUND SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of this Society, the following officers were reelected by a unanimous vote:

President—Thomas Comer; Vice-President—F. Suck; Secretary—Louis Rimbach; Treasurer—S. S. Pearce; Librarian—C. H. Eichler; Auditor—C. F. Frieze; Associates—Messrs. Rametti, A. Stein and A. Kamerling; Trustees—Messrs. T. E. Chickering, George T. Bigelow, J. P. Bradlee, S. E. Guild and John Bigelow.

ANTHONY PHILIP HEINRICH died in New York, on the 3d of May, after an illness of four months. Our readers will recollect an interesting sketch of his life and works in a letter of our correspondent Trovator, in this Journal of April 20th. The enthusiasm for his art which first led Father Heinrich to adopt it as his profession seems never to have left him even in his sickness and old age, as his occasional contributions to these columns attest. His circumstances were very straitened during the latter part of his life, and his most pressing wants were recently relieved by the ready kindness of his early friends in this city and New York.

MR. SOUTHARD, the musical composer, formerly of this city, and lately a resident of Hartford, has organized a Light Artillery company there to be enlisted for the war. The company numbers 90 men and embraces the best personnel we have ever seen in a volunteer corps. About half a dozen are skillful musicians; one is a French teacher who formerly served in the Chasseurs de Vincennes; one is an English artilleryman; besides there are blacksmiths, wheelwrights, teamsters, machinists, gunsmiths, tailors and laborers; all stalwart, earnest and temperate men. So that in case of emergency the gun-carriages can be mended, the horses shod and groomed, arms repaired, clothes and tents made, and the camp enlivened with music.

A concert was given last week for the benefit of the company which resulted in a handsome sum.

The transition from giving piano lessons and playing church voluntaries, to "the tented field" where rifled cannon and howitzers are ready to hurl the missiles of death against traitors, must be sufficiently startling. But our friend though slight in person has an indomitable spirit, and we have no doubt if his health is spared he will distinguish himself whenever there comes an opportunity. We may have a new "Lyre and Sword" song, or another "Piff-paff," or Battle Symphony. The awful grandeur of an actual contest must be very different from the conception of it which a man has in the privacy of his chamber.

MR. L. HINSDALE SHERWOOD, who has been a diligent laborer in the field of music, as the principal of a musical academy at Lyons, New York, has lately transferred the Institute to Springfield, Ohio, to be connected there with the excellent female seminary of that place.

NEW YORK, MAY 6. — MASON & THOMAS' Series of Soirées was brought to a worthy close last Tuesday, by one of the finest concerts it has ever been my good fortune to listen to. There were but three pieces on the programme, which, however, in point of value and interest could not be surpassed. They were some of the best specimens of three distinct classical epochs in music; the old Italian, the German of half a century ago, and what may be called the Renaissance, i. e., the modern school of the same nation. The most modern, however, the Music of the Future, was not represented. The compositions performed were Tartini's Trille du Diable, performed by Mr. Thomas in a manner that satisfied even those who had heard the same piece repeatedly from Joachim, Beethoven's marvellous Quartette in E flat, op. 74, and Schumann's Piano Quartette, in which Mr. Mason took part. The two last mentioned pieces have been produced here before, but the first was entirely new to a New York audience. It is wonderful, in its large, broad, melodious opening, and those weird, mysterious trill passages, which can well be imagined as being composed after a supernatural pattern.

And so we bid adieu to these artists, thanking them for many an hour of pure, elevated enjoyment, and hoping that another winter will let us greet them again in renewed vigor and increased excellence.

MUSICAL GENIUS. — "Seek not, young artist," says Rousseau, "the meaning expressed by the word genius. If you are inspired with its flame, you feel it. Are you destitute of genius, you will never be acquainted with it. The genius of a musician submits the universe to his art. He paints objects by sounds; he gives a language even to silence itself; he renders ideas by sentiments, sentiments by accents; and the passions he represents are drawn from the recesses of the heart. By his aid, pleasure assumes new charms; the grief to which he gives utterance draws forth our sighs; he is continually burning, but never consumed. He expresses with fire even the coldest subjects; in painting the horrors of death, he conveys to the soul that sentiment of life which never abandons it, and which he communicates to all hearts formed for its reception. But alas! his strains avail nothing to those in whom seeds like his own are not implanted; and his prodigies are scarcely felt by those who are incapable of imitating the fervor that gives them birth. Do you wish to know whether any spark of this devouring flame inspires you? Be quick! hasten to Naples—listen to the masterpieces of Leo, Durante, Jomelli, and Pergolèse. If your eyes are filled with tears, if you feel your heart palpitate, if joy agitates your bosom, if sorrow involves you in transports, take Metastasio in your hand, and labor: his genius will inflame yours; you will form a creation after his example. Stimulants like those will animate your genius; and the eyes of others will afterward restore you the tears your masters have caused you to shed. But if the charms of this grand art leave you tranquil and contented, if you feel no ravishing transport, if you discover nothing beautiful, dare you ask what is genius? Vulgar mortal! profane not the sacred appellation. What would it avail thee to know it—thou who canst not feel it? Compose in the French style and peaceably retire."

MUSIC.—Why do we all enjoy music? Because it sounds sweet. But why does it sound sweet? That is a mystery known only to God.

Two things I may make you understand—two things which help to make music—melody and harmony. Now, as most of you know, there is melody in music when the different sounds of the same tune follow each other, so as to give us pleasure; there is harmony in music when different sounds, instead of following each other, come at the same time, so as to give us pleasure.

But why do they please us! and what is more, why do they please angels? and still more, why do they please God? Why is there music in heaven? Consider St. John's visions in the Revelations. Why did St. John hear therein harpers with their harps, and the mystic beasts, and the elders, singing a new song to God and to the Lamb; and the voices of many angels round about them, whose number was ten thousand times ten thousand?

In this there is a great mystery. I will try to explain what little of it I seem to see.

First—There is music in heaven, because in music there is no self-will. Music goes on certain laws and rules. Man did not make these laws of music; he has only found them out; and if he be self-willed and break them, there is an end of his music instantly: all he brings out of his discord and ugly sounds. The greatest musician in the world is as much bound by those laws as the learner in the school; and the greatest musician is the one who, instead of fancying that, because he is clever, he may throw aside the laws of music, knows the laws of music best, and observes them most reverently. And therefore it was that the old Greeks, the wisest of all the heathens, made a point of teaching their children music; because they said it taught them not to be self-willed and fanciful, but to see the beauty of order, the usefulness of rule, the divineness of laws.

And therefore music is fit for heaven; therefore music is a pattern and type of heaven, and of the everlasting life of God, which perfect spirits live in heaven; a life of melody and order in themselves; a life of harmony with each other and with God.—Kingsley's Sermons.

Music Abroad.

HERR STAUDIGL.—Staudigl died (in a lunatic asylum at Vienna) on the 24th of last month, aged fifty-four, the greatest German singer whom the past quarter of a century has seen. It is noticeable that his peculiar voice, a sound, strong, extensive bass, has always "grown" (as is said of plants) greatest, both as to quantity and perfection, in North and South Germany; but his distinction was, that he could turn that voice to fullest account everywhere, save in opera in Italian. There he failed; where countrymen of his, in every musical requisite his inferiors, have succeeded. Staudigl entered into life, if we mistake not, as one destined to take monastic order. His intellect had failed him some years prior to his decease. As a hearty, genial man, a great musician, with a noble voice (for whom, by the way, Mendelssohn wrote the part of Elijah), kindly farewell and regret are due.—Athenæum.

MADAME LORINI.—Virginia Whiting Lorini has just concluded an engagement at Berlin, and is now at Brussels, where she is creating a furor. The Independence Belge of March 5, writes thus of our Boston prima donna:

Virginia Lorini achieved last night, if possible, a still greater success than last year in the performance of Semiramide, carrying away the audience by her energy, fire, and inspiration. She should be heard in the cavatina "Bel raggio lusinghiero." The tenderness and purity of her phrasing formed a marvellous contrast to the large, majestic style of her rendering the story which precedes the oath. She has proved herself a true artist. There are few prime donne who can be said to know by heart thirty operas. This does Madame Lorini; and more, she renders them in a manner which places her in the highest rank of lyric artists. She never descends to trickery, never transposes, but sings the composer's own music in the truest manner, there being no difficulty too great for her to master by the perfection of her method.

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the third concert of the season, the newly-constituted orchestra, which now obeys the baton of Professor Bennett, gave still more convincing proofs of its efficiency. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.

Symphony in B flat, No. 3.....Haydn
Air, "O cara imagine".....Mozart
Concerto, E flat, pianoforte.....Beethoven
Overture (Athalia).....Mendelssohn

PART II.

Sinfonia Pastorale.....Beethoven
Aria, "Sei miei sospiri".....Stradella
Overture (Oberon).....Weber

Each of the instrumental pieces is a masterpiece, and so well known that comment would be superfluous. The execution, more especially of the two symphonies, was splendid. Signor Gardoni made his first appearance this season. His charming voice is admirably suited to give expression both to the well-known air from Die Zauberflöte, and the expressive melody of Stradella. The concerto of Beethoven was executed by Mr. Otto Goldsmidt. The members of the orchestra applauded him loudly at the conclusion of his performance.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. — La Favorita was repeated, and further opportunity was afforded of examining the merits of Signor Tiberini. The new tenor has certainly created a favorable impression, but as yet we do not feel bound to chronicle him as the successor of Mario. As he had been proclaimed a true singer of the Rossinian school, it would hardly be fair to pronounce a definite opinion on his capabilities from hearing him in Donizetti's French opera; and, under the circumstances, we do not think the management was politic in bringing him out in Fernando. First impressions go a long way, and it may, by and by, come to pass that it would have been more to Signor Tiberini's advantage had he appeared in the Barbieri, or La Gazza Ladra. Signor Tiberini's voice is a pure tenor, part chest, part head. The quality is not particularly sweet, nor sympathetic, and there is a slight huskiness about the middle tones, as if the voice had undergone a good deal of wear and tear—which, however, we do not think is the case. The falssetto is beautiful, and managed with great art. It is in the employment of the head voice, indeed, that the new tenor produces its best effects, and that he occasionally recalls the manner of Rabin. As a vocal artist we are inclined to rate Signor Tiberini highly, although certain eccentricities in the romance of Fernando, "Spirto Gentil"—the triumphs of Signor Mario and Giuglini—inclines us to qualify our verdict. At present we shall refrain from expressing ourselves further. Signor Tiberini appears to-night as Arturo in I Puritani, one of the most trying parts in opera, and no doubt next week we shall be enabled to estimate him at his real value.

On Thursday evenings, April 18 the Prophète was given for the fourth time with brilliant success, to the greatest house of the season. The novelty on this occasion was the substitution of Mad. Rudersdorff for Mlle. Corbary in the small but important character of Berta. The powerful voice, dramatic accent, and intellectual acting of Mad. Rudersdorff gave a prominence and interest to the part. The performance of the Prophète ought to attract the town for some time to come; but as Guillaume Tell is positively to be brought out on Thursday, the opportunities for hearing Meyerbeer's great work must consequently be limited.

This may be the place to add a report everywhere current, that Mad. Griai and Signor Mario have rejoined the Royal Italian Company.

VOCAL ASSOCIATION.—The principal feature at the third concert was the reappearance of Mr. Ole Bull, after an absence of more than twenty years. The hearty reception accorded to the Norwegian violinist showed that his old admirers had forgotten him, while those to whom he could only be known by reputation (the majority present?) were no less ready to give him a welcome on that account. In the school of playing which he has adopted, Mr. Ole Bull is no doubt a master, and acceptable to a section of the musical public. This was proved by the applause and "encores" to both his solos. The first a fantasia of Paganini's, on "Hope told flattering tale," was a remarkable and original display after its fashion—the air sustained while the left hand gave a pizzicato accompaniment, "harmonies" in abundance, "double stopping" (ditto), all sorts of variations, tricks and devices calculated to astonish his hearers. Instead of repeating the fantasia, Mr. Ole Bull substituted a short dance-tune, which showed still further his fertility in eccentric resources. Mozart's "La ci darem" formed the subject of the second fantasia; and certainly never was its character, its charming melody, more thoroughly caricatured. The audience insisted so strenuously upon an "encore," that there was nothing left but to comply, and an arrangement (with prelude) of "God save the Queen" again exhibited the peculiar qualities we have already mentioned. That a great many will go to hear Mr. Ole Bull, there is no doubt; but that he will retain a permanent hold upon a London public we question. Within the last twenty years a more healthy taste has been engendered. Certain it is that those who go week after week to hear the quartets and sonatas of Beethoven, Mozart and Mendelssohn at the Monday Popular Concerts, will not care to listen a second time to playing which, sacrificing everything intellectual to the mere trickery of execution, can never be dignified by the name of art.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The musical public owe a deep debt of gratitude to the Monday Popular Concerts, for making them acquainted with a number of compositions, which are not only "caviare to the general," but, in many instances, unknown even to musicians; except the few whose opportunities and research are quite quite exceptional. It was a good thought to give Mendelssohn's Ottet and Spohr's double quartette in E minor, both on the same night, as it afforded an occasion to contrast works, equally great in their way, although utterly opposed in character. Both produced a marked impression, and as the players in each instance were MM. Vieuxtemps, Ries, Wiener, Watson, Schreurs, Webb, Paque and Piatti, the execution left nothing to be desired. The novelty of the evening was one of the early sonatas of Beethoven's (Op. 26, in A flat, for pianoforte alone, played by Mr. Charles Hallé (from memory) with all the correctness and refinement for which he is famous. This being the most universally familiar of all the sonatas of Beethoven, needs no description. Andante con variazioni and the Marcia funebre sulla morte d'un Eroe, appeared to make the most impression; but the whole work was so well received as to induce us to hope that we may hear it repeated. The sonata of the 26th was composed about the year 1801, when the success of a funeral march in Paer's Achilles, of which every one was talking, prompted Beethoven to show what he could do in the same style; hence the Marcia funebre (the 3d movement), than which it is impossible to imagine anything more solemn and impressive. M. Vieuxtemps' own admirable and interesting sonata in B flat, for viola and pianoforte, was given for the second time, and although the latter instrument plays but a subordinate part, it being rather a solo for tenor with accompaniment, the excellent taste of Mr. Charles Hallé added materially to magnificent playing of M. Vieuxtemps, who is as eminent a master of the viola as of the violin. The vocal pieces were confined to two: Mozart's "O cara imagine," and Mendelssohn's "Garland," both rendered with admirable expression, intelligence and neatness, by Mr. Tennant, who is fast (and deservedly), rising in public estimation.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Beethoven's Mass in D, was given on Friday, the 12th inst., before an audience which filled every part of Exeter Hall. A work which occupied the illustrious musician more than three years in composing, and takes but an hour and a half in its performance, may well be accepted as a masterpiece; and being quite exceptional, in style and character, if not thoroughly understood at first hearing, the deficiency must be attrib-ed rather to the want of pretension on the part of the auditors, than to any shortcoming of one who was unquestionably the most intellectual and profound musician of his age. How long is it since the last pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven were declared to be incomprehensible,—wild emanations of a disturbed mind,—written when the composer had lost his hearing, and could not judge of the effect? Were not the same remarks applied to his later quartettes, and yet these are now not only understood but familiarized to the public and appreciated by large audiences each week at the Monday Popular Concerts. If there are portions of the Mass solennis that may sound strange to unaccustomed ears, let us be sure that whatever Beethoven did was with a purpose; and as the work was written when he was in unusual health and spirits, and was not finished until nearly two years and a half after the occasion for which it was designed (the installation of Beethoven's pupil, patron, and friend, Cardinal Archduke Rudolph), we may conclude that further acquaintance with the work will make clear that which may at first appear obscure. The Mass in D has been but little heard in England. At the festival for the inauguration of Beethoven's monument at Bonn, in 1845, it excited such interest that its production was deemed advisable by the London Philharmonic, who gave it shortly after. It was not until 1854, however, that the Sacred Harmonic Society ventured on the Mass solennis; nor was the experiment over successful.

On the present occasion, however, a vast improvement was exhibited. The music taxed both singers and players to the utmost; and if the realisation occasionally fell short of the conception, the elaborate complications of the work must be remembered, and the credit allowed for the generally admirable style in which it was rendered by band and chorus. Mad. Rindersdorff and Sainton Dolby, with Messrs. Sims Reeves and Thomas, were the soloists, and their very arduous duties were accomplished with the most artistic skill. A word of high praise must be given to M. Sainton for his masterly performance of the violin obbligato to the "Benedictus." As the Mass is to be repeated at the next concert of the Society, we may recur to the subject.

EXETER HALL.—On Wednesday evening Herr Molique's oratorio of Abraham was performed for the first time in London at a grand concert given in aid of the funds of the Middlesex Hospital, and with all the success to which its great merits so justly entitle it. When this admirable work was produced last year at the Norwich Festival we gave a full analysis of it, and can add nothing now to the praise then bestowed, unless it be the statement that a fresh audition served to confirm us in the highly favorable opinion already expressed. Herr Molique, on the occasion under notice, was assisted by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Stanley, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, Mr. Wallworth and Mr. Sims Reeves; a band of first-rate efficiency, including nearly all our ablest orchestral performers, and a chorus selected from the best choirs, whether amateur or professional, which the metropolis can boast. Thus Herr Molique's oratorio was afforded the best possible chance of being understood and felt by the London public, and the general result, so frequent was the applause, so numerous were the encores, must have completely realised the anticipations of the most elevated admirers of the eminent German composer. The fine march in E flat was enthusiastically remanded; and similarly honored were the chastely harmonised and beautiful trio "Let all those rejoice," sung with perfect precision and expression by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Wallworth, and Mr. Sims Reeves; the touching air "Hear my prayer," most sympathetically rendered by Mad. Lemmens-Sherrington; and the song "Pour out thy heart before the Lord, given by Mr. Sims Reeves with all the fervor and masterly skill by which his singing is always distinguished. Mr. Stanley's powers were most strikingly exhibited in the heroic war-song, "Arise, and let us go by night," and the deeply pathetic air, "The joy of my heart is ceased." Mr. Wilbye Cooper and Mr. Wallworth did ample justice to the parts entrusted to them, and Mad. Sainton Dolby fully sustained the high reputation she has long enjoyed, by her inimitable execution of the principal contralto music. The band and chorus were highly satisfactory throughout, under the guidance of Herr Molique, who conducted his own work with the skill and tact of a consummate master. In short, Abraham was thoroughly successful, and will, we hope, be shortly repeated in London, either by the Sacred Harmonic or some other great musical society capable of doing it justice. The hall was crowded in every part, and judging from the high prices paid for admission, the pecuniary result must have proved very beneficial to the excellent institution in behalf of which the concert was given.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Once more with thee. Song. F. Woolcot. 25

A melodious song, well justifying the reputation of the author of "Bell Brandon."

Rose of Hazeldean. Song. J. W. Cherry. 25

Cherry has given to the singing dilettanti a host of light graceful ballads, which, if not destined to live down to the next generation, are among the best productions of the day, and will always be heard with pleasure. This ballad is of just this class.

When a lover kneels. (Vien un giovine.)

"Der Freischütz." 35

A new and carefully corrected copy of this playful air of Annabel, with the Italian words added.

I'm not such an ugly man. Comic Song.

J. Herbert. 25

Most of our comic singers could make a capital thing out of this song. Let them try it.

Where the warbling waters flow. Duet. Guitar accompaniment. Curtiss. 25

Salut a la France. Guitar accompaniment. " 25

O haste crimson morning. Duet. " " 25

Vocal gems, long familiar to the musical public, now for the first time made accessible to the Guitariet.

Woodland Belle. E. Chapin. 25

An easy little song, written in a popular vein.

Instrumental Music.

The Music of the Union. Medley on National Airs. C. Grobe. 50 Comprising the melodies of The Star Spangled Banner, Hail Columbia, The Red, White and Blue, Washington's March and Yankee Doodle, arranged effectively, yet not too difficult. As these airs have never before been put together into such compact and practical shape, the demand will be very large.

Belmont Polka. E. D. Ingraham. 25

Pleasing, and rather easy.

Woonsocket Quickstep. Handel Pond. 25

A very pleasing composition, by the author of various popular marches.

JOHNSON'S HARMONY. Practical Instructions in Harmony, upon the Pestalozzian, or Inductive System; teaching Musical Composition and the Art of Extemporizing Interludes and Voluntaries. By A. N. Johnson. 1,00

This work is designed for the class of persons designated in the language of music teachers as "new beginners." It imparts a knowledge of Harmony, by exercises which the student is to write; or, so to speak, by a progressive series of problems which the student must solve. The utmost simplicity of language has been used in the explanations, and an attempt made to guard against misapprehension, even on the part of an undisciplined mind.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Chevé's System of Musical Instruction.

NEW YORK, APRIL, 1861.

This system is due to the conjoined labors of Galin, Paris, and Chevé of France, who elaborated the crude ideas suggested by Jean Jacques Rousseau upon the subject of musical notation, and have brought the system to its present state of perfection: in the country where it originated it is known as the "GALIN-PARIS-CHEVÉ" system. By its means, music is easily, thoroughly, and rapidly acquired, both theoretically and practically, and the voice and ear developed, even when these organs seem almost entirely wanting; large masses of people are taught in a very brief period of time to sing the most difficult music at sight, to sing well, to write from ear, and to comprehend the science perfectly. It also facilitates instrumentation, as the development of ear and voice, together with a knowledge of the principles of the art and of Thorough Bass, is the only rational preparation to thorough execution on any instrument. A superior execution is speedily attained, because the mind and ear being educated by the vocal and theoretical course, the hand will readily obey them; one who has perfectly mastered every possible effect of intonation and time, as well as the science, will have but little trouble in obtaining almost any desired effect upon the instrument.

There is no other system which can accomplish such results; other prevailing methods can no more compete with this, than can the old-fashioned stage with the railway. On this point, fourteen professors of music in the Government Schools of the city of Paris, in a letter to Monsieur Chevé, said; "We would not venture to bring in competition with your pupils of six months, the best part of those of ours who have had two years of severe schooling in the old system. The means by which pupils can be enabled to attack every difficulty of intonation and time in your method are infinitely superior to anything that has existed to this day."

It is admirably adapted for teaching in classes, giving rapid and positive results; it is also eminently adapted for the training of Choral and other Musical societies. A large society, called the "Galin-Paris-Chevé-Society" has been founded in Paris, which stands in high repute. It was called out on the occasion of the visit of the Queen of England to Napoleon, and is the only Choral Society ever called on by the Emperor on grand occasions. It underwent a severe test, and most thoroughly vindicated the merits of Chevé's system on the occasion of a trial of skill between the new system and any others which might venture to compete with it, proposed by a jury of twenty-four of the most eminent composers and professors resident at Paris, comprising, among others, Meyerbeer, Felicien David, Emile Prudent, Vieuxtemps, Ferdinand Hiller, A. Elwart, Lefebure Wély, and others, with Hector Berlioz as President. The programme, sent to all the societies of France, was found so difficult that none other dared attempt it, and on the day appointed no other society appeared to undertake the task.

The following account, translated from "Le Souvenir" of June 28, 1858, is worthy an attentive perusal:

"We witnessed, on the 12th inst., a 'trial of skill' which took place at St. Cecilia's Hall under the presidency of Monsieur Henri Réber, assisted by the élite of our artists and composers. A gold medal, tendered by Monsieur Chevé, was the prize to be offered to the Choral Society who might fulfil the conditions imposed by the programme. These conditions, we must confess, were so difficult to fulfil with equal success, that we were not surprised when, at the last meeting of the Jury, of which we had the honor to be a member, the Secretary, Monsieur Tajan Rogé, made known to us that, notwithstanding the programme had been sent to all the singing societies of France, not one had responded to the appeal.

"On the day of the trial, 200 of Monsieur Chevé's pupils, stood alone on the field in the presence of 1500 spectators, comprising the élite of musical amateurs. In this emergency it was unanimously voted by the jury that the Galin-Paris-Chevé Society, there present, should go through the programme proposed by themselves, to which they immediately proceeded.

"First, a Kyrie of Lesueur was admirably sung; after which, a chorus, drawn by lots, by the jury, among twelve, composed expressly for the occasion, and which had been delivered to the Society twenty-four hours only before the time of the performance. This chorus was so beautifully rendered that it was vehemently encored. Then came a fugue in four parts, drawn also by lots among others, composed expressly for the occasion to be read at sight. This was a solemn moment, and the two hundred performers, who read off this piece with an ensemble truly extraordinary, produced such a sensation on the audience that the hall rang again with the applause and the encores, in which the jury joined lustily. Next, the charming chorus and the "Prayer" in "Count Ory," of Rossini, were most brilliantly executed. Then came the musical dictation, one of the most striking features of the system, and one of the greatest benefits it confers on its disciples. How many artists would wish to be enabled to write under their own dictation a melody of such difficulty as this one of Professor Schloësser's, composed by him expressly for the occasion! Professor Schloësser's Solfeggio, dictated by Monsieur Chevé, was written down, then translated into all the different clefs and keys by the performers, and then sung by them. After this truly remarkable feat, the concert terminated with the chorus of "the Reapers" and "the Storm," from Elwart's Symphony of "Ruth and Boaz." These two pieces, which contain eight real parts, and offer extraordinary difficulties, were followed by tremendous applause from the whole room and jury together.

"The decision of the jury relative to the prize to be awarded, was unanimous with that of the audience. It was not Monsieur Chevé's fault if no competitors had come to dispute the medal with him. His pupils had fulfilled all the conditions of the programme with honesty, cleverness, and skill. The jury, twenty-four in number, awarded the medal.

"All the pieces were sung without any instrument."

The system has withstood the severest test of criticism and experiment in France and throughout Europe, for the last fifteen years, and has won there an unbounded popularity, vanquishing both routine and prejudice; it has at last superseded the old system in the Conservatoire of Paris.

An interesting and highly successful experiment was made at Lyons, France in 1842-43, by Mons. Chevé upon some soldiers of the Military Gymnasium of that city, a brief account of which we condense from the official report. "Lieut. General Baron de Lascours commanding the 7th division, confided 150 soldiers to the professor, by whom they were accepted without regard to their respective ages, capacity, or talent for music, and, on the 1st. October, 1842, the first lesson took place. The men, with few exceptions, began the course very reluctantly, and, only to obey orders. At the end of the first month, the Professor, wishing to classify the voices, made each man sing separately. The result would have been discouraging to most teachers. More than three-quarters of the men were not able to sing the scale. Twelve declared most positively that they would not open their mouths. These were immediately dismissed. The rest, that is 138 men, were kept, notwithstanding the complete absence of musical talent of the greater part, many not being able to distinguish one tone from another. Many confessed that they had not sung a note since the course had begun, but promised that in future they would take part in all the exercises.

"The number of lessons were five a week. No practice was required between the lessons. It must be observed that during the months of October, April and May, there were several weeks' interruption on account of service.

"In December, Lieutenant-General de Lascours, accompanied by many of his friends, came to a lesson. The visitors were much struck with the progress made by the pupils. They had acquired wonderful proficiency in intonation and time, read easily all the different clefs and keys, and sang part music at sight, without any instrument to guide them—one of the peculiarities of the system being that no instrument is ever used in teaching.

"On the 25th of April, 1843, seven months after the opening of the course, the General and other officers with Madame Lascours and many ladies, and in fact all the notabilities of the city received an invitation from the class. The programme was as follows: 1. A Quartette by Webbe. 2. A Languedocian air for three voices, by Des Rues. 3. A trio from the opera of "Cedipe à Colonne," by Sacchini. 4. Reading at sight every kind of interval, major or minor. 5. Reading at sight upon all the clefs. 6. Two canons for three voices, by Silher. 7. A quartette from the "Clemenza di Tito," by Mozart. 8. The quartette in "Iphigenia in Aulia," by Gluck. 9. A trio from the "Magic Roe," by Berton. 10. Finding the tonic on all the clefs and keys. 11. Writing from ear. 12. Reading (at first sight) a trio from the "Magic Flute," by Mozart. 13. An "Ave Maria" for three voices, by Choron. 14. "The Gondolier," a canon in three parts, by Des Rues. 15. A Quartette from the "Magic Flute," by Mozart. 16. A chorus from the opera "Tancredi," by Rossini. 17. The prayer in the opera of "Joseph," by Méhul.

"It would be difficult to express the astonishment of the audience. The surprising accuracy with which the men, one and all, sang at sight the most difficult intonations in the major and minor modes, the facility with which they read all the clefs and keys, the readiness and exactness with which they all, without any exception, wrote down tones vocalized to them, struck all present in the most forcible manner, and fully convinced them that the means employed by Mons. Chev  are infallible in their results, and that, as soon as they are used on a large scale for the benefit of the whole population, the foolish prejudice that some people cannot sing will be done away with forever."

Twenty-five thousand of the operatives in Paris have studied under this system, and its patrons include the Emperor and Aristocracy, the Polytechnic, the Normal and the Preparatory schools. We translate the following notice bearing upon this point, from "La Presse" of Dec. 30, 1860: "To-day at one o'clock, the Galin-P ris-Chev  Society will give their second musical entertainment in the hall of the Cirque-Napol on. More than four thousand invitations have been given out by the committee, which is composed as follows: Count de Morny, President; Rossini and the Prince Poniatowski, Vice-Presidents; Felicien David, Lef bure-W ly, the celebrated composer and organist at La Madeleine, and a number of other equally distinguished musicians; with Ernest L pine as Secretary. Many personages of the highest rank will by their presence enhance the  clat of this artistic f te." The names of this committee are a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the system and of the esteem in which this Society is held in Paris. Nor is the knowledge of it confined entirely to France, but it is taught in the principal cities of England, Belgium, and many parts of Germany. It was lately introduced into Russia, under the auspices of the Emperor Alexander.

In America it is comparatively little known as yet, and we have but one representative of the system among us, but many advanced and intelligent minds have scrupulously examined into its merits and given in their adhesion; among these might be mentioned Mr. Henry C. Watson, Editor of "Frank Leslie," who thus speaks of it:

"New York, December 1, 1860.

"I have examined the famous system taught by Mons. Chev  in Paris, and consider it eminently practical. It has reduced the theory of music to a comprehensive system, which can be readily understood by pupils of ordinary intelligence. The many obscurities and incongruities of the old system, both in construction and nomenclature, are dispensed with and scientific arrangement has been made a means of simplifying a study which should be universal, but of which the groping of pedants hitherto, by surrounding it with unnecessary difficulties, circumscribed the knowledge to a very narrow circle.

"Every good citizen must wish this system to succeed, for by it thousands can be taught to enjoy the rational amusement of singing in concert at sight, and well; receiving at the same time a clear knowledge of what they are doing and how they do it—advantages which no other system of class teaching affords. The more the practice of music prevails among the people, the more domestic, orderly, and happy the people will become.

"The certificates of the remarkable results of the teaching by this system, as tested in Paris, are signed by many of the most eminent composers and professors of music now living. A system which has met with the unequalled approval of such men as Wagner, Hector Berlioz, Meyerbeer, Vieuxtemps, F. David, F. Hiller, Prudent, Elwart, &c., must have in it the elements of sterling and singular excellence, which should recommend its adoption by the community at large—a consummation which, for the sake of the art and of social improvement, I most earnestly and sincerely desire."

Mr. Henri L. Stuart, of New York, speaking of the effects which would follow its introduction into the schools and among the people of this country, says: "The young would become intelligent critics upon the pretensions of their teachers; the mature would be improved and enlightened; professional empiricism would give place to rational and scientific instruction; and charlatans in music, under this system, would be as readily exposed as in any other branch of knowledge common among the people, such as reading or spelling."

Its results, if once fairly introduced here, would be so much greater than in the countries above-mentioned—owing to the superior intelligence of our people, their progressive tendencies and the wonderful eagerness with which they seize upon every improvement in educational methods—that we sincerely hope the day is not far distant when our countrymen will turn their attention in this direction, and think less of the "Almighty Dollar," and more of those things which are less perishable. THE OPERA COMIQUE OF THE PRESENT DAY.

We shall close the series of contemporary composers who have obtained letters of naturalization upon our second lyrique stage by favor of the public with notices of Clapisson, Thomas, Grisar and Mass . Should this series of papers attain to the honor of another edition, we engage to give in it additional notices of new and successful candidates for the good will of the public.

The family of M. Louis Clapisson was originally from Lyons, and not from Bordeaux as is generally supposed. His grandfather was a musical instrument maker at that city, and his father after making the Egyptian campaign, married a Swiss woman and settled at Naples under King Joachim Murat. He had been a pupil of the celebrated hornist, Punto, and was appointed first hornist at the theatre of San Carlo; in 1775 he took the same position in the theatre at Bordeaux. The son of a virtuoso and skilful composer, the boy Louis, who was born at Naples Sept. 16, 1809, developed very rapidly his fine and happy musical organization. Continually at the theatre, he soon became familiar with the masterpieces of our repertory and had already attained a high degree of skill upon the violin and pianoforte, when his vocation drew him to Paris, whither he came in 1829, in spite of his father, and with but fifty francs in his pocket to defray all his expenses during a winter of extreme rigor. Strolling along the Boulevard des Italiens the young Provincial became hungry and entered mechanically the restaurant of the Bains Chinois. There a sumptuous breakfast was set before him; green peas (in winter), fine wines, the best of everything—nothing was wanting. But the bill; away went more than half the small capital of the poor musician, who had not dreamed of such a termination to his breakfast. Some days later, after he had paid his last half franc in a caf , the future member of the Institute knew no longer what course to take, when by chance—or rather providentially he cast his eye upon the small street advertising placards. One of them noted a place for a violinist in the orchestra of the theatre Comte; he applied for it and was lucky enough to be accepted; he then confided his sad position to the skillful and kindly director, who hastened to give him an advance payment of his small salary to relieve his immediate necessities. He afterwards studied in the elder Habeneck's class at the conservatory, joined successively the orchestras of the Vari t s Gymnase, and the Italian opera, and finally entered that of the Grand Opera, as a second violin, like the distinguished Berton. He studied composition with Reicha and wrote a string quartette which was executed by the brothers Tilmant, was praised by Onslow and published by Frey. Some time afterwards Clapisson composed his vocal quartets and choruses to Vieux Paris, which were successfully executed at the conservatory. In 1837, Madame Lemoine published the first "Album de Louis Clapisson" in which was the famous Postillon de mam' Albou. A great number of Melodies, chansonnettes, romances, &c., made the name of the young author popular, whose productions are always characterized by the elegance of the vocal part and tunes of harmony as correct as they are original.

Aug. 24, 1838 the young master produced his first work at the Opera Comique, La Figurante ou l'Amour et la Danse, revealed to the public the graceful talents of the composer. With this work Clapisson paid his compliments to the city of Bordeaux, his adopted home; it was a just tribute of remembrance and gratitude. The next year, he composed for Mari  La Symphonie, text by Saint Georges. In this work a novel and permanent effect in his harmonies, produced by all the stringed instruments of the orchestra is worthy of remark. La Perruche, a piece by Dumanoir and Dupin, gave the actor Chollet and the composer Clapisson, opportunity for a new and well-earned success. After Le Pendu and Fr re et Mari, appeared the Code Noir, a work in 3 acts, greatly appreciated by artists. Les Bergers Trumeau preceded Gibby la Cornemuse, in which Roger, Bussine and Mlle. Delille were applauded to the echo. Jeanne la Folle and les Myst res d'Udolphe had not all the success desired. But La Promise, which at the Theatre Lyrique, preceded la Fanchonnette and Margot, established definitely the reputation of the author, who was now judged worthy of a chair at the Academy. The instrumentation of la Promise is every way remarkable. Clapisson has gained his own position by steady and laborious efforts; he will encourage none in the composer's career but those, who are really worthy.

Amboise Thomas, the son of an artist, was born at Metz in Lorraine Aug. 5, 1811, and began at a very early age the study of the violin and pianoforte, delighting parents and friends by playing to them little airs of his own composition. In 1828 he came to Paris to pursue his studies in the conservatory. Endowed with an extraordinary musical memory, thoroughly acquainted with the old works in the repertory of the theatre, the young Thomas made rapid progress, studying the pianoforte under Kalkbrenner and Zimmermann and composition under Dourlen, Barbereau and Lesueur. He gained the first prize for the pianoforte in 1829, the Roman prize in 1832. During the tour which the latter prize enabled him to make he learned to appreciate the Italian school thoroughly in its melodic and vocal excellence. While fully recognizing its vicious abuses mere formulas and its frequent commonplaces, it cannot be denied that the true traditions of the art of singing come from Italy; that it is the land where one meets most frequently beautifully full and sonorous voices thanks to the influence of that warm and generous climate. At Vienna Thomas found a lively class of German composers, who willingly admitted the Italian style into their works to a certain extent, leaving to their compatriots in the North the cold expression of a ~~obscure~~ germanism.

After three years of travel, Thomas returned to Paris, the place above all others, of the purest dramatic taste (?). In 1837 he brought out la Double Echelle, his first work for the Opera Comique, and one generally appreciated. At that time he published a quartette, a quintette, trios and other chamber music, with or without the pianoforte; these various works prove both his talent as a pianist and the thoroughness of his studies in composition. Abandoning instrumental music for the theatre, he gave in order le Perruquier de la Regence, in 3 acts by Chailot, Le Panier Fleuri, a piece reproduced at the Theatre Lyrique, and Mina, in which Mlle. Darcier and Roger contested for victory as actors and singers.

Thomas's modesty and indisposition to intrigue withdrew him now for a time from the stage. But in 1849 his position was fixed at the Opera Comique by the success of the Catd, a delicious farcical piece in two acts, and of the Songe, a fine score in which color and style are perfectly sustained. Raymond, a melodrama, still continually upon the stage in Germany, and La Tonelli, in which Madame Ugalde was captivating for her fire and effective performance, were followed by La Cour de Célimene, a comedy rather cold, written by Madame Miolan. Psyche, a work exceedingly touching and finely played by Mlle. Lefebvre preceded the Carnaval de Venise destined for Mad. Cabel. The eminent merits of Thomas's works led to his appointment as assistant to Halevy in the Conservatory, and finally to fill the place of Adam, as professor. He has already succeeded Batton, as general inspector of the branch school of the Conservatory.

Many ballets, among which the Gipsy had a real triumph, a solemn Mass de Saint Cécile, &c., prove the flexibility of the talents of M. Thomas. Having been elected in 1851, successor to Spontini in the Institute he now owes us a pendant to la Vestale; the amplitude of his style, the richness of his orchestration, his great knowledge of vocal resources, whether solo or in chorus, are important qualities, which he possesses in a high degree, and lead us to foretell his advent upon the broad stage of the Grand Opera. Should he find a subject suited to his noble powers, the list of grand French works will be enriched by another masterpiece. As this goes to press we are happy to confirm the success of the Roman d'Elvire a new comic opera by him.

Albert Grisar, born at Antwerp, Dec. 26, 1808, was destined to a commercial career in his infancy and sent to Liverpool to fit himself for that profession. But his tastes did not coincide with the designs of his parents. Music had been taught him as a part of his education—he desired to make it the business of his life. He therefore stealthily left Liverpool in July, 1830, for Paris and sought the counsels of Reicha. From that time bookkeeping gave place to harmony. Meantime revolution broke out in France and Belgium, and Grisar during the siege of Antwerp still continued his studies.

A simple romance, la Folle, laid the basis of his reputation; its melody, was so expressive and original in form as to become the fashion. Le Mariage impossible, a comic opera played at Brussels in the spring of 1833, gained the young composer a gift of 1,200 francs to aid him in completing his musical education. He returned to Paris and published a great number of delicious romances. In 1836 he made his first appearance as composer upon the stage of the Opera Comique, with a work in two acts entitled Sarah, in which is a considerable degree of dramatic force. L'An Mil, in one act brought out in June, 1837, had perhaps the fault of being too grand a subject for so small a framework. Then came Lady Melvil and the Travestissements, pieces at first played at the theatre de la Renaissance, after which Grisar was long silent. He then went to Naples to gain inspiration in the native land of buffo music. Upon his return he brought with him l'Eau merveilleuse, a rich subject already treated by Auber and in le Philtre and l'Elisir d'Amore; then he wrote Gilles ravisseur, a masterpiece which may well be placed beside the Tableau parlant and the Rendezvous bourgeois. His farcical, Bonsoir Monsieur Pantalon, has continued to draw out peals of laughter, now rare in the theatre; true, the text was marvellously to the composer's purpose. Les Porcherons, a work in 3 acts, was greatly applauded. Nothing is fresher than the chorus of gardeners, which opens the first act; nothing more vigorous than the bacchanal scene at the rising of the curtain for the third. Le Carillonneur de Bruges and les Amours du Diable were less fortunate; yet in the first of these, the beautiful chorus upon the national flag and in the second, a trio of the grandest dramatic effect must be mentioned. Le chien du Jardinier, a piece in the vein of the l'Epreuve villageoise of Grétry, marks the return of Grisar to his natural style.

We will close this rapid notice of our living composers with Victor Massé, the only one of the younger generation, who has as yet gained a position in the theatre. Born at Lorient, in Brittany, he began his musical studies as a fellow pupil of Rachel at Choron's school. After the suppression of that useful establishment, from which so many fine musicians have preceded, Massé entered at the Conservatory, the pianoforte class of Zimmermann. He studied harmony with Douren and the higher branches of composition with Halévy, gaining the first prize of the Institute in 1844. He then journeyed to Italy and studied profoundly, whatever that classic land of art possessed of wealth in poetry, painting, sculpture and music. The beauty of the climate, the superior organization of its inhabitants, the wonders of nature and art impregnated the happy imagination of the young artist. He is possessed of great sensibility and understands profoundly all the resources of the orchestra; hence Victor Massé has an immense talent as a colorist. He is the Diaz* of music. Harmony, in his skillful hands becomes a pallet from which he draws his tints and shades. His orchestration managed understandingly and most skillfully for effect, adds to the magic of his warm and picturesque style. He is a conscientious artist, one who loves his work, and will not quit a phrase until he feels it impossible to improve it. He may deceive himself at times, for no one is infallible; but at least he never allows a work to leave his hands until he has exhausted all the resources of his brilliant powers. When he has succeeded in rendering an idea, he seeks to accompany it in a manner conforming to the scene to which it belongs, and exercises his wits to find all the forms in which it may be clad, so as finally to gain a full assurance, that it could not be better expressed. In this manner alone can assiduous labor cause a new idea to produce its best fruits.

Victor Massé's first work for the Opera Comique, was la Chanteuse voilée in one act, text from the facile pen of Scribe, and was brought out in November, 1850. It was a Spanish subject and so plastic as to be peculiarly fitted for his genius. Mlle. Lefebvre, who was then in all the splendor of her fresh youthful talent, lent the fortunate composer, the best efforts of her marvellous vocalization and her graceful natural acting. Audran was all that could be wished in the character of the painter Velasquez, and Bussine made a fine contrast with his powerful and sonorous voice. Massé's instrumentation, which was perhaps rather redundant, cleared itself in Galatée, a piece in two acts written by Michel Carré and Jules Barbier. The poem is from the Greek adapted to our epoch. Pygmalion gives life to his statue but dissatisfied with the faults of the woman, prays Venus to change her again to a statue. This termination, though not conforming to the fable, has furnished the musician with scenes, new and varied, upon which to employ his pencil. The choruses behind the scenes are of an exquisite character; the invocation to Venus sung by Mlle. Wertheimer, produces a powerful effect; the air of Paresse, so well given by Mocker, the drinking song, a little overdone, perhaps by Madame Ugalde; the part performed by Sainte-Foy, and as well, all combined to render the whole a complete masterpiece.

The success of the Noces de Jeannette, revealed to the public Massé's talents in rural subjects. The romance of the needle, deliciously sung by Mlle. Miolan, offered a happy contrast to the part of Coudere, the actor, who is the very type of the rustic; the song of Margot given with full lungs, exhaled the true country odor. La Fiancée du Diable, a work in three acts, had little success; Miss Fauvette hardly more. Les Saisons, from its descriptive character, was better fitted for a ballet or an oratorio than for the stage. La Reine Topaz obtained a success at the Theatre Lyrique. Venetian color abundantly applied upon a picture of large dimensions, the prodigious vocal agility of Mad. Cavalho in his songs of l'Abeille and the Carneval de Venise, the beauty of the costumes and decorations, the perfect adaptation of Meillet, Froment and Balanque to their parts, all these were elements of powerful attraction to the public.

Les chaises à porteurs is a pretty picture in the style of Boucher. Victor Massé is sometimes a little too much of the realist—never to forget the ideal is the true source of perfection to the artists.

Joseph Staudigl

Born April 14th, 1807 Died March 28th, 1861.

Wöllersdorf, in Lower Austria, was Staudigl's birthplace. His father, one of the imperial rangers, wished to bring him up as a gamekeeper, and, in after life, the celebrated singer certainly distinguished himself as a sportsman. His real vocation, however, soon manifested itself under the guidance and fostering care of the village schoolmaster at Wöllersdorf. In 1816, the boy went to Wiener Neustadt, where he was placed under the chorus-master, Herzog, and when his treble had changed into a powerful bass, received, as a novice, into the Benedictine "Stift" of Mölk, the prelate at the head of which was an ardent lover of music. Staudigl next proceeded to Vienna, and, after enduring considerable hardships, obtained an engagement as chorister in the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. It was here that the manager, Herr Düport, became acquainted with him, and, on the occasion of one of the principal singers being suddenly taken ill, gave him the part of Pietro in Masaniello. Staudigl was successful, and his artistic career, properly so speaking, now commenced. Not all at once, but gradually, and by most incessant industry and indefatigable practice, he imparted to his voice that evenness, richness, flexibility and power of endurance, which everywhere excited admiration. He devoted, likewise, although not until in after years, the greatest attention to dramatic expression. He could never, it is true, manage to get rid entirely of the Austrian dialect, or divest himself of a certain negligence inherent to his personal appearance; but his performance during his best period—that is to say, from about his thirtieth to the end of his fortieth year—were efforts of the highest rank, being mostly insurpassable, in a purely musical sense, and distinguished, as a whole, for their agreeableness and imposing certainty.

It was not, however, till after his visit to London that his talent was generally appreciated to the full extent it deserved. The admiration entertained for him by his countrymen received an evident impulse from the applause and money he gained from the unmusical, but in many respects artistically inclined, and artist honoring capital of England. He remained at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, under Ballochino, till 1845; he was then secured for the new operatic enterprise in the Theatre an der Wien (under Franz Pokorny), where he undertook the duties of a sort of upper stage-manager, and sang with Jenny Lind, in the remarkable performances, never to be forgotten by the lovers of music, given by that lady.

The unsuccessful result of Pokorny's enterprise, and the straits of his former comrades at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, during the crisis of 1848, caused Staudigl to return to the scene of his earliest triumphs. He was appointed stage-manager-in-chief under Holbein. He was engaged with Cornet a year (1853—1854), and then dismissed, because his voice and, still more, his memory were seriously impaired, but he was dismissed in a manner which, although not unexampled in the Austrian imperial theatres, could not fail to wound the feelings of an artist who had been so generally admired, and whose merit had been proved, for a long series of years, by such admirable performances. If, in addition to this, we take into consideration the bitter effect produced by criticism, even though perfectly justified, when it tells a singer—as it is bound to tell him—when his best period has been passed, and the moment for honourable retirement has arrived; if, moreover, we take into consideration pecuniary losses (simultaneously with the loss of his engagement), a shattered constitution, and other causes of distress, occurring at the same time, we shall have no great reason for immoderate astonishment at the fact of Staudigl's mind becoming deranged in the summer of 1856.

Staudigl's last new part was that of Falstaff, in Thomas's Song d'une Nuit d'Été, in the season 1853—1854, while his last appearance took place on the 18th February, 1854, as Ruben in Auber's Fils Prodigue. His last new oratorio part was that of Zacharias, in J. Hager's oratorio Johannes der Täufer, on the first of March, 1855, and his last public appearance that on Palm Sunday, 1856, at the Burg-Theatre, as St. Paul, in Mendelssohn's oratorio of the same name.

Staudigl's voice was one of those which we may call beautiful (schön), without running any risk of being accused of abuse of that much-abused term. It flowed forth, with exactly the amount of force that might be desired, in every portion of its natural compass; hence its incomparable correctness, guided by the finest musical ear; hence the irreproachable gradation of tone; and hence the power, so often admired, of preserving clearness of enunciation under all circumstances, and, at the same time, despite the difference of the words, of invariably commanding a degree of agreeable roundness and fullness, frequently quite extraordinary, and always satisfactory; and hence everything constituting the first foundation of perfection in the art of singing. This correct intonation—which, also, is a greatly abused and misunderstood term, for let the reader reflect, for a single moment, how few singers can at once pitch their voice properly, without the help of an aspiration, and a hundred other objectionable means—this correct intonation, we repeat, enabled Staudigl to pass, on the one hand, without any sudden break, from great vigour to gentleness of tone, and, on the other, to develop to a certain degree, the flexibility of his voice—a flexibility usually known, in the widest acceptance of the term, as bravura. Rossini's runs and roulades were, perhaps, somewhat out of Staudigl's line, but the bravura of the German, as well as of the French style—of Handel, on the one hand, and of Boieldieu on the other—not forgetting the magnificent shake, which is so prominent a feature in both these schools, found in Staudigl a perfect master. We may, therefore, safely affirm that flexibility of voice cultivated to such a pitch, without any sacrifice of quality, a flexibility in which most basso singers are totally deficient, was quite sufficient for the comprehensive round of parts it fell to Staudigl's lot to undertake.

To excellence of intonation, light and shade, strength, softness, and flexibility, were added a most happy, natural, and unconstrained connection of the registers, and a power acquired by incessant and systematic application, of drawing breath only at long intervals (langer Athem)—all tending to increase the natural value of so rare a voice. The pleasing impression produced by its peculiarly agreeable and harmonic sound, flowing, we might almost say, from the singer's very soul, cannot be recalled by words, or satisfactorily described; and, when we speak of its melting and metallic character, of its softness and richness, of its evenness and certainty, we are giving only an approximate idea of something which a person must himself have heard to appreciate properly.

If we reflect on the manner in which an artistic education is commenced, we are instantly struck by the absurd and defective plan usually pursued. Yet this fact is taken too little into consideration. People reproach artists with having learnt little or nothing, forgetting that nothing has been done even now, to afford them an opportunity for learning anything. For instance, can the incipient actor find a school for dramatic, rhetorical and mimetic instruction, by means of which he may hope to mature and develop his natural gifts? But the incipient singer is still worse off. Though the actor does not find a school, he finds particular models which he can follow, and certain theatres in full activity, where, under a simultaneous course of diligent self-study, and the healthy influence of others he may work himself in, and rise to high artistic excellence. The instrumentalist, again, finds in his conservatories, however one-sided and limited their field of action may be, in addition to the requisite elementary instruction, a starting-point for further artistic development. In this case, also, we have to do only with exclusively musical qualities and acquirements. How different, and how much more difficult, is the position of the operatic singer! How much is expected from him! He must have enjoyed a musical education, just like the instrumentalist; but he must develop, to the highest possible pitch, the tone, strength, evenness, and flexibility of his voice, and, by continuous and careful application, keep up all these qualities at their proper height, a task infinitely more difficult to accomplish with the human voice than with an instrument; he must acquire a natural, healthful, and noble style; he must obey the rules of musical intonation as strictly as the instrumentalist, at the same time preserving clearness of enunciation, and giving the words correctly, both in a declamatory and colloquial sense; in addition to his musical qualification, he must, the moment he goes on the stage, make himself master of those external aids—such as walking, standing, and regulating his features and demeanor—which alone are found quite sufficient to tax the powers of the actor; he must, finally, combine with musical conception and working out of his part, the dramatic treatment, which is all that the actor has to consider, and create out of all this a complete artistic whole. He must become a good actor, without ceasing to be a good musician. It is enough for us to enumerate such demands as these, to see at once the difficulty of satisfying them, if only approximately.

A knowledge of the great difficulties which the singer has to overcome, should teach us not to be immoderate in our demands upon him, and, keeping within the bounds of possibility, though invariably advocating ideal excellence, which the critic cannot entirely avoiding doing, not to lose sight of the peculiarities distinguishing each separate branch of art. The singer ought to have in him something of the actor, a something which he should endeavor to develop; but he must not become an actor, if he would not entirely ruin the singer. Staudigl was more especially an accomplished singer, and, although the histrionic part of his performances was open to many objections, the general impression of those performances was an especially satisfactory one, and not only the musical, but also the musically-dramatic effect, was indisputably artistic. The peculiar nature of this state of things, by no means infrequent with operatic artists, is to be best explained by a specification of the various good qualities and defects which are mixed up in such individuals.

* An instrument is ready to our hand, while well-defined and universally valid rules teach us how to use it. Now, although in cultivating the voice, we pre-suppose certain general rules, much of the practical treatment depends on the disposition of each individual, and the state he happens to be in. The voice itself is subjected to the varying influence of the body and mind; it is not a lifeless thing on which we must foster, tend, watch, etc.

Louis Niedermeyer.

The tomb has again opened for one of our contemporary celebrities. Louis Niedermeyer departed this life at Paris, on the 14th inst. in his fifty-ninth year. Born on the 27th April, 1802, at Nyon, in the Canton of Vaud, Switzerland, situate on the shores of the Lake of Geneva, Niedermeyer was descended, through his mother, from a Protestant family, which had been compelled to leave France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. His father, a native of Wurzburg, had settled and married in Switzerland. Being himself endowed with great musical talent, he was the first master his son ever had. Louis Niedermeyer, when fifteen years old, was sent by his parents to Vienna, where, for the space of two years, he received lessons on the piano from Moscheles, and in composition from Forster. After having published, in the above city, some of his first essays, consisting of pieces for the piano, he proceeded to Rome, where he continued the study of counterpoint, under the tuition of Fioravanti, master of the Pontifical Chapel. He next went to Naples, where Zingarelli undertook to complete his musical education. It was during his stay in Naples that the young artist composed his first opera, entitled Il Reo per Amore, and produced at the Teatro del Fondo. He was then eighteen years of age. In 1821 he had returned to Switzerland. To this epoch belongs one of the most charming inspirations of his youth, an inspiration subsequently destined to be crowned with complete success. We allude to the music of Le Lac, which he composed to M. de Lamartine's words, and in which the musician proved himself as much a dreamer and a colorist as the poet. In the following year he proceeded to Paris, where he first attracted attention by several sterling compositions for the piano, and afterwards, thanks to the friendship and patronage of Rossini, who had been acquainted with him in Naples, was enabled to get a two-act opera accepted at the Théâtre Italien. It was entitled Casa nel Bosco, the book being translated from the comic opera, Une Nuit dans la Forêt. This work was performed in the month of July 1828, but despite a certain melodic charm about it, with only trifling success.

Gentle, timid, and modest, Niedermeyer was little calculated for the incessant struggles to be expected by every dramatic composer at the outset of his career. He soon gave way to a feeling of disgust, and, notwithstanding the reputation he had already achieved by the publication of various pieces of vocal and instrumental music, left Paris in 1833, for Brussels, where he took a lively interest in the institution founded by M. Gaggia. Here he discharged, for eighteen months, the duties of professor of the piano. A situation of this kind did not afford many opportunities for a composer to distinguish himself; Niedermeyer resolved, consequently, to return to Paris, and once more to try his fortune at the theatre. At length the doors of the Académie Royale de Musique were flung open to him, and, on the 3rd March, 1837, he brought out at that establishment Stradella, an opera in five acts, words by M. M. Emile Deschamps and Emilian Pacini. This grand score, on which the composer had founded justifiable hopes, was at first coldly received. Subsequently—in 1843—Stradella was revived, reduced to three acts, and in its new form ran for a considerable number of nights. Several pieces from it obtained, and still continue to obtain, great success at concerts. In the month of December 1844, Niedermeyer, in conjunction with M. Théodore Anne, produced, at the same theatre, Marie Stuart, an opera in five acts, containing, among other remarkable pieces, a most charming romance, which has become a popular favorite. In the following year, government did justice to the talent and character of the artist, by creating him a knight of the Legion of Honor. In 1846, he was summoned by Rossini to Bologna, for the purpose of working under his direction, at the adaptation of the Donna del Lago for the French stage. This adaptation was performed, in the month of December in the same year, at the Grand Opera, under the title of Robert Bruce. Lastly, in the month of May 1853, Niedermeyer brought out his five-act opera, La Fronde, words by M. M. Maquet and Jules Lacroix. About the same time he conceived the idea of establishing, on the model of the old institution founded by Choron under the restoration, but suppressed after the revolution of 1830, a School of Religious Music, intended to form, by the study of the chefs-d'œuvre of the great masters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, singers, organists, maitres de-chapelle, and composers of sacred music. By the assistance of M. Fortoul, then Minister of Public Instruction and Worship, he obtained a subsidy from the State, and in the course of the year 1853, opened his school, M. Dietsch being appointed to assist him as "Directeur des Etudes." This establishment, situated in the Rue Neuve Fontaine-St.-Georges, Paris, and in which a literary education, as far as the subjects of the third form, is given to the pupils simultaneously with their musical instruction, was not long in prospering and sending out a number of distinguished proficientes, who have been appointed to various cathedrals and churches in France.

Niedermeyer watched over the interests of his school with unvarying solicitude, and neglected nothing which could tend to improve the course of study there. Thus, by no means satisfied with the altogether arbitrary manner in which the plain-chant is generally accompanied, he devoted his most serious attention to this interesting part of religious art, and, in 1855, published, in conjunction with M. J. d'Ortigue, a Traité d'Accompagnement de Plain-Chant, founded upon new principles. It was, also, with a view to diffuse among all classes a taste for religious music, that, in 1856, he established a paper called the La Maitrise, the editorship of which—now entrusted to M. d'Ortigue—he resigned in 1858. He was employed in terminating a grand work on the accompaniment, for the organ, of the plain-chant of the church service, when death suddenly surprised him. His funeral took place on the 17th instant, in the Cimetière du Nord. Two speeches were delivered, one by the Pastor Coquerel, and the other by M. Elwart, before his prematurely opened tomb, and in the midst of his pupils and numerous friends, who had hastened to pay him this last mark of respect.

Niedermeyer leaves a son, aged twenty, and two daughters, to whom he bequeaths no fortune, save an unblemished name. He obtained long since the recognition of his right to French nationality. We have already mentioned the works he produced on the stage. He wrote, also, a great many separate vocal pieces. Among the best known are: "Le Lac," "L'Isolément," "Le Soir," "L'Automne," "La Voix humaine," ou poems of M. de Lamartine; "La Route du Sabbat," "Océano-Nox," "La Nuit," "Puisqu'ici bas toute Ame," to words by M. Victor Hugo; "La Noce de Léonore," "Une Scène dans les Apennins," and several other pieces, to words by M. Emile Deschamps. He also set to music Manzoni's ode: "Il cinque Maggio," Millevoys's "Poète Mourant," and Casimir Delavigne's "Ame du Purgatoire," besides composing several masses, one for grand orchestra, and a large number of religious pieces for the voice and for the organ, etc., etc.—From the Revue et Gazette Musicale.

NO. XIII.

MUSIC IN BERLIN—BACH.

With the musical wealth of a whole winter in Germany opening before me two expectations, two desires were uppermost. One was, to hear as much as possible of the operas of GLUCK; the other, as much as possible of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH. For these are just those noblest legacies of musical genius, which an American cannot have at home, however intimate he may be with Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, and all the rest. He must go to Germany for them, as he must go to Italy for Raphael and Titian, or to Vienna for St. Stephen's cathedral, to Venice for St. Mark's. The former wish was reasonably well gratified, although (in respect to quantity) not well enough.

Berlin was just the place for it; the only place where Gluck comes frequently, with all due honor and fair treatment, upon the stage. I was fortunate enough to hear there the Orpheus and Eurydice twice, and the Iphigenia in Aulis, and Iphigenia in Tauris each once; and with one of the true lyric queens of our day, (although her voice is sadly damaged), Frau Jachmann (Johanna Wagner), in the parts of Orpheus and of Clytemnestra. Enough here to say, that all my anticipations were made good; that all that I had been told of the classical dignity, the truth to nature, the unflagging dramatic interest, the absence of all forced, false or sickly expression, and the inspired, pervading beauty of each work as a whole, in Gluck's operas was fully realized. The only regret was, the impossibility of repeated hearings, so that one might really get to know the noble strangers. More of this hereafter.

With regard to BACH, too, my opportunities have been abundant; and it is simple truth to say, that nothing else in this Art tour has, nothing else could have, so met the deepest want, or so enriched my musical experience. Each new leaf that I have turned of him has deepened my conviction that he was as great in genius as in learning; that his ideas are as wonderful, as inexhaustible as his skill in handling them; that there is feeling, soul, religion in his music, and not mere contrapuntal mathematics; that his fugue work is more beautiful, and more appealing to the inmost soul of us, than curious,—more like happy inspirations, tipped with true imaginative fire, than like calculated combinations; and that Nature, after all, the rich imaginative, poetic nature of the man, played the largest part in it. But above all, his music testifies to the profound religious nature of the man; it was the daily, hourly offering of a sincere, a rich, all-absorbing, manly, cheerful, childlike piety; an offering in which all his faculties gathered themselves up for a complete, ideal act, to realize the beauty of holiness. His music is the type and the expression of those experiences, those instincts in us, which relate us to the Infinite and make us conscious of a spiritual world and destiny. Hence it is, that we feel something mystical (in the best sense, not opposed to clear) in his music and his life; and that his Fugues awaken somewhat the same wondering and infinite sensation, the same insatiable appetite, with which we gaze and are charmed upward and upward by the soaring, fluid lines and details of an old Gothic cathedral tower and spire; endless variety ascending, losing itself in the sublime whole, which but repeats, or rather realizes, the type of form of each particular. These two types of form, the Gothic cathedral in architecture, seem in its great specimens, and the Bach fugue in music, have a wonderful affinity with what is deepest in us; one listens with insatiable appetite, like love. Their suggestion is a story without end, and never tedious.

It is the idlest kind of talk, this, which treats the partiality for Bach, and for such polyphonic, such fugue music as he wrote, as mere pedantry. It is ignorance or impudence to say that such things are wholly done by rule, that they are the cold and uninspiring product of the mere mathematical, combining intellect. No art could live a century upon such capital. A posthumous enduring and increasing fame is a thing that has roots and grows. The interest which the best musicians and the most musical persons now take in Bach, after his works had lain a good part of a century almost forgotten or rather not yet known, (like Shakespeare), is proof enough that there must be something in him; that his fugues, church cantatas, arias, &c., are made of more immortal stuff than any skill or learning. Musical Germany finds no task more rewarding, more inspiring, than the exploration of those countless scores in manuscript which he has left; and it is doubtful whether any music at the present moment is exerting a greater influence,—not directly on the great mass of music-lovers, but not the less surely through those who have penetrated the nearest to the sanctuary in the temple of this divine Art. The great "monster concert" master, Jullien, was once complimented on a certain something like a fugue, which he had introduced into his opera "Pietro il Grande," (which brought a hundred horses upon the stage). "Oh," said the great man, "that is nothing; any musician can compose a fugue. It is wholly mechanical; it is only to take a little theme, and treat it according to the rules, and all the rest follows precisely as it must; there is no room for invention in it." He had nothing to answer to the question: "How then comes it, inasmuch as everybody wrote fugues in Bach's and Handel's time, that their's have lived, and nearly all the rest have passed away? Does it not appear that while some fugues are sticks, others are living branches from a tree with roots? and that there may be all the difference between one man's fugue and that of another (on the same subject too), that there is between a song by Shakespeare, such as "Hark, hark, the lark," and one by one Miss Matilda in the poet's corner of a newspaper?"

But I did not intend an apology for Bach, or a defense of fugues. And this is no time to go into the discussion of deep questions. I am simply reporting what I have seen and heard, with some hint of the impressions it has made on me. Whether the Bachists be right or wrong (and so far as any are exclusives they are wrong), it is certainly a fact that no composer, old or new, so occupies the attention of the most earnest musicians and amateurs in Germany just now, as Bach. No works are sought out, edited, studied, practised, professed, listened to, talked over and written about with more eager curiosity and enthusiasm than his. It is that people feel that they have opened here a well of living waters; that they have found here something old, long buried out of sight under the rubbish of the past which really is fresher, newer, more original and more refreshing, than any thing produced in our own time. And what a monument to the man's memory, what a witness to the power with which his music speaks to the best musical and spiritual instincts and perceptions of the present age, is that magnificent edition of his works, from the press of those princely Leipzig publishers, Breitkopf and Härtel, of which a volume is put forth yearly under the auspices of the Society for the publication of Bach's works! Ten noble volumes are already before us—the most beautiful specimens of music engraving and printing (these and a similar edition of Handel, since commenced), which exist in the world. And let us take a little pride in knowing that the series has some eight subscribers in our own Boston! None of us may live to witness the completion of the series; for the unpublished manuscripts which Bach has left are as innumerable, as the scores are in almost every case important and elaborate. The publication enriches nobody but the subscribers and the world. That is to say, there is no money made by it. It is published purely as a monumental work by the Bach Society; the price covers the expense of the publication and no more; so that the subscribers are really themselves the publishers, and the Society is their committee, which manages the thing for them. It really adds to the value and attraction of the books, that they are free from all taint of trade.

A traveller through old cities has many treasures shown to him. But nothing which I have seen, in palaces and churches, in galleries and libraries, has seemed to me so rare a treasure as one which I saw in the Royal Library in Berlin. The musical department of that library contains 50,000 works. (Our "Diarist" has told us that before and has written us many a letter from the midst of his labors in its recesses, copying out the "conversation books" of Beethoven, in which people pencilled their questions and remarks to the deaf giant during so many years). There, near a window, so as to be readily removed in case of fire, stands a huge chest of drawers and shelves, full almost to bursting with autograph scores of Bach. Besides those of the published works, the great Mass in B minor, the Passion music, both according to the text of Matthew and of John, the Christmas Oratorio, the Organ Preludes and Fugues, the "well-tempered Clavichord," &c., here are found upwards of 270 different church Cantatas,—elaborate compositions, consisting of Symphonies, Chorals, Fugues, Arias, Duets, &c., of which Bach wrote a fresh one for each Sunday of the year, for many years, while he was cantor of the Thomas Church in Leipzig. Many of these are among the grandest and most wonderful creations of religious music; and not a title of them are yet published or known. Many more are hidden here and there, no one knows where, or are destroyed. The librarian has even picked a loose shred of a rumor, that some of them have found their way, a long while ago, to America. Surely so rich a collection must in time draw to itself whatever scattered manuscripts of Bach exist.

While speaking of this library, let me name some other treasures which it possesses. I saw there Beethoven's complete manuscript of the Ninth, or Choral, Symphony! a strange mass of hieroglyphics, filled with erasures, alterations, and mere hints and sketches; yet very fascinating, (and as if they would fain tell their meaning picture-wise) the tangled, sprawling curves and dashes looked. I saw, too, books full of first sketches, mere jottings down of principal ideas, for works which he designed to write; among them, a design for each of the several movements of a tenth Symphony. What a contrast between the look and character of these autographs, and that of an autograph opera by Mozart! In the latter no erasures, no corrections; all as neat and clean as if it had been copied for a photograph edition. And such was Mozart's creative method as he himself tells us in the letter to the Count. Every thing came to him whole and complete; all its parts lay clearly in his mind at once, in due relation and proportion; he had only to copy out thence upon paper. It was the pure way of inspired genius, the Raphael way. Many works of Palestrina, and the old Italians, of Orlando Lasso, Handel, Haydn, all the lesser Bachs, of Cherubini, of nearly all the known, and many unknown, masters exist here in manuscript, or in the only known printed copy.

Of course Bach does not reign equally in all the German cities. His great works are chiefly to be heard in Leipzig and Berlin. In the former place the Bach movement, so to speak, of these times began; for there are centred the Bach traditions, and there Mendelssohn sounded the signal of the newly awakening interest in him. There his Passions-music and other great religious works are performed in the church, and from the choir, where Bach himself was cantor: and there it has been my good fortune to hear his Weinachts-Cantata (or Christmas Oratorio) and his Johannis Passion, produced by the indefatigable, single-minded, modest laborer in the pure cause of Art and Bach, Herr Riedel, with the singing society which he has raised up for the purpose. Berlin, as the great northern capital of Germany, and with great resources and ambition, must have everything, and upon a larger scale than anybody; and so her many excellent societies bring out more great works of Bach in the course of a season, than can be heard anywhere else. It was my luck to secure much and to lose much of this. Could I have staid there until Passion week and later, I should have heard both the Matthäus and the Johannis Passion, and also the great Mass in B minor, called his greatest work. Or could I have contrived to be upon the Rhine that week, I might have heard the Matthew Passion upon three successive days in Darmstadt, in Aix-la-Chapelle and in Cologne—the latter under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller, who is the right man to keep alive an interest in Bach in those regions. But what I did hear in Berlin makes a formidable list. For instance, five of the Cantatas, including two of the grandest works I have ever heard, even by the side of Handel's Oratorios, namely one upon the Choral: Ein' feste Burg, and one commencing: Ich hatte viel Bekümmerniss; performed by that admirable society, the "Bach-Verein," which has for its director one of the most sterling musicians and composers of the day, George Vierling. Also many Motets and Chorals, many organ Preludes, Fugues, Toccatas, Sonatas, &c., violin music, arias sung in mixed concerts, &c.

In Vienna, where I arrived just before Easter, Bach is little cultivated. Ever since Beethoven and Schubert's time, the Italian taste has reigned among the light-hearted Viennese. As a musical city, it is more like Paris. But there is already an awakening in a higher direction. There is a circle of young musicians in Vienna, among whom I may name Hellmesberger and his fine Quartet, Eppstein, the pianist, Ruffinaccia, &c., who serve the highest cause of classical Art in a right noble spirit. These men love Bach, as well as Beethoven. Joachim is an immense favorite there, and through his masterly violin performances, has even made Bach more than palatable to Viennese audiences. Vienna, too, has the honor of publishing altogether the best and most high-toned musical journal, which now appears in Germany. Its editor, Herr Selma Bagge, is an enlightened, earnest and unselfish champion of the True in Art; and whoever among German musical men has an earnest word to say upon any important topic is very apt to seek the Vienna journal for his organ. There has appeared recently, in several numbers of it, a review of Robert Franz's admirable arrangements of Bach's arias, which shows the most profound and delicate appreciation of Bach's style and genius, and of his mission in the world, that I have ever seen. It is said to have been written by a young composer of much promise, living in Halle, a pupil and friend of Franz, by name Saran.

Let this pass for an introduction, and in another letter I will try to recall more particularly what I have heard of Bach. D.

A New Mass.

Mr. J. FALKENSTEIN, who has been the organist and musical director at the Endicott street Catholic church for a term of years invited some of his friends to a rehearsal of a Mass composed by him and executed by the choir and orchestra of the church with the aid of some of our resident musicians on the evening of May 4th. Mercantile Hall, where the rehearsal took place, was filled with an appreciative audience.

Composing a new piece of music may be set down as an undertaking much more delicate, at the present day, than writing a new book. Not only have the various emotions of the human soul been treated in tones in the most varied manner, but they have been so expressed by the immortal masters in ways beyond which hardly anything seems possible. From the Matthäus-passion of Bach, to the Missa solennis in D by Beethoven—mentioning these two works merely as outposts of a host of glorious, sublime compositions and not forgetting the Requiem by Mozart nor the Masses by Haydn, Mozart, Cherubini and others; from Handel's Susannah, Judas Maccabeus to Mendelssohn's Elijah—so much grand, devout and truthful musical expression has emanated from the minds of these chosen men that it is, in this as in other departments of musical art, an almost hopeless endeavor to find a new form wherein to clothe a new musical idea.

The musical critic has a difficult task to perform with reference to new compositions in church style. Filled with the severe and yet so warm and deep beauties of Bach and Händel, having the grand and solemn mysteries of the Requiem by Mozart and the Missa Solennis by Beethoven indelibly graven in ones memory, it is difficult to disengage oneself from these impressions in order to find the standard, by which to measure a new applicant for musical fame. Having to consider the means with which a composer has to work, if writing for practical purposes, it was well for an impartial critic to have had occasion of hearing the composition, the name of which heads this article. And after observing that a part of his orchestra is not of the highest order, we are surprised at the happy tact and practical skill with which Mr. Falkenstein worked out the instrumentation of his modest composition. Indeed we think in some places Mr. F. attained orchestral effect with his limited means, which do him much credit and show that he is a practical musician of great ability. Proofs of this are furnished throughout the whole of the work. The orchestration, as far as the middle parts are concerned, suffered somewhat from the absence of violoncellos and bassoons, which could not be procured. This caused certain passages to sound thin, especially where, as is often done and we think not to advantage, the violins go unisono with the singers. We especially observed this in the "Incarnatus." The "Kyrie" is good, so are various parts of the "Gloria," in which imitations in the bass instruments produce quite a good effect. The first movement of the "Sanctus" struck us as especially good good, expressing happily a mysterious holy emotion. In the "Benedictus" and the "Agnus Dei," the soprano singer has some fine soli, and revealed a full sympathetic voice, which, with proper cultivation, we think, would be a valuable addition to the ranks of our resident singers. A fine part occurs also in the "Dona nobis pacem." Some of the finest instrumental effects are in some pieces for the brass instruments in the "Gloria," "Credo," and the "Hosannah" of the "Sanctus." Especially good was the chorus of the "Agnus Dei," with its accompaniment of brass instruments. And so was the "Amen" at the close of the mass.

The style of the composition reminds one of Mozart. Although there are no positively new ideas in the work, and the harmonies, though very good in many places, have been used before, yet there is so much skill in the Mass, many graceful flowing melodies in the various brief movements and so much practical ability in the very short and modest work, that we sincerely think Mr. Falkenstein ought to essay some greater work or at least a more elaborate orchestral composition. We might add that portions of the mass seemed to have more of a lyrical, operatic character than is desirable for a mass. But then we remember what good old father Haydn said, when similar objections were raised against some passages in his masses, "Why should I not pray to my God with merriment and rejoicing?" said the good old man. Every one ought to do all things in his own way is surely a good and just maxim.

If we may take the liberty, we should suggest to Mr. Falkenstein a study of the works of Bach. There are some passages in his mass that show that he likes to write in a seyerer style. The old maestro is the best food for aspiring talents and we think Mr. F. would find it to his great advantage to make himself familiar with the motettes and airs of Bach as well as his masses and oratorios. *†

THE LAST AFTERNOON CONCERT of the season was given by the Orchestral Union on Wednesday, May 15th, before a crowded house. There did not seem to be a seat vacant. The programme was unusually rich.

1. Overture—"Die Hebriden".....Mendelssohn
2. Concert Waltz—"Gedanken Flug".....Strauss
3. Symphony No. 9—(op 88).....Mozart
4. Overture—"Oberon".....Weber
5. Romanza in G—(For the Violin).....Beethoven Performed by Carl Mädel.
6. Armen Ball Polka.....Strauss
7. Soldiers' Chorus, Prayer and Barcarole.....Meyerbeer

The four classical pieces were very well rendered. We were glad to find a delicate shading of pianissimo to fortissimo in all of them. Mr. MEISEL played the Romanza by Beethoven with much purity and taste and received a deserved applause. All the other pieces especially the very effective extract from the "Star of the North," were performed very well, and the concert formed a brilliant close to a successful series.

We see with pleasure that the "Orchestral Union and the Germania Band propose to give a series of Saturday evening concerts. Particulars see in another column. *†

Mr. Bendelari's Concert.

MR. AUGUSTO BENDELARI, with his musical club, made up from his pupils, gave a concert at Mercantile Hall, on Saturday evening last, for the benefit of the families of the Boston Volunteers. We need not say that such a body of singers, drawn from the most cultivated society of the city, did not fail to draw a crowded house, or to give a most substantial benefit. The programme gave us the names of some fifty ladies and twenty gentlemen who make up Signor Bendelari's club, and we should be well pleased to be able to give some fuller account of this very delightful concert. The voices were all very fresh and beautiful, and several of the singers showed the highest style of amateur accomplishment and cultivation, most creditable to their instructor. The concert closed with a spirited air and chorus, composed by Signor Bendelari, who, like most of our adopted citizens, is full of patriotic ardor, which found spirited expression in this song, Rule Columbia, which was admirably sung by Mrs. HARWOOD and full chorus. This was the programme:

1. Chorus, I Lombardi, Jerusalem.....Verdi.
2. Solo, Linda, O Lucia.....Donizetti.
3. Duet, Maria Padilla....."
4. Solo, Giuramento, Manegili.....Mercadante.
5. Solo, Tancrède.....Rossini.
6. Duet, Bianco e Faliero....."
7. Solo, Separazione....."
8. Pazzo Concertato, Macbeth.....Verdi.

PART II.

1. Ave Maria.....Florimo.
2. Solo, Lucia, Reguava.....Donizetti.
3. Duet, Giuramento.....Mercadante.
4. Solo, Jeanne d'Arc.....Bordesti.
5. Quartette, Carnevale di Venezia.....Petrella.
6. Solo, Cenerentola, Non più mesta.....Rossini.
7. Rule Columbia.....B. Augusto
Mrs. Harwood, and Chorus. [A. Bendelari]

MUSIC IN WASHINGTON.—Our troops in the Federal City, beside giving proofs of their expertness as mechanics of every sort, show that there are not a few among them possessed of no little skill in the divine art of Music. We read that on the Sunday after the arrival of a Massachusetts regiment, divine service was performed by its chaplain, one of the privates officiating as organist, while others made up an efficient choir.

We have received (with a complimentary ticket) the following programme of a concert to be given, May 9th, by the LIGHT GUARD, Company A, 71st Regiment, New York) at the Navy Yard Barracks at Washington—a Matinée d'Invitation. We regret that circumstances forbid our acceptance of the invitation, and hope that some friend may send us a Washington letter. With HARRISON MILLARD (a private in the regiment) for conductor, and Dodworth's famous band for orchestra, our readers will readily believe that the concert was well worth attending. Here is the Programme:

1. Quickstep, "Thou art far away".....Millard.
Dodworth's Band.
2. Song, "Yes! let me like a soldier fall".....Wallace.
Mr. Millard.
3. Quartet, "Come where my love lies dreaming".....Foster.
Glee Club.
4. Song, "The Monks of old".....Glover.
Mr. Camp.
5. Finale of "La Traviata".....Verdi.
Dodworth's Band.
6. National Ode, "The flag of the free".....Millard.
Mr. Millard and Chorus.
7. Trio, "Love's young dream".....Moore.
Millard, Woodruff, and Camp.
8. Fantasia on "Il Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi.
Dodworth's Band.
9. Miserere from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi.
Mr. Millard, H. Dodworth and Chorus.
10. Duetto, "I would that my love".....Mendelssohn.
Dodworth's Band.
11. Patriotic Song, "Viva l'America".....Millard.
Mr. Millard.
12. Full Chorus, "Star Spangled Banner".....Bey.
Director, Mr. Harrison Millard.
Band Leader, Mr. Harvey Dodworth.

ST. LOUIS, MAY, 1861.—"Tom" was born in Georgia, owned by a man named Jones. He was an idiot from birth. His father and mother were offered for sale. Price $1,500 without Tom; $1,200 with him. A Dr. Bethune purchased him. His daughters had a piano and used to play a little; the kind of music girls play, not much of anything. Tom used to spend his time rolling in the mud, but as soon as the piano struck up come in the house he would; there was no keeping him out. One night the piano was heard after the family had retired. They went in the parlor, and there was Tom playing every tune he had ever heard; the first time trying. Tom is blind; has not common sense, cannot converse on any subject, although he will go to church and coming home, repeat every word of the sermon. Sightless from birth and untutored, his soul runs over with the spirit of music. He produces the sweetest melody that we can conceive of, with the utmost accuracy. His brain is a repository of the richest musical gems, which scintillate and flash beneath his ebony fingers, assuring us that this unenlightened little child could only have been taught by the finger of God. Without a moment's instruction, the son of ordinary Southern field hands, he sustains himself a linguist, composer, and musician. He claims to be the only person who can play three airs at once, but I have heard Theodore M. Brown do that often, and Gottschalk play four, in Buffalo. Tom repeats any piece no matter how long or difficult on hearing it once. He repeats the music correctly and the words, verbatim, of any song in any language. He does not understand a single rudimentary principle of music yet composes gems of rare artistic ability. He sits down to the piano, plays any duett with any one, never having heard it before, and then changes stools and plays the other part, thus composing and remembering. He plays also with his back to the piano, standing up, completely reversing his fingers. He does not know a flat from a sharp, nor the name of the key. He plays the most difficult operatic music without missing a note, or striking a false one. He was caressed and petted as all negro children are on a plantation, especially those affected with the terrible infirmity loss of sight. But when the veil of darkness was drawn over the sight of this poor negro boy, a flood of light was poured in upon his brain, and his mind became an opera of beauty written by the hand of God in syllables of music.

I have sat in some considerable impatience sometimes; I did the evening I heard Jenny Lind, the first ever I heard Lagrange—but I confess I was more impatient to see Tom. The door opened and a gentleman led forward a grinning, idiotic, Congo boy, whom with some trouble he controlled. Tom is a full-blooded negro, and appears more like an ape than a man. He is eleven years old. He bowed as if his head was coming off, and while the gentleman was talking, kept playing and grinning, rolling his eyes, &c. During the evening he would drum on the piano, at intervals, clap and laugh when the audience did, and had to be closely watched all the time. He was led to the piano and took his seat. He threw his head back, and commenced with all the ease, yet vim of a master. He did all they claimed for him. Beautiful, and difficult selections from the various operas, and, in short, all the modern piano music. I am astounded, I can not account for it, no one can, no one understands it. Sunday afternoon I visited him, and for the first time we discovered a new property. I placed him at the other end of the room, and as I struck the piano at random, he immediately told every note I struck, whether black or white. He does not know their names. I struck very quickly, giving him no time to think, and kept him saying black and white as fast as he could speak; he never missed once. Monday evening they did the same at the Concert. His hand is very peculiarly shaped. From the ball of his thumb up to the first finger is an inch longer than common. The organs of time and tone are entirely wanting. He can be taught nothing. He has no intelligence. He is in all respects, save in music, a blind, idiotic negro, can not carry on any conversation. We well know the difficulty of giving concerts on the piano alone, and I never knew but one man who could do it, Wm. Mason. Tom gave fifteen in Louisville, but the troubles here broke up all concerts. To show his wonderful imitative powers he delivered a long speech of Senator Douglass' which he heard him deliver in Virginia. It was perfect, and yet Tom did not even know the meaning of a word. In playing at a concert, he does not know his pieces by name, for he does not know the names. The agent says, "Now, Tom, play the piece you played such a time," &c. Tom runs the chromatic scale with his thumb and first fingers only. In fact, his whole fingering is unlike everything else before known. He plays his pieces in any key. No matter what the piece, he will play it in a dozen different keys, full chords and all, right off, changing as fast as you wish.

His playing arises partly from his strong imitative powers, even himself not understanding why. If the audience clap so does Tom. If they should hiss he would hiss too. In the midst of his concerts he will say, "Oh, I feel like playing such a piece," and plays it. All he plays he has learned in a year.

Now, in conclusion, you may ask me one question, "Do you wish us to understand that Tom plays as well, all things considered, as Wm. Mason, Gottschalk, &c. Fairly, then, I do not. But Tom has never heard them yet. He can only play what he hears, and as he hears it. He has only heard the best players of the Southern States. He has not failed yet. Whether he will meet one who can play a piece he cannot, is a problem. He cannot come North, as he is a slave. (Bring him on! He will be safe, even in Boston; our word for it.—Ed.) He goes direct to Europe, and we shall see what we shall see.

It is the most wonderful sight I ever witnessed, to see that blind, idiotic, repulsive negro, who looks and acts much more like an ape than anything else, at the piano, discoursing such music. What is passing in that mind, walled in as it were by a wall of adamant? He cannot tell. No one can. BROWN.

PARIS, APRIL 26, 1861.—At the Théâtre Lyrique the new opera La Statue is a decided success. The music is by M. Reyer, words by Jules Barbier and Carré. The plot is taken from the Arabian Nights. Hector Berlioz thus speaks of the music of Reyer:

"The partition of M. Reyer reveals from the first a musician loving style, character, and true expression. The form of some of his pieces is not always strongly marked, but in all there may be found the qualities that are the chief charm of Weber's works, a depth of sentiment, a natural originality in melody une harmonie colorée, and an energetic instrumentation free from all brutality and violence."

Alternating with La Statue, Gluck's Orpheus is being given at the Lyrique, which is justly called the Odeon of the opera. Mad. Viardot ensures the success of this classic music.

At the Italiens Donizetti's Polinto has been much applauded. Pacani, Penco, and Graziani personated the chief characters. On the Emperor's birth-day, both he and the Empress were present for the representation of Un Ballo in maschera.

At the Grand Opera, the Huguenots continues to draw more strangers than Parisians. Mlle. de Taisy has continued her debuts in Lucie de Lammermoor.

Royal-Gravate is played at the Opera Comique. It is by two young noblemen, the sum of whose years would not amount to fifty, MM. de Mesgrigny and de Massa.

By special favor the Salle du Conservatoire has been accorded by the Minister of State to Leon Kreutzer, who is to give a grand concert on the 4th of May. Among the concerts of the fortnight may be mentioned those of Mme. Anna Barthe, of MM. Marchesi, Jacquard, and Lefort. A beautiful concert may also be mentioned, given by the blind of the Institution Imperiale des jeunes aveugles. They were seconded by several artists of the Conservatoire. A Christmas Carol, by Gounod, was sung by the blind pupila, also a beautiful composition executed by them entitled Les Saisons, the work of M. Paul, their professor.

Thé chief theatres have produced nothing new. At the Odeon, Mad. Ristori still continues as Beatrix in the Madonna of Art. A parody of this piece is announced at the Palais Royal, under the title, La Matrone de l'Art. M. Lagouvé then alone occupies the two principal theatres of Paris. At the Français his Un jeune homme qui ne fait rien and at the Odeon his Beatrix do not seem to be on the point of being soon replaced.

La Tour de Nesle has been in preparation for some time and is announced to-night. After some difficulty the role of Buridan has been given to Mélingue, who formerly identified himself with this character. After the Tour de Nesle, the Porte Saint Martin is to give a great drama entitled "Nero," by MM. Latour de Saint-Ybars and Edouard Plouvier. Taillade will play the chief role.

The Theatre des Varietes has given two pieces, Menuet de Danae, by Meilhac and Ludovic Halevy — a half sentimental drama — and Hercule et une jolie femme, a gay vaudeville, by Varin and Michel Delaporte.

The Hippodrome resumes its representations next Tuesday. A military drama is to be given, entitled, Souvenirs d'Afrique or Les Crêtes de Beni-Fraoussen. M. Arnault was the first to introduce these pantomimes with such display of scenery in the open air. This year he proposes to offer the spectacle of a combat on rugged mountain sides. Arabs, Zouaves, Chasseurs d'Afrique are to take part in the action. It will be the first time that such equestrian manoeuvres will be seen at the height of several stories. But this is not all the Hippodrome promises. There are among other novelties to be a parody of a bull-fight and a Ballet of frogs.

It is needless to say that "The Prisoner of the Bastille" is drawing crowds and will probably continue to do so for the next month or two. F. B.

Concert Spirituel.

This was the name given to a class of concerts established at Paris, in 1725, by Anne Danican-Philidor, a brother of the celebrated chess-player. The first performances were all in Latin, but afterwards this restriction was abandoned. The managers of these concerts obtained a license from the Royal Academy of Music, and all artists were obliged to appear at these entertainments. They took place during Easter, when the theatres were closed, and among the performers who appeared during their continuance might be seen all the actors, more or less celebrated, who were attached to the Royal Academy through a number of years. Some of the exercises must have been strange in appearance. It was the custom for debutants to appear first on the stage in short prologues, and not to undertake, at once, the impersonation of a long character. When the Concert Spirituel was inaugurated, these debutants were made to appear in character, and perform certain Latin compositions. Imagine an assemblage of musicians and choristers assembled for the performance of music. Upon the stage successively appear the candidates for theatrical honors. They are not clad in the costumes of the surrounding crowd, but in the garb of some fanciful character which they are ultimately to assume on the stage. A shepherd bedecked with ribbons, arrayed in satin, crook in hand, a shepherdess with abbreviated skirts, and a liberal display of charms unconcealed by an indierect bodice, nymphs and bacchantes in drapery yet more degagé, warriors, kings, magicians, successively appear to sing psalms, litanies and other Latin religious compositions. A strange incongruity of effects, surely; as bad as the anachronisms of some old painters who dressed Adam and Eve in pourpoint and petticoat, and the angel Gabriel in cuirass and phillibeg. At a later period the Latin psalms were given up, and the debutants were allowed to sing the music of the parts they were to assume in their own vernacular tongue. To be sure our modern concerts, where occasional pieces are "sung in costume," bear some resemblance to these old entertainments; but we should think it strange now-a-days to see little Miss Francis standing in pink tights on our Music Hall stage, trolloping out a Credo, or Signor Ferri, in his feather costume of Papageno, thundering forth a De Profundis. To arrive at a full understanding of the effects of past customs and manners, we must put our own people in the same conditions upon our own platforms and judge accordingly.

Besides these vocal performances were instrumental compositions emanating from the first composers of the day; and the Parisian public was made acquainted for the first time with the power and effects of individual instruments in the hands of skillful soloists, as well as the orchestral effects of the early symphonies.—Boston Musical Times.

What Mozart was paid.

The German papers inform us that Castelli, the Austrian literary Nestor, now in the eighty-fourth year of his age, has just published the first volume of his Memoirs. From these, among other interesting matters, we learn that his dramatic poem of The Swiss Family,* which has been translated into every language, and played hundreds of times at Vienna, brought him in altogether, for his rights as author, the sum of eight florins!

This fact will nevertheless cause little surprise; theatrical annals furnish us with only too many instances of the kind; and those who are curious about the fortunes of composers in former days, may satisfy themselves to their heart's content by examining the contents of Herr Jahn's last great work. Thanks to the zealous, diligent, thoroughly impartial, and extraordinarily voluminous biography of Mozart, we know how much the compositions of the illustrious German musician realized for him in the shape of pecuniary emolument—at least in the most important instances.

In the Registers of Accounts of the Vienna Theatre (an interesting and valuable collection), we read, for 1788-1789, page 45:

"Paid to Ponte (Lorenzo), for writing the book of Don Giovanni, 100 florins."

And a little further on, (page 47):

"Paid to Mozart (Wolfgang), for composing the music of Don Giovanni, 225 florins."

For the score of the Magic Flute (such is the genuine title of this masterpiece, not the Enchanted Flute,† as many have been accustomed to call it, owing to a careless translation of the title on the score printed in Germany), for the score of the Magic Flute, 160 ducats were paid by Schikaneder, manager of the Imperial Theatre, who reaped an immense profit by the bargain. No other work of Mozart's has enjoyed such continued popularity and success throughout Germany. The first representation of Die Zauberflöte took place on the 30th September, 1791.‡ In the month of October the opera was played twenty-four times; the bills of the 23d November, 1792, announced its hundredth, and those of the 22d October, 1795, its two hundredth performance.

Again, the same munificent honorarium was the guerdon of Mozart, respectively on account of Die Entführung and Le Nozze di Figaro.

And what about those operas of Rossini which were originally produced in Italy? One example may suffice. The incomparable Barbiere di Siviglia was disposed of for an "obolus," which not only purchased the right of republication but that of representation also! It must be admitted that the composers of the present day look more carefully after their interests.

* Set to music by Weigl.

† The flute is not enchanted, but enchanting. In plain language, it enchants others. The Italians were therefore right in calling the opera Il Flauto Magico, and not Il Flauto Incantato.

‡ Little more than two months later (Dec. 5, 1791, at Vienna) Mozart died, in the 35th year of his age.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

So you're going to the wars, dear. G. Danskin. 25

The sentiment of this ballad fits so precisely the situation of thousands of families in the North, and the music to it is so well written, that it will surely make a hit.

Over the rippling sea. T. Cattrau. 25

Pretty words adapted to the beautiful Neapolitan air "Santa Lucia," omitting the florid and difficult Finale by Braga, with which this melody made its first debut. The air impresses itself at once so vividly upon the memory that it must, in course of time, become a universal favorite.

Give me thy blessing, mother. J. W. Cherry. 25

A gem for musical evenings at home. It is plain and lies naturally in the voice. The title-page is handsomely illustrated with the picture of a young sailor taking leave of his mother.

I'll twine a wreath of roses fair. F. Woolcot. 25

A simple and pleasing ballad.

Instrumental Music.

Rifle Corps Waltzes. D'Albert. 35

Rather easy and eminently pleasing. It is one of the most melodious sets of waltzes by this favorite author.

Quintet finale from "Martha." Transcription. A. Baumbach. 35

One of the most striking and best recollected pieces in the Opera, which has furnished the composer the leading theme for the Overture, and which, in this piano arrangement comes out with all the splendor that anything short of the brass-chorus of an orchestra can give it.

Shells of Ocean for three Performers. T. Dissell. 30

Very good for class-practice, quite easy. It will teach children to keep time better than anything else.

Il suon dell' arpe. Duet from "Polinto." Transcribed. A. Baumbach. 35

A brilliant arrangement of this deservedly favorite duet, acknowledged as one of the finest and most inspired creations of Donizetti, and linked with some of our most pleasant recollections of Pizzolomini.

JOHNSON'S HARMONY. Practical Instructions in Harmony, upon the Pestalozzian, or Inductive System; teaching Musical Composition and the Art of Extemporizing Interludes and Voluntaries. By A. N. Johnson. 1,00

This work is designed for the class of persons designated in the language of music teachers as "new beginners." It imparts a knowledge of Harmony, by exercises which the student is to write; or, so to speak, by a progressive series of problems which the student must solve. The utmost simplicity of language has been used in the explanations, and an attempt made to guard against misapprehension, even on the part of an undisciplined mind.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

L'Année Musicale.

L'Année Musicale ou Revue Annuelle des théâtres lyriques et des concerts, — des publications littéraires relatives à la musique et des événements remarquables appartenants à l'histoire de l'art musicale — par P. SCUDO — Deuxième année — Paris-Librairie de L. Hachette et Cie 1861. 1 vol in 18, pp. 405.

Since Louis Fignier's excellent scientific annals have met with such deserved success, the example has been followed by others, so that now every art yearly gives rise to a work in which its progress and history during the preceding year are minutely recorded. This is but as it should be and the general reader as well as the special student has thus laid before him a series of facts, which otherwise he might seek for in vain in files of old journals and magazines.

Scudo, the musical critic of the Revue des deux mondes has now given us the second year of his Année musicale comprising the chief events of the art of 1860. The name of the author, whatever may be thought of his particular views and exigencies, is a recommendation to a work that has no pretensions above that of stating facts clearly agreeably, and fully. There is no need of being a musician to feel the tenderness of his well-known romance Le fils de la Vierge, much less to appreciate the literary qualities of his sketches in Critique et littérature musicales — La musique ancienne et moderne and in Le chevalier Sarti. In the present volume Scudo, as far as the nature of the details in which he enters permitted, has preserved those valuable qualities of style, that elegance and ease which make his criticism acceptable to all classes. Musicians accept the work as a valuable repository of facts, while the general reader is thankful to the author for the light he throws upon subjects in which all must be interested.

"The Musical Year" is not universal, it is merely national, comprehensive for France merely, detailed for Paris only. Forty pages, no more, are devoted to the rest of Europe. Whatever has been presented in the capital is studied at length. Thus the new compositions produced by the four lyric theatres, the Grand Opéra, the Opera Comique, the Théâtre Italien and the Théâtre Lyrique, as well as accounts of the various concerts fill the first five chapters; the remaining five being taken up with musical bibliography, the obituary notices and news, home and foreign.

The work opens with a notice Pierre de Médicis by Prince Poniatowski, a detailed criticism such as the author gives at the appearance of every new composition of interest, to the readers of the Revue des deux mondes. Farther on Offenbach is treated rather unceremoniously. Offenbach and Richard Wagner, we beg the pardon of the exclusive friends or foes of either, even musical party animosity runs high now; Offenbach and Wagner, strange as the collocation of the two names may seem, are the antipa-thies of Scudo. To the latter he devotes several pages when giving an account of his three concerts at the Italian Opera. He does not look upon Wagner as an ordinary artist, but "like almost all remarkable men of our time he is gifted with more ambition than fecundity, with more will than inspiration." It is the love of effect he condemns. Rhythm and harmony he accords to the author of Lohengrin and Tannhäuser. "His instrumentation, powerful in grand effects is wanting in variety and suppleness," the various parts of the orchestra are in direct opposition with each other; there is little originality. "The style is monotonous in spite of the efforts of a vigorous will and the resources of an incontestable talent."

When Scudo keeps within such criticism, we can like and follow him. We remain free to judge for ourselves whether by applying the rules of art we may have mastered or by appealing to our own natural sentiments. Though some technical learning may be necessary to explain beauties and defects in art, we may be thankful that it is within the reach of all to feel them according to our capacities. The writer who can clearly show us the secret springs of our feelings is welcome as a teacher. In his company, under his guidance we shall be willingly led to higher appreciation. But let the critic in art as well as in letters never fall into the personalities of a partisan. We are right in mistrusting him at the first step he makes in the path. Abuse justly calls forth sympathy and he who decends to it has half lost his cause. Scudo has descended to it in his notice on Richard Wagner; even more in that on Offenbach when speaking of the Papillon.

A valuable feature of the "Musical Year" is the multiplicity of facts presented. Thus the changes in the personnel of the various lyric theatres are given. The orchestra and singers of the Grand Opera number 215. The names of the chief are given in classes, thus we find four first tenors, seven baritones, ten sopranos, &c. The numerical divisions of the chorus and orchestra are also given. The musical bibliography is all interesting showing what France has contributed within the last year. Quotations are freely given showing the character of the works cited, foreign productions are not passed over in silence. The musical method of Chev , who has now public courses in Paris, gave rise to several pamphlets which are analyzed.

The details in regard to musical publications, the notices of the chief publishers, all contain valuable information. In 1860 no less than 4,051 pieces were published in France, being nearly three times the amount issued in 1850; of this according to the author's statistics more than 7,600 pounds were sent to the United States; the whole amount exported having been above 53,400 pounds. The same calculations are made for musical instruments. The new regulations for the military bands are given; each regiment having for infantry 40, for cavalry 27 musicians. There are pages in every portion of the work that are of interest beyond the special information they contain, as those on Chinese music for instance. A letter from a French officer in China upon this subject being inserted at length.

The Année Musicale concludes with a few pages that may serve to show the musical tendencies of Scudo as well as the general appreciation of art in France.

"The year of which we have recounted the facts has produced nothing very remarkable in the art which is the object of our studies. No new composer has arisen nor any salient work calculated to learn a lasting impression. At the theatre, as well as in the other parts of the vast domain of music, all that has been done is mediocre, and nothing announces that the laborious period we are traversing is near an end."

We abridge, else the quotation would be too long. Men of talent abound; the secrets of the art are studied, but we live on the fruits of the past. Weber, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, have found successors, only unequal imitators in Germany. In Schumann and Wagner Scudo sees a reaction of which Liszt is the ne plus ultra. France though not richer is at least freer, there is "no false theory" it waits that some artist may come to dispel "the moral numbness that seem to have settled on the public for the last ten years."

"If it is difficult to deny the state of poverty and languor into which the spirit of musical invention has fallen within fifteen or twenty years, there is another fact quite as undeniable; it is that the taste for this consoling art is spreading more and more and is penetrating new layers of the population. Without speaking of Germany, of Holland, of Belgium, of Switzerland and of the whole North of Europe, where music has always been popular and taught to children with the first elements of the language of country, France has also taken part in the movement of regeneration. Never has the administration been kinder to the men who devote themselves to elementary musical instruction, and never has it been better disposed to recognize the salutary power of this civilizing art."

In the communal schools music is now taught: The Orpheon under the direction of MM. Pasdeloup and Bazin gives instruction to poor workmen. The teaching of Emile Chev  is organized on an extensive scale. "All these means of propagation," the author proceeds, "prove that the knowledge of music penetrates into the heart of the nation and that it becomes an element of public instruction."

The Philharmonic societies that exist in a large number of cities, the numerous professors formed by the Conservatoire de Paris, who go and reside in the provinces, spread both in the middle and in the higher classes, the knowledge of instrumental music and better taste. The multiplied editions of the works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn prove that France which invented the Vaudeville and the Science du gai savoir is aspiring to become a musical nation. Professional artists have never been better versed in the principles of their art, never better educated, or more enlightened than in our time. A knowledge of the principle of harmony, counterpoint; the composition and history of music generally spread among our artists and among many distinguished amateurs. In fine, the musical art, as well as that of design, the treasures of intelligence as well as that of material wealth are spread over a vaster surface and are no longer the exclusive portion of a chosen few. This is the true character of modern civilization in which music plays so important a role." F. B.

Charlatanism in Music. I.

THE LION-PIANIST AS A COMPOSER.—SKETCHED
BY BENDA.

According to a common belief, every man who makes music his profession, is also a composer. This is an error. One may be an excellent performer and yet be incapable of inventing an original melody of only eight measures. The goddess of music does not always dwell entire in her devotees; she prefers to surrender herself but half, either as the performing or the creative genius; and it is only when she falls desperately in love that she abandons herself entirely, heart and hand, to her chosen favorites. Then the world receives its Mozarts, Beethovens, Mendelssohns, Spohrs, and others, who are equally great as composers and players.

It is no more difficult for the musician, who is endowed with creative talent and has practiced the rules of composition to a good degree, to compose a piece of music than it is for the gifted literary man to write a poem. The musician, like the poet, takes his seat at the table and writes down what his imagination suggests or what he conjures up from the depth of his mind. Only now and then he resorts to the instrument for a moment, merely to have the key, or just to hear how a new and complicated harmony sounds on which he may have ventured. For the rest he trusts to his lively imagination, which clearly reflects not only every tone, but every combination of tones; and even when composing a piece for the instrument itself (the piano) he writes down the most brilliant, and at the same time the most practicable passages without the aid of that instrument. Of Mozart it is said that he generally had the whole piece ready in his brain before committing it to paper. There is nothing surprising in this. Music to the true composer is a language; he may think over before, or during the art of writing what he has to say in that language. Some persons when about to write a letter have the whole epistle ready before they seize the pen; while others first take pen and paper, expecting that one thought will suggest another, as they write along. The same is the case with composers of music.

However, all is different with our hero, the Lion-Pianist. A delightful performer, with a touch so exquisite that he produces magical sounds indeed, he is nevertheless entirely destitute of productive talent and unable to fancy to himself a single tone. But compose he must, lest he should fail in his mission and the world be deprived of the fruits of his muse. Therefore, he makes it his business to ransack the scores of opera-composers, whose melodies he extends by certain liquid passages, of which a number, say two or three, have imprinted themselves on his nimble fingers with such tenacity that they ever after reappear in all he plays and writes. Thus he advances rapidly from one opus to another; but if we take a couple of these his works and compare them, we shall find that they resemble each other as closely as ever twin-brothers did. Notwithstanding their inferior value, inferior in every respect, his pieces are eagerly sought by the publishers and dearly paid for. They are beautifully, nay, daintily printed, and generally dedicated to persons of high rank and fortune, who return the compliment in the shape of breast pins and diamond rings, or even a saddle-horse, if the pianist has been known to evince equestrian proclivities.

There are, however, moments when he is disgusted with the occupation of transcribing and paraphrasing the music of others, and when he feels as if he must compose a piece that shall be all his own, not a tone borrowed. So he resolves to write a Méditation élégante et mélodieuse, as he calls it. He is determined now to practice the noble virtue of temperance, so as to abstain from all intoxicating feats of modern piano-trickery; in brief, the piece is to be in the classical style. As he is unable to compose one measure without the aid of the instrument, as before intimated, he sits at once down at his favorite Grand and thunders away for a while, just to fructify his imagination a little. Presently he stops, draws a long breath and sets out in search of a melody with which to begin his intended Méditation. He grinds out one note after the other, and when he has collected a number, sufficient to form a strain, he finds to his consternation that it is nothing but the fac-simile of a worn-out melody, with which everybody is acquainted. "That won't do!" So he jumps up from the stool and walks a few times about the room when his attention is caught by the large mirror, which adorns the apartment. He places himself right before it and is delighted, as ever, with his elegant figure, his graceful attitude and his expressive features, which he cannot but admire anew. Thus inspired with fresh courage, and after a twist or two at his moustache, he lights a cigar and cheerfully resumes his seat at the instrument. The result is the same as before. After a few more vain attempts he gives it up for the present, thinking he is not in the right mood and must wait for a more favorable moment. But I will not tire the reader with a long description how this composer (?) finally manages to have the piece done. Be it known that it is a most painful work, of which those only can form an idea, who have watched it. You would split wood, or work at a blacksmith's shop for a whole day than engage for an hour in this tantalizing occupation.

The Méditation élégante et mélodieuse has since been published—as usual in the most beautiful type—and is already in the hands of many of the lovers of musical tit-bits. It is spread over more than a dozen pages; but if we cancel the many repetitions, and, besides, divest it of all the superfluous flourish with which it is fringed and freckled, there will hardly remain music enough to cover half a page. The matter of the piece may be best defined in the language of the poet Percival, as "poor and vapid thoughts which peep from out the cumbrous ornaments that overload their littleness." Nevertheless, the composer himself is infinitely fond of it, and well he may be, considering the infinite pains it has cost him.

Now, what is it, that can induce a man, who by nature, by habit and occupation is destined to lead the gay, happy life of a butterfly, to take upon himself at times such a cross? Vanity and ambition are the principal motives which ere this have impelled inferior natures to perform miracles. As his style of playing is of the most showy, dashing kind, an exhibition of technical feats and artifices, intended to astonish the multitude,—so he avails himself of whatever may serve him to indulge this same unartistic propensity for display. He is not satisfied with the reputation of a skilful performer, too ambitious to leave the path of the composer untried. How much more the world would admire and applaud him with the laurel of the tone-poet wreathed around his brow!

It will be necessary here to mention that the lion-pianist is rarely without an aide-de-camp, who has, to take upon him a part of this Sisyphus like labor, to fill up certain gaps, and copy the illegible places, in the manuscript. This aid, it must be known, is also a pianist, but of inferior ability. He pretends that his real object in attaching himself to the virtuoso is to catch the secret of his exquisite touch or to receive occasionally a lesson from him, though he knows as well as any one that a lion-pianist considers giving instruction equal to taking an emetic. At first sight it would seem that he acted as the agent of the great performer, that he planned and arranged his concerts and transacted similar business for him; but this is rarely the case, for he is anything but a business man. The truth is, he has more time than he can usefully employ; besides he deems it a great distinction to be called the companion of "the man, whose every hand represents an orchestra." The lion in his turn, being an exceedingly sociable fellow, likes to have some one about him, with whom he can smoke, talk and laugh, and to whom he can relate his love adventures (we can easily fancy that the girls are wild with him). Thus the aide is invited to share the lion's champagne dinners and suppers, and sometimes to accompany him on a short professional tour. However, if we watch the twain closely, it appears doubtful, whether their connection is that of friend and friend, or of master and servant; for he, the aide, is despatched on all sorts of errands and often spoken to in a commanding tone. But then, the champagne suppers, the delicious havanas and the capital "sundries" compensate for a good deal of humble treatment and easily reconcile him; though there doubtless have been cases when he thought it better to "secede."

The career of a lion-pianist, we may add, so long as he is young, is an enviable one; but, when age approaches, he becomes an object rather of pity. The public have long since given him to understand that they are weary of his five or six pieces; and the critics told him that he plays worse than fifteen years ago, and by this time they are convinced he is a charlatan of the first order. The poor devil has now to atone for the folly, which both the public and critics committed in making a lion of him. They feel ashamed of having worshipped a false idol and now take revenge. Then the lion grows pensive and begins to reflect on his position, till he at last concludes to finish his erratic course and prepares him a home. If this thought prevails, we shall see him turn up again as the husband of a half decayed countess—or a princess even—himself a newly created baron and appointed chamber-virtuoso to her royal highness, the reigning grand-duchess of Reuss-Schleitz-Kimmelbach; which distinction was conferred upon him to raise him in some measure up to the level of his high-born bride. There are, however, many other forms, which he is likely to assume. He may come forth as publisher and dealer in sheet-music; or as the manager of an Italian opera company. But, not always does he succeed in suppressing his nomadic instincts. In that event we shall one day hear of him as concertising in remote, half-civilized countries, among the antipodes, where he treats the semi-barbarians to the same five or six pieces with which he has made all cultivated nations disgusted. As China and Japan are now open to foreigners he will surely not wait very long to wend his way thither in the hope of being once more the petted lion and enjoy the Indian summer of his former triumphs.

The Organ.*

NINETEENTH STUDY.—CLASSIFICATION OF PIPES INTO REGISTERS, WITH A GENERAL DIVISION OF THE REGISTERS OR STOPS OF THE ORGAN.

We have done nothing as yet but examine the pipes. This prosaic name, "pipe," becomes singularly poetical when the sonorous bodies, ceasing to be regarded as isolated objects, are put together into those many distinct classes of homogeneous qualities of tone in which we find each of the influences we have last considered, such as scale, form and material, harmoniously blended one into the other. For then, each of the various classes of pipes occupies an important place in the musical system of the divine instrument, and takes a new name, that of a register, or stop. The organ, considered as a mass of pipes, without division or classification amongst them, may be compared to a chrysalis, a creature shut up within a case, and without any apparent powers of acting,—it takes its wings and begins to show signs of life as soon as it has got its registers.

The necessity of putting pipes of the same quality of tone upon the same register is so obvious, that it seems almost superfluous to mention it. If, first of all, an open pipe, wood or metal, were put upon the sound-board, and then next to it a reed-pipe, so that in putting down the note C E G on the key-board, a wooden flue-pipe would speak; and in putting down the note D next to it, a reed-pipe would speak, and so on indiscriminately, and by jerks as it were throughout the register, without any regard to different qualities of tones, it is but too evident that the result would be an unendurable concert of ill-matched voices, even though the notes followed one another in the proper order of the scale. One pipe would emit a harsh sound, the next to it a weak, feeble sound; cries and sighs would be jumbled together, expressions of anger would be heard alongside tones full of a plaintive sweetness; in fact, there would be nothing but a series of sounds clashing one against the other, and each upsetting its neighbor in a way contrary to all right notions of musical unity and propriety.

The rule is, then, to put as many pipes of the same quality of tone in each register as there are notes upon the key-board. If this is not always done, that is to say, if there are not always as many pipes in a series of the same quality of tone as there are notes upon the key-board, this is because, in some cases, if pipes of the same quality were carried through the whole extent of the key-board, either above or below, the quality would become too feeble in volume in the upper notes, and too full in volume in the bass notes.

Each series of pipes of the same quality of tone is planted in a line upon the sound board, and each stop or register, for these tones are synonymous, obeys the action given to the small movable slide of wood, the mechanism of which has been already described. It is this slide, which is called a register, because it acts as a register or rule, to direct or control the wind in its way to the feet of the pipes. The same name is given to the knob which is fastened to it, and appears in front of the organ-case ready to the hand of the player. Upon this knob, or immediately under, is inscribed the label, which designates the special quality of tone that particular series of pipes will produce when, by means of this mechanical contrivance, the wind is brought into connection with them. If, for example, the player wishes to produce the effect of an orchestra, instruments of a bright and brilliant quality, he draws the knobs of the trumpet, the clarion, and the bombard, and he has at once upon his keyboard those stops or qualities of tone which, by their grand and solemn sounds, supply him with the effect he desires. If he wishes to produce the effects of sweet and soft-toned instruments, he pushes in these high-sounding registers and draws out the viol-da-gamba and stops with open pipes, wood or metal: and when the massive voice of the people intones that venerable plain chant, the origin of which may be traced up to the very first beginnings of Christianity, the player, who is the director of their song, draws out a number of stops which, combined together with a skill no less original than it is admirable, form, in fact, but one stop, under the common name of plein jeu. It is this stop which, while it calls to mind combinations in harmony the most ancient, is for this reason all the more suited to be the accompaniment to large masses of persons singing in unison.

The player, then, of the organ has at his disposal sounds of all kinds, and we can well understand how, for him as well as for the composer, it is most important he should have a profound knowledge of the resources which he has at his command, in order that he may know how to use them with the best effect on every occasion, either separately as solo stops, or when all are combined together in full chorus.

From the above description of them we shall have no difficulty in recognizing those distinct classes of organ stops: 1. Open flue pipes, wood or metal, called also foundation stops; 2. Musical or mutation stops; 3. Reed stops, which the Germans also call loud stops, starken Stimmen.

* From L'Orgue, sa Connaissance, son Administration, et son Jeu, by Joseph Regnier.

Joseph Staudigl.

Born April 14, 1807. Died March 28, 1861.

Staudigl enjoyed more especially a musical education. An innate taste for what is musically logical, and a zealous course of study for the improvement of his voice, were of the greatest service to him. He pleased, nay charmed, his audience by the unerring correctness of his musical accentuation, by the fervor of his musical declamation, by the well-calculated distribution and regular gradation of the various phrases and periods, by the unrivalled clearness of his musical exposition, and by his artistic repose, which nothing could disturb. He was, indeed, sometimes led away by the consciousness of possessing so fine a voice, and took undue advantage of it. He did not, it is true, go so far as to make the tone appear forced; but still, by dragging the time, merely to show off his own powers, he laid himself open to censure.

Staudigl neither possessed what is termed specific histrionic talent, nor was his education of such a kind as to enable him to make up for his early deficiencies by a course of after-study. His bearing was always slovenly; his dress was wanting in neatness and taste; and, indeed, his whole demeanor and appearance were marred by the absence of dignity and ardor. His features, although not without expression, could not express with sufficient rapidity any sudden change of feeling, any more than delicacy or tragic grandeur of soul; while, finally, his pronunciation always retained traces of the local Viennese dialect, disagreeable even in spoken dialogue. So many and such indisputable defects necessarily affected his performances in a highly prejudicial manner. He compensated, however, for a great deal by his remarkable power of conception and happy reproduction, which, partially resulting from instinct and partially wrung with great labor from adverse elements, was always realized in strictly musical outlines, admitting the dramatic element, so to say, only as a component part, among many others, of the musical expression.

The satisfaction given by almost each of Staudigl's impersonations, as a whole, as well as the greater or less musical perfection and the greater or less histrionic weakness of every separate part are readily explained by what has been said. Of his Figaro and Leporello, for instance, it might justly be asserted that the musical portion, taken by itself, was adequately rendered, while the attempt made to invest the parts with dramatic character was a failure. Leporello was a mere dull, stupid jester; while in Figaro, which Staudigl had studied with great care, and of which his conception was by no means incorrect, the subtlety or even sly keenness he intended to portray was never satisfactorily apparent. In the Italian barytone parts, such as Ashton in Lucia, Alfonso in Lucrezia, and Chevreuse in Maria de Rohan—which, yielding to that immoderate desire to sing which led him beyond the natural limits of his voice, he was fond of playing—the highness of the music sometimes prevented him from doing the latter full justice, while the outward bearing and appearance, which are of more account with Italian "tyrants" than the portrayal of inward motives, did not find a fitting representative.

But, while we see that characters partly of a subordinate description, and partly not adapted for Staudigl's artistic idiosyncrasy, were not represented in a completely satisfactory manner, his finest and most praiseworthy efforts were in far more difficult and important bass parts. Unfortunately, the restricted extent—which, it not increasing, is, at any rate, permanent—of our operatic repertory, limited Staudigl's field of action. It is, however, sufficient for us, if we would prove his excellence, to remind our readers of his Sarastro, Osmin, Rocco, Caspar, Jacob, Bertram, and Marcel. These were performances worthy even of a "dramatic" vocalist, parts on which the masters of old and new opera lavished their melodious treasures, and decked with grandly planned or delicately worked-out touches of character, parts which must be played, if due effect is to be given them. Now Staudigl gave them this due effect. Without any special histrionic powers, without a prepossessing personal appearance, but, on the contrary, with a great number of personal imperfections (already mentioned), he managed to present us with art-pictures, distinguished, as it is impossible to deny, for admirable conception and imposing, sure realization, the result of long and assiduous study. The effect he produced was grounded on a perfect knowledge of musical style, on an intimate acquaintance with the particular dramatic expression contained in melody and in musical compositions, and capable of being musically realized, as well as, lastly, on the consciousness that his task was a predominately, if not an exclusively, musical one.

Staudigl's own disposition, about which there was a certain mild phlegmatic character, naturally enabled him to appear with more advantage in the part of Sarastro than in any other part of his repertory. Anything lyrically sentimental also suited him, as is proved by the part of George in Bellini's Puritani. Even if we consider such comic characters as Osmin in Die Entführung, and Staudinger in the Waffenschmied, in opposition to those more delicately drawn, as being the ones best adapted to Staudigl's artistic taste, and therefore easier for him to play, there still remain the characters previously mentioned, as well as many others, the execution of which is beset by the most varied difficulties, and yet which were never so magnificently played by any one as by him. Thus, for instance, there was, in the first place, his Rocco, a wonderful conception, carried out, to the very finest touches of character, despite his defective pronunciation, with a degree of dramatic roundness and finish no actor could ever surpass, and that too with the most scrupulous and unvarying regard for the correct musical intonation; there was his Marcel, a fine picture of a bluff, good-hearted man; there was his Caspar, and there was his Bertram, both unmistakably, and yet so differently, marked by the demoniacal element. In Caspar we behold keen but vulgar wickedness; even the short passage, "Nur ein keckes Wagen ist's, das Glück erringt," was alone sufficient to prove Staudigl a master of dramatic singing, not to mention his rendering of the wild and boisterous drinking song or of the stormy vengeance-air. In Bertram, on the other hand, the supernatural character of the gloomy knight, though marked with great clearness, was never degraded into the likeness of a demon of melodrama. Staudigl gave great prominence to the knightly element, to which he imparted, by a certain air of crafty observation, a coloring obtained by no other representative of the art, not even excepting the wildly-genial Formes. Cool and temperate, but not the less deeply cutting, was the irony, the bold and deliberate contempt for every bitter feeling, while the boisterous passion, by which Bertram is distinguished from a mere cold and negative Mephistopheles, was brought out with fearful energy. But the distinguishing mark, and the peculiar excellence of this impersonation—an excellence, by the way, which can never be sufficiently praised—consisted in the fact that the dramatic accent was never strongly marked at the expense of the musical intonation, but that, on the contrary, the magnificent whole—as we cannot too often repeat—sprang naturally from a thorough comprehension of the musical exigencies of the part. Proofs of this are afforded by nearly every separate passage in it; for instance, "Ich lache," then "Robert, ja, dich lieb' ich mehr als mein Leben," and, above all, the unrivalled "Du hast's gewollt, du zarte Blume," &c.

Was it not by the irresistible power of fine singing that Staudigl charmed all opera-goers, as Edmund in Nicolai's Heimkehr? The assumption of this part—which, as the first step to Staudigl's unfortunate mania of singing music distressingly high for him, was certainly a most fatal one—proved indiscribably effective, on account of the dash and spirit he infused in it. Was it not the same power of song which enabled him to create so energetic an impersonation out of Rossini's Tell? We might name other parts; but our consideration of Staudigl as a histrionic singer has already led us very far, and we have still to speak of him viewed in a different light.

That Staudigl should, from time to time, have undertaken to instruct vocal aspirants, is simply a proof of his good nature. His lessons were never lucrative. His imitators, too, have not been fortunate, with the sole exception of the dilettante and Imperial vocalists, Panzer, who really has something of the master about him.

Staudigl was invariably most unfortunate in all operatic matters with the guidance of which he was mixed up. At any rate, the fact of his being stage-manager-in-chief could not effectually check the failure attendant on Pokorny's laudable speculation, which began so brilliantly. As a member of the committee at the Kärntnerthor Theatre, in 1848, he manifested the most active zeal without much greater success; while, as stage manager-in-chief there, under Holbein, he certainly reaped no laurels, although, as is usual in such regions, it was impossible to find out what the stage manager might do, as well as what he really had done and had neglected to do.

Staudigl was always distinguished for his talent as a singer of sacred music—as distinguished, at least, as the partially defective management and organization of the Imperial Chapel at Vienna would allow him to be. His thorough musical education proved here of great use to him, and he was far from paying any respect to the tolerably general prejudice that sacred music should be sung without expression.

This last remark calls to our remembrance the admiration universally and justly entertained for Staudigl as an oratorio-singer. In the concert-room the singer, in his black dress-coat, with his music in his hand, together with the narrative form in which recitative runs, all necessitate a kind of expression somewhat different from that employed in the operatic style. When, however, narrative rises to animated description; when prayer assumes a more than ordinarily pressing and urgent tone; when some deeply-moving situation is depicted, and music is to be the interpreter of the singer's continually-changing emotions, a greater amount of vivacity in words and tone, and a highly dramatically-objective expression, properly so called, may be justifiable even in oratorio. The most reassuring guarantee that Staudigl would, in most cases, not overstep the proper limit, was afforded by his own moderation as an individual. It is therefore far from astonishing that many persons should maintain that oratorio was more especially suited to his talent; but in saying this, and in awarding more than due praise to the oratorio-singer, they were plainly guilty of injustice to the theatrical singer. It was more especially in oratorio that his mode of delivering recitative showed how much of his inspiration he drew from the exciting influence of the stage.

After oratorio comes the concert-room, with its airs, its ballads and its songs of all sorts—an endless field in which much that is good is mixed up with a great deal that is worthless and absurd. For a long series of years did Staudigl labor in this branch of his profession; and our sketch would be incomplete if, after having described the histrionic singer, as well as the master in the sacred and semi-sacred style, we were not also to mention the world-renowned song singer (Liedersänger). In his mode of singing songs, we again come across all the good qualities and some of the defects we have already mentioned, namely, beauty of tone, correctness, warmth of expression, and clearness of exposition, but at the same time touches of the Viennese dialect a partial dragging of the time, for the purpose of showing off his voice. His conception was certain, intelligent, and calculated for dramatic effect, such as was not adapted, perhaps, to the alla camara expression of the "Lied," taken in its original acceptation, but admirably suited to the enlarged proportions which it has now assumed.

There was sometimes, it is true, just cause for complaint that, in the choice of the songs as well as in the other details of his professional labors, Staudigl was not sufficiently penetrated by true artistic feeling, but, on the other hand, we must, in mere justice to him, recollect that the period when his powers were in their prime was the period of "virtuosity," a period when our musically-renowned Vienna was in a state of musical incapacity. Had Staudigl, whose mind was for five years plunged in darkness, been able to take part in the great change for the better which came over musical matters during the years of his affliction, it is very certain that he would have valiantly aided in rebuilding the new temple of music in Vienna; for, though he had undoubtedly sung rubbish enough in his day, he not only sang good music well, but was fond of singing it, and greatly pleased whenever he had an opportunity of doing so.

John R. Paine, the American Organist.

The Berlin Voss'sche-Zeitung, of April 21st, contains the following notice of a young organist and composer, with whose name the readers of the Journal of Music have already been made acquainted:

If now-a-days more than one of our organ-players of no small pretensions would tremble at the thought of being tested by Mattheson's 'Exemplarischer Organistenprobe,' still there are some masters of the instrument before whom Mattheson redivivus would respectfully uncover his head. True, their number is small, and the harvest of young men in this, as in all fields where we seek pure musical talent, is remarkably thinly sown. So much the more gratifying is it, therefore, to find such a talent engaged, with hearty zeal and indefatigable practice, in acquiring thorough command of the grandest of instruments—that for which Sebastian Bach alone composed a series of works extensive enough to occupy an organist for life. And such a talent we found on Friday last in a young musician, John R. Paine, of Portland in the United States. He played before an invited audience a series of pieces by L. Thiele, Sebastian Bach, and Mendelssohn, in which he exhibited a perfect mastery over the mechanism of the instrument, and an almost equal power over the peculiar difficulties which make a satisfactory performance of Bach's works so rare an event. Mr. Paine's style is clear and smooth, and his pedal playing is superb. These qualities he exhibited in a marked degree in the first movement of Sebastian Bach's organ trio in G. To give the three voices (for two manuals and pedals) clearly and with equal individuality, and yet to produce them as a beautiful whole, and in the joyous character intended by Bach, is one of the most difficult tasks that can be given to the organist. Equally successful was the performance of the other pieces, especially Bach's fugue in G, the majestic character of which could not have been brought out with a more free and dramatic expression by any one except the very greatest masters.

Mr. Paine also exhibited himself as composer in the best light. He played variations of his own upon the Old Hundredth psalm tune, a choral in universal use in America (in England, too, for that matter) and concert variations upon Haydn's Austrian Hymn. These pieces were so happily laid out in form that their interest constantly rose to the close; they proved his sound contrapuntal knowledge; his great taste in the combination of the stops of various color; and the author's possession of a fine fancy, from which much may be hoped and expected. In but a passage or two—in the first and second variations upon the choral—did it seem to us that Mr. Paine had not yet fully emancipated himself from the school. As we learn, he is a pupil, both on the organ and in counterpoint, of our unsurpassable organist and contrapuntist, A. Haupt. Hence we the more rejoice to greet in this young foreigner, who, now returning to his native land, will be a proof equally distinguished and honorable of the high state of German (musical) art, and the greatness of one of that art's ablest representatives.

Mr. Paine is at present in London, and we learn will soon be furnished with an opportunity of appearing before a London audience, both as an executant and as a composer.

EASTER CELEBRATIONS AT BETHLEHEM, PA.—I want to tell you about the Moravian exercises during Passion Week which I had the pleasure of attending.

A distinguishing feature of the Moravian Cultus is the love of music which everywhere exhibits itself in the beautiful forms and ceremonies of their religion. Great pains is taken to form a correct musical taste, and the study of it is begun very early in life. Reared from infancy among the delightful associations of tone, enjoying the instructions of competent masters, and acquiring a knowledge of the productions of the best composers, they become able to separate the chaff from the wheat, and this accounts for the pure harmony that distinguishes the Moravian choral service. A great portion of their music was composed for the church and exists only in MSS. This is of the highest order, and is, for the most part, written in full orchestral score.

The exercises of Passion Week are very impressive, and attract great numbers of visitors from all parts of the country. They begin on the Sunday preceding Easter with a recital of that week's life of our Savior, beginning: "And as he went, a very great multitude spread their garments in the way, and others cut down branches off the trees, and strewed them by the way." This is continued throughout the week, the Acts of each day being read, and a number of beautiful German chorals are introduced at certain interesting points of the narrative, expressive of such sentiments as the congregation is supposed to feel.

The exercises on Good Friday are particularly interesting. On this day, some of the most solemn scenes of Holy Writ are passed in review and every remarkable passage in the sufferings of Christ is accompanied by a suitable hymn sung during the intervals. In the morning and afternoon the choir sang two fine anthems one of which was from Gregor, the other I was not familiar with, most probably one of their MS. selections. In the evening, the choir and the orchestra of the church rendered three of their German anthems in a most beautiful manner. The full-toned organ, the sweet, plaintive tones of the violins, the subdued melody of the flutes, the soft, dream-like obligato of that most beautiful toned of all stringed instruments, the violoncello, and the voices of the choir blending together so harmoniously, and according so perfectly, impressed me with feelings that I shall never forget.

On Saturday afternoon, the general Love Feast was held, and printed odes, part in German, and part in English, were distributed throughout the congregation. As soon as the bell ceased ringing, a quartette of trombones began playing a number of chorals which floated through the air entrancing every listener. On this occasion the music performed were selections of the highest classical order. First, the Kyrie eleison from Beethoven's Mass in C; then a fine anthem "Holy Redeemer," by La Trobe; a selection from Spohr's "Last Judgment," and another very fine selection from their MSS.

On Easter morning at four o'clock the sweet tones of the trombones were heard greeting the sleeping inhabitants with an Easter choral. At half past four we were wending our way to the church where service similar to what I have already described was gone through with, until sun-rise, when the congregation, preceded by the orchestra, proceeded in procession to the grave-yard, where the Liturgy of the Resurrection was gone through with. Here was a scene not soon to be forgotten! The sun was just rising, and the little clouds floating about were streaked with faint rays of light. The robin and the lark were pouring forth their morning hymns, which was the only sound that disturbed the solemn stillness of the moment. Then the voices of all present accompanied by the orchestra, arose upon the air in hymn, while the impressive words of the Litany, and the outpouring of the harmonious themes to which the trombones are so well adapted, and the entire services, summoned up thoughts which will ever be held in remembrance.—Cor of Easton Times.

ANCIENT MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.—Our Paris correspondent writes:—"Among the instruments collected by M. Clapissin, and now purchased by the French government for the Museum of the Conservatory of Music, are many of great interest in an artistic and archeologic point of view. One of these is a harpsichord, with two key-boards, dated 1612, but the work of several artists and different epochs. The body of the instrument dates from Louis XIII.; the stand from Louis XIV.; contains panels by Teniers and Paul Bailly. Among the spinets are an Italian one of the time of Louis XIV., with ornaments of engraved amber, and garlands of flowers, Cupide by Poussin; another, of the reign of Francis I., in ebony, richly inlaid with ivory, with the inscription Francisci Portalopis Veronen Opus, 1623; and a third, of the sixteenth century, in marquetry, the corners of the key-board being ornamented with caryatides exquisitely carved in box-wood.

"A small piano, made at Vienna, of the time of Louis XIV., in the form of a harp, has a sounding-board of gilt wood and Chinese lacquer, ornamented with Venetian looking-glass, beautiful paintings in Martin varnish, and inlaying of turquoises. Among the harps is one that belonged to the Princess de Lamballe, bearing her name inside; among the lyres, one which belonged to Garat, bearing his initials, and enriched with paintings by Prudhon. There are theobes in ebony and ivory; guitars in tortoise-shell, ivory and marquetry; mandolines and mandores of all nations; odd-looking instruments played by turning a handle; violins of all dates and countries, several of them in tortoise-shell, beautifully inlaid; specimens of all sorts of string and wind instruments, showing the starting point and gradual progress of the instruments now used in orchestras.

"The collection also contains a numerous gathering of nondescript instruments of various style and form, many of them of a most extraordinary character, showing how much abortive industry has been devoted to the endeavor to create new species of musical instruments. Immense patience and research have been employed by the collector in getting together the assemblage, unique in its way, and of great value to those who make a study of the history of music."—N. Y. Eve. Post.

WHAT MAKES THINGS MUSICAL.—"The Sun!" said the Forest. "In the night I am still and voiceless. A weight of silence lies upon my heart. If you pass through me, the sound of your own footstep echoes fearfully, like the footfall of a ghost. If you seek to break the spell, the silence closes in your own words, like the ocean on a pebble you throw into it. The wind sighs afar off among the branches, as if he were hushing his breath to listen. If a little bird chirps uneasily in its nest, it is silenced before you can find out whence the sound came. But the dawn breaks. Before a gray streak can be seen, my trees feel it, and quiver through every old trunk and tiny twig with joy; my birds feel it, and stir drowsily in their nests, as if they were just murmuring to each other, 'How comfortable we are!' Then the wind awakes, and tunes my trees for the concert, striking his hand across one and another, until all their varied harmonies are astir; the soft, liquid rustlings of my oaks and beeches make the rich treble to the deep plaintive tones of my pines. Then my early birds awake one by one, and answer each other in sweet responses, until the sun rises, and the whole joyous chorus bursts into song to the organ and flute accompaniments of my evergreens and summer leaves; and in the pauses countless happy insects chirp, and buzz and whirl with contented murmuring among my ferns and flower-bells. The sun makes me musical," said the forest.

What makes things musical.—"Storms!" said the Sea. In calm weather I lie still and sleep, or, now and then, say a few quiet words to the beaches I ripple on, or the boats which glide through my waters. But in the tempest you learn what my voice is, when all my slumbering powers awake, and I thunder through the caverns, and rush with all my battle-music on the rocks, whilst, between the grand artillery of my breakers, the wind blows its wild trumpet-peal, and the waters rush back to my breast from the cliffs they have scaled, in torrents and cascades, like the voices of a thousand rivers. My music is battle-music. Storms make me musical," said the sea.

What makes things musical.—"Suffering!" said the Harp-strings. "We were dull lumps of silver and copper-ore in the mines; and no silence on the living, sunny earth is like the blank of voiceless ages in those dead and sunless depths. But, since then, we have passed through many fires. The hidden earth-fires underneath the mountains first moulded us, millenniums since, to ore; and then, in these last years, human hands have finished the training which makes us what we are. We have been smelted in furnaces heated seven times, till all our dross was gone; and then we have been drawn out on the rock and hammered and fused, and, at last, stretched on these wooden frames, and drawn tighter and tighter, until we wonder at ourselves, and at the gentle hand which strikes such rich and wondrous chords and melodies from us—from us, who were once silent lumps of ore in the silent mines. Fires and blows have done it for us. Suffering has made us musical," said the Harp-strings.

ANALYSIS OF BIRD-MUSIC.—A correspondent, whose letter is dated "Oak Valley, Mid-Marc," has favored us with a long and pleasant account of the aspects of nature in the spring time, as they appear around him, from which we are happy to give the following extract. The remainder of his letter would hardly be appreciated in a political and commercial newspaper like the New York Evening Post:

"The golden day is past. Another opens, untired with its new future. It bears the product of its predecessor—the birds which the 'sweet south' brought on its golden wing. Do the birds arrive at night? for we behold them first in the morning, though I have seen thrushes arrive at nightfall. It may be they escape our notice, which, in the morning, is attracted by their singing. And they seem not to regard the fatigue consequent upon their long flight; but, true to their industrious instinct, chime the note of arrival at the first peep of dawn. I thus became aware of the presence of the blue-bird, whose song was the first sound that fell upon my ear early in the morning, half mingling with my dream ere I was well awake. It had just arrived, the old familiar note—faint, not from fatigue, but the tranquility of the bird's nature seen also in its flight. It is a spiritual bird, with a celestial hue, warbling in our springs, and building often about the habitations of men, seeking a home in the ark of the martin, which it enchants with the circles of its gentle flutterings.

"All welcome the birds. The first messenger note springs a thrill of joy in the winter-bound heart. Childhood leaps up at the sound; the maiden claps her hands; and age feels its youth at the accustomed surprise.

"Different from the blue-bird is the phoebe, a plain domestic, with its dual note, yet piping the cheeriest of any, because bearing the happiest burthen in its song, 'Spring day! spring day! spring is coming!'

"One thing I have always observed with pleasure—it is the variety in the bird choir. No two species sing alike—none badly. Take your position in a grove or meadow, and mark the tone—which gives you the character of the bird—and see what diversity there is in that. You can see a resemblance to words in some notes. The happiest expression is on the wing; the most plaintive on water. We love a bird best when it sings among grasses and in the shrubs and tree branches, or in deserted dwellings—at least the pensive-minded and the meek do. Some birds seek an elevated position to sing—the groundbird its stake; the robin its tree; the bobolink sings every where, in the grass, upon a twig of slender reed, but most rapturous on the wing. The crow is a music-spoiler; he has no devotion in his song, no uplifting of the bill, but a rapacious cry for plunder.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—It was no wonder that the revival of I Puritani (April 20th) should create excitement among the frequenters of the opera. There were many reasons. Signor Tiberini in Arturo was to essay his second part, one indeed, in which Rubini alone, of all tenors, had made a lasting impression, although Signor Mario looked and acted the cavalier nobleman infinitely better. Mad. Tiberini-Ortolani, too, was to make her first appearance at the Royal Italian Opera in Elvira; and Herr Formes, after several years' absence, again to exhibit his splendid voice and dramatic talents in the part of Giorgio—undertaken for the first time, we believe. No wonder, then, that the stalls were anxious and the boxes eager. Another cause of attraction might be cited in Signor Ronconi, who resigned his old part of Giorgio, the music of which was too low for him, for that of Riccardo, in which he was perfectly suited, and felt at his ease. So much for expectation. The performance, if it fell something short of what was anticipated, was excellent in the main. Signor Tiberini sang even more skilfully, and exhibited a more thorough command of his voice as Arturo than as Ferdinando. His singing in the quartet, "A te, o cara," was in its way perfect; and in the duet, where the Puritan Colonel stops Arturo, as he is about to effect the escape of the Queen, he exhibited the finest declamatory powers and a largeness of style for which we had not given him credit. It seems, however, that Signor Tiberini could not have been in his best voice on Saturday, as he evaded the high passage in the aria, "Ella e tremante," in the last scene, whereby he disappointed sundry of his admirers. He made amends, nevertheless, at the second performance on Tuesday, and sang the famous passage of Rubini with infinite ease and perfect intonation. The debutante, wife of Signor Tiberini, is, no doubt, as our readers have guessed, the lady-like and light-voiced Mlle. Ortolani, who so much pleased the Academies of Her Majesty's Theatre some few years since in this very part of Elvira, creating quite a furor in the polacca, "Son vergin vezzosa," and winning distinction by her skill, both as vocalist and actress. Mlle. Ortolani is not Grist nor Bosio, but herself, and will doubtless do the theatre real service in many characters for which she is well suited. Her voice still vibrates as of old, but she has gained strength or facility, and betokens decided improvement. In places where she had not to form her notes, such as the opening movement of the aria, "Qui la voce," and some cantabile bits in the first finale, she sang charmingly and with much grace, and won universal praise. Herr Formes had been laboring under indisposition for some days previously, and was hardly up to the mark. He showed, nevertheless, that the power and depth of his voice remained unimpaired by his transatlantic trip, and that his energy and feeling were as striking and superabundant as ever. Indeed it was generally remarked that the voice of the great German bass was more rounded and mellowed by time, a matter of congratulation to his numerous admirers. The music of Giorgio is not quite in Herr Formes' line, nor does it lie altogether within his register, his voice being far deeper than that of La blache. His finest efforts were in the duet with Elvira (act 1, sc. 2), and the grand duet with Riccardo. "Suoni la tromba," in which he and Signor Ronconi declaimed so vociferously that they might have been heard—if not quite at Bologna, as Rossini wrote of Tamburini and Lablache, but at Boulogne. Signor Ronconi is more at home in Riccardo than in Giorgio which we are glad to see he has resigned, as the music was too low for him. His performance of Riccardo is a remarkable one, historically speaking, the best by far since Tamburini, and the music of Bellini is thoroughly congenial to his real Italian style and method.

After the opera Mlle. Salvini appeared in the ballet divertissement, Les Amours de Diane, and achieved great success in sundry striking and original pas.

The first performance of Rossini's Guillaume Tell, which was to have taken place on Thursday night was postponed until Monday, in consequence of the indisposition of M. Faure.

GRISI AND MARIO.—The report that these popular singers have rejoined the Royal Italian Opera, is now verified.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Twenty hearings would not suffice to make the general public thoroughly comprehend a work so extraordinary as Beethoven's Mass in D, which was repeated on Friday week. To the Society especial thanks are due for affording an opportunity of hearing a composition so little known, or likely to be known, its difficulty and exceptional style placing it beyond the means of any other body of executants. While protesting against the alterations that have been effected (having unbounded faith in Beethoven) we must compliment Mr. Costa for the energy and perseverance conducting to a result so highly satisfactory. Band and chorus entered thoroughly into their task, and as the Missa Solennis has twice attracted an attendance in no way inferior in number to the crowds who usually flock to the better known masterpieces, we have but little doubt but that the next season it may be repeated, and eventually become familiarised to the public, although it can never be as well known as the oratorios of Handel or Mendelssohn. Mada. Radersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, with Messrs. Sims Reeves and Lewis Thomas were again the soloists. Handel's Israel in Egypt is announced for next Friday.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The fourth concert, on Monday, April 29th, was attended by the largest audience of the season. The selection was as follows:—

PART I.—Sinfonia in C minor, No. 1 (Mendelssohn); Aria, "Un'aura amorosa," Cosi Fan Tutte (Mozart); Solo, contrabasso (Mayseder); Overture in C major (Beethoven).

PART II.—Sinfonia in F, No. 8 (Beethoven); Recit. and aria, "Thus my cherish'd love," Jessonda (Spohr); Concerto, violin, in A minor, No. 5 (Molière); Duetto Il Conte Ory (Rossini); Overture, Anacron (Cherubini). Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett.

A column might be written about such a programme, more especially as the general character of the performance was quite on a par with its variety and excellence. Nevertheless, our crowded space will admit of but very few remarks. Mendelssohn's symphony was played to perfection. Additional interest was attached to this, as the work which first introduced its composer to the Philharmonic Concerts, and, indeed, to England. It is one of the freshest and most vigorous of his earlier productions; and, though classed in his own catalogue as "Symphony No. 13," the first of his published symphonies for the orchestra. Thus, among other things withheld by those who have the superintendence of Mendelssohn's MSS., there are no less than 12 symphonies, any, or all of which, if only half as good as the one in C minor, should be brought to light forthwith. The scherzo, as it now stands, is an abridgement of that belonging to the famous octet arranged expressly for the Philharmonic Society, and a clear foreshadowing of the magical fairy music in A Midsummer Night's Dream. The execution of Mendelssohn's symphony; of that of Beethoven in F—the bridge that conducts from the "second" to the "third" style of the great "Tone-poet"; of the overture in C major (Op. 115) by the same master (for which again the musical world is indebted to the Philharmonic); and of Cherubini's familiar dramatic prelude, were further proofs of the judicious discipline exercised by Professor Bennett, and of the highly efficient materials he has to work with. The palmiest days of the Philharmonic—when it stood "alone in its glory"—could hardly furnish an instance of a more admirable performance than that of the symphony in C minor.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The programme of the eighteenth concert, in the instrumental part, was taken from the works of Mendelssohn, and included—quintet in B flat (executants, MM. Vieuxtemps, Rice, Doyle, Schreurs and Piatti); Presto Scherzando, in F sharp minor, for pianoforte alone (Mr. Charles Hallé at the instrument); grand sonata in D major (op. 58), for pianoforte and violoncello (played for the first time); and (also first time of performance) the players being Mr. Charles Hallé, M. Vieuxtemps, Mr. Webb and Signor Piatti. After the sonata, Mr. Charles Hallé and Signor Piatti had to appear on the platform. A finer specimen of the master than that with which the concert closed could not have been presented, and few left their seats until the last notes of the quartet in B minor had finished. The grand air "In diesen heil'gen Hallen," from the Zauberflöte, and a song from Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor, displayed to advantage the deep and powerful voice of Herr Hermanns, who appeared at these concerts last season.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—Mlle. Titiens, who made her first appearance as an oratorio singer, created something much stronger than a merely favorable impression, her debut being a complete success. Mlle. Titiens is a mistress of the art of enunciation, her words being clearly articulated and correctly accented, which is so much the more noticeable as her experience of our language must be necessarily limited. With the power and quality of Mlle. Titiens' voice the public is already familiar, and we have no doubt that in the new line she has chosen the German songstress will become as great a favorite as she is on the lyric stage. To attempt any description of Mr. Sims Reeves's singing in The Creation would be superfluous; suffice it that he was in magnificent voice throughout,—that he sustained the whole of the tenor music by which the oratorio was a decided gainer, and that his delivery of the recitative "In splendor bright," and the air "In native worth," was wholly irreproachable, while in the concerted music his voice rang out with a clearness and beauty that charmed all hearers. In the first and second parts Herr Formes contributed his services as principal bass, and the value of so splendid an organ and so weighty a style of delivery, may be easily imagined. To Mad. Radersdorff and Mr. Stanley fell the music of our first parents (Part III.), and both were in the highest degree satisfactory. After the oratorio the national anthem was sung, Mlle. Titiens taking the first and last solo verses. The duet between the barytone and bass (Mr. Santley and Herr Formes) in the other verses, was beyond our comprehension. There were 13,000 present.

THE SISTERS MARCHISIO.—The gifted and celebrated sisters Carlotta and Barbara Marchisio, after the great sensation they have created in Paris, are achieving a series of brilliant triumphs in the French provinces and in Belgium. We find in the Brussels journal, L'Independance Belge, accounts of the debut of both sisters in that city. They first appeared in the Sonnambula, Mlle. Carlotta sustaining the character of Amina, while Mlle. Barbara, with a true artistic feeling, supported her sister by taking the secondary part of the heroine's mother, to which she gave new interest and importance. Their next appearance was in the Travatore, in the characters of Leonora and Azucena, in which last part Mlle. Barbara produced an immense effect by her powerful acting, her beautiful contralto voice, and her perfect style and execution. The above journal describes the public as being enchanted, and says that there never had been such a performance of this opera in Brussels.—Illustrated London News.

Musical Correspondence.

PARIS, MAY 3, 1861.—A pamphlet has just appeared entitled Richard Wagner et Tannhäuser à Paris. It is by Charles Baudelaire the translator of Edgar A. Poe's works. It seems to be a defence of the German composer against the ungenerous attacks of French press. If it possesses more than the mere merit of a propos I shall speak of it later.

The musical season is drawing to a close, the Conservatoire has given its last concert. The fragments of the Damnation de Faust by Hector Berlioz are spoken of as having attracted much attention.

At the Italiens Mad. Penco has appeared as Norma; no novelties are spoken of either here or at the Grand Opera, which continues to give the Huguenots.

At the Opera Comique we have had Salvator Rosa, represented for the first time last Tuesday, April 30. This is an opera in three acts by Duprato, words by MM. Eugène Grangé and Henri Trianon. The libretto presents a charming series of incidents, it is in itself a touching piece worthy of the composer. The artist who contributed to the success of Salvator Rosa were, Crosti, Warot, Lemaire, Nathan, Paliati, Madame Lemercier and Mad. Saint-Urbain.

It is to be remarked that of late three pieces of 1832 have been revived. Of these one is well known to the American public, La Tour de Nesle is rather more known in the United States than in France though it always enjoyed great popularity. The piece is given at the Porte Saint-Martin with the display of scenery that may be expected from this stage for fairy spectacles. There is a slight change even to admit of all the prestige of scenery. There is a solemn entry of the king into the old, old streets of his good city of Paris. He is on horseback under a dais between the Queen and Buridan, also on horseback. The people follow in crowds, there are soldiers and a numerous cortege.

It is a lesson in the history of the middle ages. The provost of Paris, the various guilds, the university corps, the Parliament, the peers of the realm with their pages—all with their respective emblems form a curious, entertaining spectacle. The clarions sound, the King, surrounded by his court takes his seat, the stage presents a most picturesque group when suddenly other men and women rush in, mariners from the port de la Grève, who, with more beauty than art-truth execute a charming ballet. In this appear Epinosa and Mad. Montplaisir. Beyond this La Tour de Nesle in the drama as we all know it. At the especial wish of M. Gaillardet, the name of Alexander Dumas figures as collaborateur.

Of other old dramas may be mentioned Atar Gull which has met with a legitimate success. The Fenestrelles de l'honneur by M. Aug. Vaquerie of which I mentioned the failure has given rise to several pamphlets on the present state of the dramatic art in France. It is expected that M. Vaquerie's piece will be presented again at the Odeon under more favorable circumstances. F. B.

The programme was, with one exception, made up of German pieces, the audience of a majority of young ladies and gentlemen. Both went very well together. The audience admired the Germans (next to the performers of course) and the Germans (we can speak for one of them at least, whom we know to have been present) admired both the audience and the performers. Mutual admiration-society, is it? Well we confess, we do admire youth. "In juvenile delectus." There is something refreshing and fascinating in youth and we enjoyed the delightful influence.

The Glee Club was especially happy in its selections and was encored after every piece if we remember rightly. And right well did they acquit themselves both in their pieces on the programme and those sung in answer to the enthusiastic calls for more. The Pierians would have increased the effectiveness of their performances by altering their instruments to a pitch somewhat more uniform. However, their pieces were well practiced together and played with spirit. They also received several encores. The liberality of the Glee Club was manifested by a medley of patriotic and other airs, "thrown in" after the 13th number of the programme. Altogether it was a festive and gay evening, furnishing new evidence that the liberal Arts still furnish at our venerable yet ever young Alma Mater, and that there are some at least among her sons who beside their other studies find time and inclination to devote themselves to the production of the "sweet concord of sounds."

May the PIERIAN SODALITY and the GLEE CLUB continue to flourish. *†

MRS. J. H. LONG'S CONCERT.—A concert complimentary to this lady was given on Saturday evening last at the rooms of Messrs. Hallett & Davis. Mrs. KEMPTON and Miss WHITEHOUSE assisted with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club and Mr. CARL PETERSILEA as pianist. Mrs. LONG was in unusually fine voice, so, too, were Mrs. Kempton and Miss Whitehouse, and the vocal portions of the programme were admirably rendered by the three ladies. We regret not to have heard the first part of the programme, but learn that Mr. Petersilea performed very creditably the Sonata by Weber. Liszt's Concerto Paraphrase requires a degree of power and unerring facility beyond what he yet possesses. A large audience was in attendance. The following is the programme:

PART I.

1. Quartette, in E flat.....Mozart
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
2. Aria, "Ab mon als".....Meyerbeer.
Mrs. Long.
3. Grand Sonate in C, op. 24. (first time).....Weber.

CAMBRIDGE.—The detachment of the battalion of the College students now on guard at the State Arsenal embraces some of the best of the singers of the college, who make the neighborhood resound on these pleasant moonlight nights with the brightest of the gems of German song. The Turkish Drinking Song, Integer Vitae, the Sword Song, and other choice pieces for men's voices, including many of Mendelssohn's four-part songs, we have heard admirably sung there in a style that would do no discredit to the famous Orpheus Club. It is pleasing to observe the steady progress of the art of Music in the University, since it has become a regular study, and no little credit is due to the efforts of Mr. L. P. Homer, the instructor in this department.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—Our city and suburban readers will not forget the concert of this evening, which commences the new series of evening concerts. The programme is an excellent one.

Musical Chit-Chat.

TANNHAUSER IN PARIS.—Tannhäuser, the modern German Opera, par excellence, has suffered a most decided defeat at the hands of the Paris public. Notwithstanding the august presence of both Emperor and Empress during the first two representations, the genteel audience manifested their disapprobation by vehement hissing, but principally by a merriment which to the author must have been very provoking. After the third performance which took place on a Sunday evening when the house is mostly filled by persons from the middle classes, who might reasonably be supposed to be unprejudiced, the piece was withdrawn. As the bonus of the author was stipulated at 500 francs for each performance, of which half went to the translator of the book, Mr. Wagner has realized the sum of 750 francs.

The reader will recollect that Tannhäuser was brought out at the express command of the Emperor. Rumor said it was the penalty which the Emperor had to pay to the Princess Metternich, wife to the Austrian ambassador, for a lost bet. The Princess showed herself, at any rate, a zealous partisan of her countryman. When the storm in the audience first broke out, she and her suite from a prominent box tried very hard to turn the tide. But it only caused the hissers to turn towards her. She left the theatre before the curtain fell. When she passed down the corridor, one of the marshals of France, meeting her, said, "Ah, Madame, to-night you have taken a most cruel revenge for Sollerino." The story is good. The Frenchman says now, Je tannhause, instead of Je m'ennuie.

The Germans console themselves, as well they may, that France has never yet seen the greatness of Shakespeare, nor acknowledged the genius of Goethe and Schiller, nor understood Gluck, Mendelssohn, Weber, and Schumann, and is therefore not very likely to be charmed by an opera which, book and music, is at least as peculiarly Teutonic as Weber's Freischütz or Spohr's Jessonda. Besides, Wagner the writer had much damaged the cause of Wagner the composer. If Mr. Wagner, instead of heralding his views as the salvation of the lyric drama and his works as the beginning of a new musical era, claiming precedence of all the great masters whom France worship, if, instead of all this he had relied solely on the inherent power of his music, his opera might have fared better. To be sure, the legend of Tannhäuser, which to the German mind has deep significance and many fine poetic traits, has nothing fascinating to the Frenchman. It is the difference of nationalities more than anything else which will forever prevent the acceptance by the Paris musical public of the Tannhäuser as the great work which it really is.—Leipzig Signal.

HONOLULU.—The dilettanti of the Sandwich Islands have established a Philharmonic Society, which, not satisfied with rendering plain classical music, has gone into the grand opera business. Startling, as it may appear, Verdi's Trovatore has been performed in Honolulu. His majesty, Kamehameha, who fortunately possesses a very fine voice, took the role of Manrico, and his royal spouse filled that of the Gipsy Azucena.

MUSICAL SOIREE.—Last evening Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte gave a musical soirée at her residence in Hancock Street, to which the parents and friends of her pupils, including several distinguished amateurs, were invited, forming a brilliant society. The programme was very interesting, consisting of a duet by Von Weber, nine solo compositions played by the youngest pupils of the school, Duet Sonata by Mozart, Nocturne by Gutmann, Allegretto and Moonlight Sonata by Beethoven, Allegro by Mendelssohn, Home, Sweet Home by Thalberg, Nocturne by Chopin, Sonata Pathétique by Beethoven, and Duet by Von Weber. The performances of these difficult compositions by youthful pupils was a complete vindication of the excellence of the class system of pianoforte instruction which Mlle. Gabrielle de la Motte has been teaching in this city for the past five or six years. When we heard girls eight or nine years old, taught in classes, playing one of Weber's duets, and the solos which followed, and playing them well, and young ladies of from thirteen to sixteen interpreting with such intelligence, purity and vigor the other portions of the programme, we were more than satisfied with the results of a system which we have so often commended and advocated. The unequivocal approbation of the refined and competent critics who were present at Mlle. de la Motte's last soirée, justifies the confidence which the public have placed in her abilities, and guarantees her continued success.—Evening Transcript, May 17.

MUSIC IN LEGISLATIVE HALLS.—Music hath charms for our Legislature. A majority of the representatives have musical ears, good voices, and know how to tune them aright, either for the grand old chorals or the patriotic songs that are just now sung in halls and churches, on the streets and in the drawing-rooms, at work benches and in the schools. The members lifted up their voices yesterday forenoon, in melodious song, and again in the afternoon, after adjournment. They did the "Star Spangled Banner" in splendid style, as if the banner were advancing at a charging step upon the enemy; "America" was given grandly; "Old Coronation" majestically, and "Auld Lang Syne," as a closing exercise, soothingly. And why should they not sing, these legislators? Let them break forth in song. They have done good works for the old Bay State; they have endorsed the spontaneous uprising of the people; given a strong and willing helping hand to the government of the Union, and their aid, without stint or mercenary calculation, to uphold the honor of its flag.

The members review their labors with satisfaction; they look upon the mailed hand of the general government raised to strike all enemies to its peace, prosperity and integrity, and they see through the cloud that now envelopes us, peace once more establishing its benignant sway; returning prosperity and the hum of productive industry for the harsh notes of war. Do they not do well to sing, and make the old Representatives Hall vocal with their gladness, and the venerable cod which has overlooked the discussions of half a century, a participator in their joyful hopes for the future? If the "chivalry" are disposed to ridicule psalm singing Massachusetts, we bid them remember that the "Old Ironsides" of Cromwell, from whom some of us, at least are descended, were valiant in battle and "mighty men of war," notwithstanding that, before they engaged in the conflict they sang the psalms of David. Men who put their trust in God, the justice of their cause and keep their powder dry, are not to be encountered with impunity.—Atlas and Bee, May 23.

A HINT TO MUSICIANS.—See the effect of a long piece of music at a public concert. The orchestra are breathless with attention, jumping into major and minor keys, executing fugues, and fiddling with the most ecstatic precision. In the midst of all the wonderful science the audience are gaping, lolling, talking, standing about, and half devoured with ennui. On a sudden there springs up a lively little air, expressive of natural feeling, though in point of science not worth a half-penny. The audience all spring up, every head nods, every foot beats time, and every heart also; a universal smile breaks out in every face; the carriage is not ordered; and every one agrees that music is the most delightful, rational entertainment that the human mind can possibly enjoy. In the same manner the astonishing execution of some great singers has in it very little of the beautiful; it is mere difficulty overcome, like rope-dancing and tumbling; and mere difficulties overcome, as I have before said, do not excite the feelings of the beautiful, but the wonderful.—Sydney Smith.

Had I children, my utmost endeavors would be to breed them musicians. Considering I have no ear, nor yet thought of music, the preference seems odd; and yet it is embraced on frequent reflection. In short, as my aim would be to make them happy, I think it the most profitable method. It is a resource which will last their lives, unless they grow deaf; it depends on themselves, not on others; always amuses and soothes, if not consoles: and of all fashionable pleasures it is the cheapest.—Horace Walpole.

Il Barbiere di Siviglia.

It is interesting to read the anecdotes of the first productions of celebrated works, the changes made in them in accordance with the experience of their first effects, and the manner in which they were received. We translate some of the incidents attendant upon the production of the now celebrated Barber of Seville.

The overture was originally composed in 1814, for Aureliano in Palmira, then changed to Elisabetta, regina d'Inghilterra, both of them serious operas, and was afterwards attached to the Barber.

The air which Bertha, the duenna, sings, is nothing but a Russian contra-dance, which was in vogue in Rome at that time. Rossini is said to have introduced it in compliment to a captivating Muscovite lady. Certain passages of this buffo air re-appear in the allegro, and in the fine cavatina of Malcolm in la Donna del Lago.

The motive of the allegro of the trio fine Zitti, zitti, is borrowed from the bass air sung by Simon, in Haydn's "Seasons." Simon sings it in C, while Rosina, Almaviva and Figaro sing it in F.

Signora Giorgi-Righetti mentions many circumstances regarding the first production of the opera which have the value of coming from one who shared in its performance. Sterbini was the author of the libretto, and when it was known that Rossini was to rewrite the work which Paisiello had made famous, his enemies endeavored to injure him by talking of it everywhere as a contemptible thing to do. This was the merest nonsense, as the lyrical dramas of Metastasio had all been, dozens of times set to music by as many composers. Paisiello was no stranger to these intrigues. A letter of his was shown to Rossini, in which he charged a friend of his in Rome to make every exertion to ensure its failure. However this may have been, on the day of its first representation at the Argentina, the enemies were at their post, and the friends, somewhat disheartened at the recent failure of Torvaldo, did not exhibit any great warmth of support. Signora Giorgi-Righetti says that Rossini was weak enough to allow Garcia, whose ability he greatly admired, to replace the air sung under Rosina's window with a Spanish melody of his own; thinking that, as the scene was laid in Spain, this might give a local coloring to the work. But the public sentiment rendered this an unfortunate thing.

Almaviva's guitar had not been tuned, and Garcia had to tune it on the stage. A string broke, which the singer was obliged to replace; and in the mean time the laughter and hisses had become general. The song was foreign to the Italian taste, and was badly received, while the pit began to hum over Spanish floritures. After the introduction came Figaro's cavatina. The prelude was at first listened to; but when Zamboni entered with another guitar, a shout of laughter went through the audience, and the hisses made such a noise that the aria was not to be heard. When Rosina appeared on the balcony, the public, who admired the lady, was ready to applaud her air; but when it heard only the words; Segui, o caro, deh segui così, they were the signal of a new outbreak. The duet of Almaviva and Figaro was accompanied by shouts and hisses, which completely drowned it; and the work seemed to be an utter failure.

Finally Rosina appeared and sang the cavatina. the youth, and beautiful voice of Signora Giorgi-Righetti, joined to the favor which she enjoyed among the Romans, combined to procure for her a brilliant success. Rossini arose from the piano, bowed, and turning to the cantatrice, said in a low voice:—"Oh natura!"—"You may give it your thanks," replied Signora Giorgi, "for without it you would never have left your seat."

But this happy moment was of short duration, for the hisses recommenced at the duet between Rosina and Figaro. All the hisses in Italy seemed to have met in the theatre, and the music was utterly lost in the noise they made. When the curtain fell, Rossini turned to the audience, shrugged his shoulders, and clapped his hands. The public was touched at this contempt for its opinion; but no mark of disapprobation was returned. It revenged itself at the second act, not a note of which could be heard. Rossini remained calm throughout, and left the theatre as quietly as though it had been the work of a stranger. When Garcia, Zamboni, Botticelli and Signora Giorgi-Righetti went to his rooms, after changing their dresses, to console him for his failure, they found him sound asleep.

The next day he wrote the beautiful cavatina Ecco ridente in cielo to replace Garcia's unfortunate air. Garcia sang it the same evening at the second performance. Rossini hastened to prune from his work everything which might be justly condemned, then went to bed and pretended to be sick, that he might not be obliged to officiate in the evening. The Romans went the second time with altered dispositions, and desired to hear the work to which they refused to listen the evening before. This procured the triumph of the composer; for it was impossible that a people so musical should not appreciate the beauties profusely spread through this delightful work. The silence of the audience was only broken this time by applause; still there was no enthusiasm. But the success grew at each representation, and finally became a transport of delight. In Rome, as elsewhere, there were connoisseurs who at once comprehended the merit of the work, and went to Rossini to compliment him on its excellence. This change of fortune and opinion did not astonish him; he was as sure of success on the evening of its first reception as he was a week after.

It is rather singular that the first representation of the Barber at Paris was a repetition of the Roman failure. The same cause produced the same effect; for Paisiello's work was there again opposed to that of Rossini. It is true that Mme. Ronzi de Begnis did not inspire the part of Rosina, for which she was not fitted. By a singular fancy, the public at once demanded Paisiello's Barber, and nothing could have more contributed to Rossini's success. Paër, who was troubled regarding the young rising maestro, Paër, director of the Théâtre-Italien, appeared to yield to the importunate request of the public, which, perhaps, he had instigated. He hastened to produce Paisiello's opera, not doubting of the success which awaited it; but the result was the opposite of what he expected. The traditional power of his music had lost its vitality; nobody knew how to sing it in its pristine simplicity. Besides this, the form was old-fashioned; there were too many airs and recitatives; concerted pieces were rare, and the instrumentation meagre. It was an utter failure. Rossini's work was resumed, and possessing, as it did, all the advantages which its rival lacked, it enchanted the whole public. Mme. Fodor had assumed the part of Rosina, and the representation was given with a perfection yet unequalled. Garcia and Mme. Fodor were the models of Almaviva and Rosina; Pellegrini, a gay, intelligent Figaro; de Begnis an excellent Basilio; Graziani, a vivacious and malicious Bartolo. To give an idea of Garcia in this rôle, which he made entirely his own, I will say that Rubini always seemed to me a mediocre Almaviva, when I remembered the bold, marked rounded accents of Garcia's full voice. Who can give us that sonorous avalanche of notes when the exasperated Count curses the unfortunate troupe of musicians:

Ah! maledetti andate via,
Ah! canaglia via di qua?

It was sublime!

(There must have been some trifling difference between such a performance and the buffoonery to which we Bostonians are accustomed in this scene.)

Rossini had written several portions of his opera, when Sterbini brought him several pages of verse. "There is considerable," said he, "for Figaro's entrance; but you can take what you want, and leave the rest. Rossini immediately began to hum as he read. "I will not suppress a verse, not a word," said he, "they shall all move to the clarinets." After a second reading, he sat down to the piano, and sang Largo al factotum, with its instrumental coloring. "Bravo! perfect!" cried Sterbini. "Yes! that may be made into a pretty good cavatina. I will keep it a few days in my head, and give it a little polish, and write it out afterwards." "Not so! you shall write it out at once, just as it is. I want it just so. The diamond sparkles enough as it is. We must secure it for fear of losing it."

Like very many other chefs d'œuvre of the human mind, the Barber, unrecognized at first, depreciated and condemned, has become one of those universal favorites which never lose their charm and rank among the foremost efforts of musical genius.—Boston Musical Times.

A NEW NATIONAL HYMN.—A committee of prominent citizens of New York, consisting of Gulian C. Verplanck, Charles King, Hamilton Fish, George Wm. Curtis, Richard Grant White, Luther Bradish, John A. Dix, Moses H. Grinnell and others, announce that a prize of five hundred dollars will be awarded for a national hymn, which must be, not a war song, but purely patriotic; to consist of not less than sixteen nor more than forty lines, exclusive of a chorus or burden, which is regarded as essential, and to be of marked rhythm and popular melody. For the words and music from the same hand, five hundred dollars will be paid, or a gold medal of that value will be awarded. For the hymn alone, or for the music alone, (if original), two hundred and fifty dollars will be given.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Ah, do you still remember. F. Woolcott. 25

A very pleasing sentimental song, requiring but little range of voice and moderate practice on the piano.

The song of the absent one. Karl Rader. 25

A melodious parlor song.

Love thy mother, little one. G. F. Root. 25

A cradle-song or lullaby of very simple construction, perfectly in accordance with its intent and purpose. Melody and harmony are nevertheless striking and show the clever pen that has written so many popular melodies.

On to the conflict, on! J. W. Turner. 25

One of the many soul-stirring songs which the impending war has given rise to. It will, no doubt, have a fair share of the patronage now bestowed on patriotic songs.

His hand upon the latch. R. Denton. 23

Charming words, describing the young wife's happy anxieties while expecting the husband's return from his daily toil, until "his hand is upon the latch." The music is not less fine.

Instrumental Music.

America. Transcription. F. Beyer. 25

A full and telling arrangement of the National Anthem, "My country, 'tis of thee." It is one of the well-known and comprehensive collection of the National Airs of all Countries, edited by Beyer.

When the swallows homeward fly. Transcribed. Ad. Baumbach. 35

A fine arrangement with which the composer has evidently taken great pains. Its general excellence will ensure a large circulation for it notwithstanding the many arrangements of the same air which are now in the market.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, with symphonies and accompaniments, by Sir John Stevenson, and characteristic words by Thomas Moore. With a portrait. Price, $1.50; in cloth, $2.50; cloth, full gilt, $3.00.

In a very neat, convenient, and durable form we have in this volume the fine old Melodies of Ireland wedded to the charming ballads which have, more than any other of his works, immortalized the name of Moore, and made it a familiar household word throughout the civilized world. There has been, and always will be, a peculiar charm about the music and the poetry of this work, and though the expression in reference to a new book, has become somewhat hack-nied that "no library is complete without it," we may venture to say, that used in connection with this elegant edition of "Moore's Melodies," it will come to each of our readers as a very truthful declaration. There are many editions of these Melodies published in this country, but this is the only one in which the words are accompanied by the music, and here we may mention that with Moore the words and the music are one. "So intimately," says an English writer, "were they united in his mind, that the sight of the songs crowded together in one volume unaccompanied by music notes inflicted on him positive pain."

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Charlatanism in Music.

II.

THE FASHIONABLE CONDUCTOR.—SKETCHED BY BENDA.

This charlatan is of quite modern origin. His rise commenced with the decline of the classical school, which is now so much lamented. In proportion as the means were made the end, in proportion as external show and stunning noise took the place of true music,—our friend gained ground, till finally we see in him the personification of what may be called the clap-trap art. At present—thank Heaven!—he is still an exotic plant in America, but in feudal Europe, in the fashionable capitals, as Paris, Berlin, London, he is an institution, an indispensable ingredient to metropolitan high life. He ministers to the wants of the blasés, whom he feeds with musical confectionary, with polkas, gallops, or fragments from Italian operas. But this is not his object. According to his advertisements he gives cheap concerts with an orchestra of fifty performers—for the sake of improving the public taste! May be that the public taste is an object of his earnest solicitude; but in quite a different sense; for, surely, as soon as a better taste and judgment are diffused among the public they will no longer listen to his music. Our friend is too shrewd not to know this; therefore, he exerts himself to the utmost to keep the popular taste down. He is passionately fond of his baton, particularly as it affords him nightly an opportunity to glorify himself, to show himself off. A more self-conceited fool was never born. The show-bills announce in big letters that the concert this evening will be given under the personal direction of Monsieur le maître de chapelle. Though he is never missing; though he conducts every night in person, yet the public must be put in mind of the grand fact.

Now let us go to see him. The musicians are already at their desks waiting for the chief. There he comes! Look, how carefully his hair is curled! How matchless his cravat, his vest, his dress coat, in short, everything down to his patent-leather boots! He advances up to his stand. What a graceful bow! How pleasantly he smiles! (Believe it who may; it has often been said that many go to his concerts merely to see him make that capital bow). Presently he seizes the bâton, looks about him if the performers are ready and gives the signal to strike up.

Monsieur is too polite to conduct with his back turned to the audience, as small conductors do, who suppose their business to be alone with the players, and accordingly front the latter. Oh, no! This would not only imply a breach of etiquette but would mar the whole affair in many respects. The musicians are grouped so that he stands quite prominently out from among them, his front to the public, who now may enjoy the full unobstructed view of his glorious figure. The piece played is an opening march on operatic airs composed by the chapel-master himself. Monsieur fights the air terribly with his stick, throwing a savage glance now to the player on his right, now to that on his left, or behind him, who may be a little too slow or too fast. Anon he puts on an air of approval, he nods, he is pleased with the performance; he begins to smile; he looks as if he were moved by the music, as though he were lifted and carried along by the gentle waves of harmony. In fact, his face expresses far more than the music. It is finished. Monsieur throws down his baton and retires quite fatigued as it seems. He draws his embroidered and perfumed handkerchief—which he has his own way of displaying—to wipe the perspiration from his heated forehead. He then sits down on a sofa in the background of the stage, but so that he can see the audience and be seen by them; the latter is of infinitely more consequence. Occasionally he takes his lorgnette and eagerly looks about as if to search for some acquainted face. Of course, he takes it for granted that all present have come merely to see and admire him; especially the ladies, whose heads he supposes he has completely turned the wrong way.

The programme, made up of the highest kind of music, as intimated above, culminates in a grand potpourri, also arranged or composed by Monsieur himself. In this piece he has recourse to all sorts of mechanical contrivances in order to produce the most striking effects, from which it takes his auditors frequently a good deal of time to recover. The potpourri is to represent, musically, some scene or scenes from common life, as detailed on the programme. Sometimes it is a railroad catastrophe which is being unfolded to our ears. The train is ready to start. We hear the rushing of the escaping steam, the bell, the rattle and clatter of some dozen cars, dashing along with lightning speed. Suddenly the alarm whistle sounds, but too late; the catastrophe, a general smash-up, is inevitable.

At another time it is perhaps a chase to which Monsieur treats his listeners. The stag is flying by, the hounds are close behind him; and such capital barking! But the best joke is when he represented how light grew out of chaos. A few minutes before the commencement the gas is lowered so that an almost total eclipse reigns all over the house. The music begins with low, dissonant, long-drawn chords, resembling the growls of bears and wolves before supper. The audience seem fairly frightened, when, all of a sudden, a clear, full, triumphant major chord resounds, played by the whole body of instruments as loudly as possible,—and simultaneously with it—a great conductor!—appears the dazzling blaze of some three hundred restored gas flames. Thus it grew light.

While these jokes are passed off, which, as before observed, form the climax of his programmes, Monsieur is perfectly excited. Besides his baton he sometimes takes his foot, his head, or both his arms, to indicate the time. Occasionally he calls out in an angry voice to the drummer, or to the man who has charge of the barking machine, to play with more spirit. His chief attention, however, is directed to the audience; he is anxiously watching what effect tricks produce on them, expecting every moment that a storm of applause will break loose. And, indeed, he has not to wait very long before they give vent to their delight in the most vociferous acclamations. Yes, applause never fails him. He is firmly settled in the favor of his auditors. Both the public and the press extol him and promulgate his fame. He is called the prince of leaders, the Napoleon of conductors. But this shall not prevent us from opening their eyes and showing their pet to be in fact the prince of charlatans, the Napoleon of musical quacks. How such an individual comes to command an orchestra composed of the ablest performers, as they generally are, would be a puzzle, if we did not know that shrewdness, cunning, arrogance, impudence, recklessness and similar qualities, have frequently risen to a position which for true virtue it was impossible to obtain. He is indefatigable in aping the fashionable world. He employs as his hairdresser the first Parisian coiffeur, who counts his customers chiefly among lords and barons; and so in similar things. When, for instance, it has become the fashion among the aristocracy to learn Spanish, Monsieur quickly engages the most fashionable master of languages and learns Spanish too, and then takes good care to make it known among his friends.

Though most of his musicians are far better artists than himself, he treats them as if they were ten times his inferiors; he often rules as a despot, especially at such times as his receipts are good and he is able to pay them their salaries promptly, knowing that it is difficult for an orchestra performer to find lucrative employment. He places his men under heavy fines for any breach of good conduct, while he himself continually violates those rules. Thus, for instance, a member is fined so much for coming a few minutes too late to the rehearsals; but he, our Monsieur, is rarely if ever punctual and cares nothing if the whole orchestra are waiting for him ever so long. It has frequently happened that he has ordered a rehearsal to take place, say at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and the musicians were punctually each at his place; but where is our master, where is the conductor, where is Monsieur? A deputation is finally dispatched to his residence (at the most fashionable hotel in the city) to see what has befallen him; perhaps he may be sick. The deputation returns with the information that they found the master still resting on his laurels which he freshly gathered last night, where a new potpourri of his, with many new tricks, was performed. They found him still sleeping. On opening his eyes he told them he had been invited to a late supper at Lord Horse-neck's, and that, my Lord having urged him so much to drink he could not resist the temptation of taking a glass too much of his Lordship's choice wines and in consequence he felt terribly sick in his head and unable to rise.

On the other hand he has proved the most unscrupulous swindler, who instead of money has paid his musicians with promises, till, finally he has escaped to parts unknown, leaving some fifty young men looking in vain about for means to pay their board.

But the avenging Nemesis sometimes overtakes him when he is least aware of it. I have seen a whole orchestra rise as one man against such a charlatan conductor after they had patiently borne his despotic sway for a long time; as sometimes a whole country with an inexplicable unanimity after long and patient sufferings, shakes off the yoke of a tyrannical prince and establishes itself as a republic. They ordered Monsieur to get him hence, chose one of their members for a conductor and continued the concerts much to the benefit of the public taste and the art in general. Monsieur seeing that it was impossible to regain his position and being unable to appease the cries of his seven children for their daily bread came back later and begged to be received as a common member of the society. His fate excited sympathy so that it was proposed by some to give him a situation as kettle-drum player of whom the society just then stood in need. However, on mature reflection it was resolved not to engage him by any means, since from his intriguing spirit it was reasonably to be feared he would leave no opportunity unused to disturb the harmony of the society, secretly undermine it and ultimately cause its dissolution, in order to establish his autocratic sway again.

He went about for a while dressed in the same fashionable style as formerly, still boasting of his many acquaintances among the aristocracy. It is true he was sometimes seen with the before mentioned Lord Horseneck; but this is easily explained when we remember that my Lord was not only a great lover of music but himself the composer of several Grand Quadrilles which frequently, under a fictitious name, were performed by our Monsieur at the concerts. Far from envying him such acquaintances we sincerely wish his Lordship may not so soon cast him off, but exert his influence to save him from the brink of destruction to which he is hurrying on rapidly. And so we will leave him.

RICHARD WAGNER, in Re himself and "TANNHÄUSER."

"TO THE EDITOR OF —."

"Paris, 27th March, 1861.

"MY DEAR FRIEND.—I promised I would, some day or other, give you a full account of everything relating to the Paris Tannhäuser business. Now that this has taken so decided a turn, and that I am enabled to obtain a comprehensive view of everything connected with it, it affords me a kind of satisfaction to come to a conclusive opinion of the whole from a calm narrative, written as if for my own perusal. None of you can, however, form a correct idea of the true state of matters, without my touching upon the real motives which which induced me to go to Paris in the first instance. Let me, therefore, start from this point.

"After having been prevented, for a space of nearly ten years, from refreshing myself, if only periodically, by witnessing some good performances of my dramatic compositions, I at last felt irresistibly impelled to think of settling in some place where in time it might be possible for me to enjoy that living contact with my art which was so necessary for me. I hoped to be able to find such a place in some retired nook in Germany. In the summer of 1859 I made the most earnest appeals to the Grand Duke of Baden—who, with the most touching kindness, had previously promised that my latest work should be brought out at Karlsruhe under my own direction—to use his influence, so that, instead of making only a temporary stay, I might be allowed to take up my permanent residence in his dominions, since I should otherwise have no course left open to me than to proceed to Paris, and settle there. The fulfilment of my request was—an impossibility!

"I proceeded to Paris in the autumn of the same year, still calculating upon the performance of my Tristan, for which I thought I should be summoned to Karlsruhe on the 3d December. I believed, that when the work had once been brought out under my own superintendence, I might then trust it to theatres of Germany. The prospect being able to pursue the same course with all my subsequent works was enough for me; and, such being the posture of affairs, the sole charm Paris possessed for me was the fact, that from time to time I might hear an admirable quartet or a first-rate orchestra, and thus at least keep up a refreshing connection with the living organs of my art. But everything was suddenly changed, on the receipt of letters from Karlsruhe, informing me that the production of Tristan there had proved impossible. My painful position immediately suggested to me the notion of inviting, for the following spring, some well-known and clever German singers to Paris, so that, with their assistance, I might get up, at the Italian Opera, the model-performance, which I so much desired, of my new work. To this performance it was my intention to invite the managers and stage-managers of such German theatres as were well disposed towards me, thinking that by the plan I should obtain the result I had hoped to achieve by the performance of Karlsruhe. But, as it would have been impossible to carry out the plan without including the Parisian public, it is necessary that I should endeavor to enlist their sympathies for my music beforehand. It was with this object that I gave the three concerts in the Italian Theatre. The highly gratifying result of these concerts, as far as success and approbation were concerned, could not, unfortunately, further the principal enterprise I had in view. I became fully aware of the difficulties besetting an enterprise of the sort, while the impossibility of obtaining the simultaneous attendance of the German singers I had selected compelled me to abandon my design.

"While, thus hemmed in with difficulties on every side, I was again casting my eyes borne down by heavy care, towards Germany, I heard, to my great astonishment, that my position was warmly discussed, and my cause kindly advocated, at the court of the Tuileries. This kind interference on my behalf I owed to the extremely friendly feeling of many members of the various German embassies in the capital, a feeling of which I had previously been in complete ignorance. Matters went so far that the Emperor, having heard a most flattering account of my work, generally known as Tannhäuser, from a German princess whom he particularly respects, gave orders for the immediate production of the opera at the Académie Impériale.

"I cannot deny that although, in the first instance, highly gratified at this unexpected testimony of the success of my works in circles from which I had for so long kept personally so far aloof, I soon began to look forward with great anxiety to a representation of Tannhäuser in the theatre mentioned; for who saw more clearly than I did that this great operatic theatre had long been estranged from every earnest artistic tendency; that requirements very different from those of dramatic music had asserted their supremacy and that opera had become simply an excuse for ballet? The truth is, that of late years I have had very many applications to bestir myself about the performance of one of my works in Paris; I never thought, however, of the so-called Grand Opera, but—for an experiment—rather of the modest Théâtre Lyrique. This I did for two reasons; at the latter theatre no particular class of the public leads the taste of the rest, and—thanks to the poverty of its resources—the ballet, properly so-called, has not yet grown up to to be the centre around which everything else in art revolves. The manager had, however, been obliged to give up all idea of a performance of Tannhäuser, after having repeatedly considered it of his own free will, principally because he could find no tenor equal to the difficult task of supporting the principal character.

"Now, at my very first interview on the subject with the manager of the Grand Opera, I was given to understand that the most necessary condition to ensure a successful performance of Tannhäuser was the introduction of a ballet, and that, too, in the second act. I did not perceive the full import of this condition until I declared it was impossible for me to stop the action of the second act, above all others, by a ballet, in every respect meaningless; but that, on the other hand, a particularly appropriate pretext for a ballet was afforded by the voluptuous court of Venus, in the first act, where, when I first conceived the drama, I had myself thought it impossible to dispense with dancing. In fact, I was excited by the idea of strengthening this part of my work, a part which was unmistakably the weakest point in my original score, and I drew up an elaborate plan by which the scene in the Venusberg would be rendered a most important one. The manager peremptorily rejected this plan, and told me plainly that, in the performance of an opera, he had not only to consider the ballet itself, but so to arrange matters that it should come on in the middle of the evening, for it was not until that time that those subscribers to whom the ballet almost exclusively belonged entered their boxes, as they usually dined very late; a ballet executed in the beginning of the evening could not, therefore, I was informed, satisfy these persons, as they were never present during the first act. The same and similar explanations were subsequently repeated by the Minister of State himself, and all chance of a successful result represented as so dependent on my fulfilling the conditions in question, that I began to think I should be obliged to throw up the whole affair.

"While I was reflecting more seriously than ever on returning to Germany, and anxiously looking around for some spot where I might be enabled to produce my latest works, I was most favorably impressed with the value of the Imperial order, for it placed at my disposal all the resources of the Grand Opéra, and authorized me, in the most unreserved and unconditional manner to make whatever engagements I might deem necessary. Everything required by me was instantly carried into effect, without the slightest consideration of the cost, and an amount of care, of which before I had not the slightest idea, was bestowed upon the mise-en-scène. Under such unusual circumstances, I became gradually more and more impressed with the belief that I might possibly behold a complete, nay ideal performance. The notion of such a performance of one or other of my works, no matter which, had seriously engrossed my thoughts for a long time, in fact from the time of my withdrawal from our own operatic theatre. An opportunity which had never before been anywhere placed within my reach, was now most unexpectedly offered me in Paris, and that, too, when no exertions on my part had been able to procure me any favor at all approaching it on German soil. I frankly confess that this thought filled me with an ardour I had not known for a long time, and which a certain bitterness, mingled with it, only served, perhaps, to augment. I now saw nothing save the possibility of a completely beautiful performance; and, absorbed by my constant and anxious care to realize this possibility, every cause for distrust lost its power of affecting me. 'If I can only attain what I am justified in considering possible'—I said to myself—'what do I care about the Jockey Club and their ballet?'

"From this moment, all my attention was devoted to the performance. No French tenor, I was told by the manager, could be found for the part of Tannhäuser. Having been informed of the brilliant talent of the youthful tenor, Herr Niemann, I pointed to him, though, it is true, I had never heard him myself, as the representative of the principal part, especially as he spoke French easily. An engagement, most carefully brought about, was concluded with him, at a great sacrifice. Several other artists, such, for instance, as the baritone Morelli, owed their engagements solely to my desire to secure their services for my work. As for the rest, I preferred certain rising and talented young artists—because I thought I might form them more easily to my style—to some first-rate singers already favorites here, because their too forward manner exercised a disturbing influence on me. The amount of care, totally unknown among us, with which the rehearsals at the piano was conducted, astonished me, and under the intelligent and delicate guidance of M. Vauthrot, the Chef du Chant, I speedily beheld our efforts attain a rare degree of maturity. I was especially gratified at observing how young French talent gradually understood my work, and warmed into a love of its task.

"In this way, I myself felt a new affection for this old work of mine. I once more went through the score with the greatest care; I completely remodelled the scene with Venus, as well as the ballet-scene preceding it; and more especially endeavored to adapt the vocal music most accurately to the words of the translation.

"I had devoted my whole attention to the performance, and disregarded every other consideration; but now my anxiety commenced as the truth flashed upon me that the performance would not be distinguished by that degree of invariable excellence I had expected. It is a sad thing for me to tell you in what respects I, at first, found I was doomed to disappointment. The most serious circumstance was, decidedly, that the singer of the difficult principal part grew more and more desponding the nearer we approached the night of the performance. The flattering hopes I had cherished during the course of the pianoforte rehearsals, sank lower, the more we had to do with the stage and the orchestra. I perceived that we were declining to the level of an ordinary operatic performance, and that all those expectations, which soared far above this, would necessarily remain unfulfilled. Viewed in this light, in which at the beginning I naturally had not viewed it, the only thing that could elevate such an operatic representation was wanting; I mean some highly talented individual, already an established favorite with the public, while I came forward with nearly all novices. I was finally, most disheartened by the fact that I could not succeed in withdrawing from the usual conductor the direction of the orchestra, and undertaking it myself, for this would have enabled me to exercise a great influence on the spirit of the performance; and the fact of my having been thus compelled, with sorrowful resignation (for I had not been allowed to withdraw the score as I desired), to consent to a tame and spiritless performance of my work, is still a cause of real grief to me.

"Under these circumstances, I was almost indifferent as to the manner in which my opera would be received; the most brilliant success would not have induced me to be many times present at its performance, so far was I from being satisfied with it. But, concerning the real character of its reception, you have hitherto, it strikes me, been purposely kept in the dark, and would, therefore, act very wrongly, were you to form an opinion unfavorable to the general Parisian public, however flattering that opinion might be to us Germans. I still think, on the contrary, that the Parisian public are distinguished for very estimable qualities, among which may be reckoned great quickness, and a truly large-hearted love of justice. The fact of an audience, an entire audience, to whom I was personally a complete stranger; who had been told, day by day, by the papers and idle prattlers the most absurd things about me; and who were the objects of all sorts of attempts to prejudice them against me—maintaining my cause repeatedly, for a quarter of an hour at a time, by the most exhausting manifestations of approbation, against a clique, must, even were I the most indifferent being in the world, fill me with feelings of the warmest description. But an audience actuated, as every dispassionate observer immediately perceived, by the most violent prejudice against my work, had been assembled on the night of the first performance, thanks to the zealous care of those who had the sole distribution of the places, and who rendered it almost impossible for me to introduce my few personal friends. If to this audience you add all the members of the Parisian press, who are officially invited on such occasions, and whose hostility towards me their notices alone are sufficient to prove, I really think I am entitled to speak of a great victory, when I inform you, in the strictest truth, that there was louder and more unanimous applause at the performance of my work, although that performance was far from being too spirited a one, than I myself ever heard in Germany. Several of the musical critics, or rather all of them, who were the real leaders of the opposition, which, at first, was, perhaps, nearly universal, exerted themselves to the utmost to prevent the public from listening to my work, but they were evidently alarmed, towards the end of the second act, lest they should be compelled to witness a complete and brilliant success. They, therefore, had recourse to a plan of bursting out into horse-laughter at certain cues, which they had agreed upon among themselves at the general rehearsals and by this means produced considerable confusion at the conclusion of the second act, for the express purpose of weakening the effect of a strong manifestation at the fall of the curtain.

The same gentlemen had also observed, at the general rehearsals, which I was unable to prevent their attending, that the success of the opera depended, in a great measure, upon the mode in which the third act was performed. An admirable scene, by M. Despléchin, representing the Valley of the Wartburg in the light of an autumnal evening, exerted, even at the rehearsals, on all present a charm which strengthened the proper feeling necessary for the following scenes, and, indeed, rendered it irresistible. As regards the artists, these scenes were the gem of the whole performance. The procession of Pilgrims was sung and placed upon the stage in a most admirable manner; Elizabeth's prayer, rendered by Mlle. Sax with touching and expressive perfection; and the fantasia to the evening star, given by Morelli with elegiacal tenderness, introduced so happily the best part of Niemann's performances, namely, the account of the pilgrimage, which always obtained for him the warmest marks of approbation, that it appeared probable to my most bitter opponent that this third act would prove exceptionally successful. It was, accordingly, this very act that the individuals in question attacked most virulently, endeavoring, by outbursts of violent laughter, as pretexts for which they were obliged to seize on the most trifling things, to prevent anything like the necessary devout, calm feeling reigning among the audience. Not led astray by these repulsive demonstrations, my singers neither allowed themselves to be discouraged, nor was the audience to be restrained from paying the most sympathetic attention to their performance, often rewarded with loud applause; at last, the artists having been called on with the most boisterous signs of approbation, the opposition was kept completely under.

"That I was not wrong in looking upon the result of this evening as a complete victory, was proved by the behavior of the public at the second performance, for it was then evident who were the opponents against whom, I should, in future, have exclusively to contend. I refer to the Jockey club, which I have a right to name, since, the public themselves did so openly, by crying out "à la porte les Jockeais." The members of this Club, whose right to be considered the lords and masters of the Grand Opera I need not inquire into more nearly, and who, by the absence of the usual ballet at the time of their entrance into the theatre, that is to say, about the middle of the performance, thought their dearest interests grievously injured, had discovered, to their horror, that, at the first performance, not only had Tannhäuser not failed, but had actually been a triumph. From that moment it became their business to prevent this balletless opera from being presented to them evening after evening. With this object, they had, on their way from dinner to the Opera, purchased a number of dog whistles, and such like things, which, immediately after the entrance of these gentlemen, were employed against Tannhäuser in the most ingenious manner. Previously, that is to say, during the whole of the first act and up to the middle of the second, there had not been the slightest sign of any further opposition, and the most continuous applause had accompanied, unopposed, those portions of my opera which had first gained favor with the public. From this moment, however, no demonstration of satisfaction was of any avail. It was in vain that the Emperor himself, together with the Empress, proved, for the second time, his favorable opinion of my work; the condemnation of Tannhäuser had been irrevocably pronounced by those who regarded themselves as the masters of the theatre, and who all belong to the highest aristocracy of France. Until the conclusion of the performance, all the applause bestowed by the public was accompanied by whistles and flageolets.

"In consequence of the total inability of the Management to do aught against this powerful club, and of the evident disinclination of the Minister of State himself to become involved in any serious dispute with its members, I felt I could not expect the performers, who had served me so truly, to continue subjecting themselves to the horrible excitement so unconsciously inflicted on them (of course for the purpose of making them throw up their parts). I gave the management notice that I withdrew my opera, consenting to a third performance only on condition that it should take place on Sunday, that is to say, on a non-subscription night, by which plan the subscribers would not be irritated, while the house would be rendered available for the general public. It was not considered advisable to comply with my wish that this performance should be advertised in the bills as the 'last,' and I could only inform my acquaintances personally that such was the case. These precautionary measures were, however, insufficient to allay the anxiety of the Jockey Club. The body fancied it perceived, in this Sunday performance, a bold demonstration, attended with danger to its interests, since, if the performance were an undisputed success, the hated work might then easily be forced upon the members. No one had the courage to believe in the sincerity of my assertion, that, in case of such a success, my withdrawal of Tannhäuser would only be the more certain. These gentlemen, consequently, gave up their usual amusements on the evening in question, and returning, once more fully equipped to the theatre, repeated the proceedings which distinguished the second performance. The indignation of the public, who were to be completely debarred from following the opera, rose to a pitch, which, I was assured, was perfectly unprecedented, and the social position of these elegant rioters—which it would seem is altogether unassailable—was, perhaps, the only thing that saved them from personal violence. Let me state at once that, astonished as I was at the unruly behavior of the gentlemen of this club, I was equally struck and touched by the heroic exertions of the public, properly so called, to see justice done me; and that it would never once enter my head to enter my head to entertain the slightest doubt of a Parisian audience, provided it assembled on neutral ground belonging to itself.

"My official notification of the withdrawal of the score, placed the Management of the Opera in a position of really great embarrassment. The Management acknowledge, openly and emphatically, that in the case of my opera they see one of the greatest possible successes, for they do not recollect another instance of the public declaring themselves with such warmth the par-tizans of a work opposed by a particular set. They think they are sure of exceedingly high receipts from Tannhäuser, the house having been already let for several nights in advance. They are continually receiving information of the increasing indignation of the public, who find themselves prevented, by a party of most limited numbers, from calmly listening to and appreciating a much-talked-of work. I also hear that the Emperor is still most kindly disposed in the matter, while the Empress wishes to declare herself the patroness of my opera, and obtain guarantees against any further disturbances. At this moment, there is being circulated among the musicians, painters, artists and authors in Paris, a protestation addressed to the Minister of State, and referring to the unbecoming proceedings at the Opera House. It is, as I have been informed, signed by a large number of persons. Under these circumstances, I ought easily to pluck up courage and allow my work to be resumed. But a grave artistic consideration prevents my doing so. As yet, my work has not enjoyed a calm and dispassionate hearing; its true character, depending indispensably on the audience being thrown, in accordance with my intention, into a frame of mind embracing the whole of my production, and different from that of the ordinary opera-public, has not yet dawned upon the public, who on the contrary, could only confine themselves to brilliant and catching external features, which serve me merely as scaffolding, but which the audience remarked and received with lively sympathy. If I could and did obtain a quiet hearing for my opera, I fear, from what I have already hinted at, concerning the character of the performance here, that the inward weakness and tameness of the latter, which are no secret for those who are intimately acquainted with the work, and for the removal of which all personal intervention on my part was prohibited, must gradually be revealed, so that, for the present, I should not be able to look forward to a sterling and not merely an external success. Let, therefore, all the unsatisfactory events connected with this performance be kindly buried under the dust of the three battle-nights, and the various persons who bitterly disappointed the hopes I had founded on them, console themselves with the belief that they fought and fell in a good cause!

"For the present, the Paris Tannhäuser has been played out. But, if a wish of certain earnest friends of my art be fulfilled—if a project, seriously entertained by competent individuals, and which aims at nothing less than the speedy foundation of a new opera house for the realization of the reforms here mooted by me, be carried out—you may, perhaps, hear once more, even from Paris, of Tannhäuser."

"Be assured that you now know the complete truth as regards everything that has, as yet, taken place in Paris, in connection with my work; as your guarantee for this, accept the simple fact, that I cannot possibly be satisfied with a mere appearance, when my inmost wish has remained unfulfilled, and this wish can be gratified only by the consciousness of having produced a really intelligent impression."

"With cordial good wishes, I remain, yours,
"RICHARD WAGNER."

* The editor of the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung observes, on the subject of the above letter:—"With regard to this modest example of self-defence in opposition to the decision of public opinion, we will simply refer our readers to the commencement of Cicero's Oration against Verres: Nemo quumquam tam audacem, qm. arbitratur, qui tam multis testibus convictus—audet. Est IDEM, qui SEMPER VIT."

Church Music in the Hands of the Reformers.

Exclusive choir singing was one of the abuses which crept into the Romish church, in connection with its gradual declining piety, in the centuries succeeding the third. The change from the primitive method was gradual. It commenced in the fourth century, at which time the choir was not expected to monopolize the singing, but only to lead it. This, however, gave them the opportunity of introducing a style of music, not only unfit for the church on account of its theatrical associations, but unfit for the use of the congregation on account of its intricacy.

The introduction of tunes too difficult for any but trained singers to execute, was the first step towards debarring the people from their ancient privilege of praise. They might still unite in some simple chorus or response, but this was rather by privilege than by right. Even this privilege was at length denied them and they were taught that the singing of God's praise was too sacred a duty for the lips of the laity, and belonged to the clergy alone. And the clergy, to make their monopoly of the singing still more exclusive, sang only in Latin. By the sixth or seventh century the voices of the people were effectually silenced, and for nearly a thousand years God was no longer praised as at the first. But this long night of darkness and silence slowly rolled away, and the light of returning day in Germany was ushered in with song. Its approach had been heralded by song a century before this, in Bohemia, in the time of John Huss and Jerome; and even in the fourteenth century, while "The Morning Star of the Reformation" was still visible, praise broke the silence of the waning watches in England. As in the mornings of the long days in summer, a few woodland notes may be heard here and there in the groves in advance of the general chorus which hails the day, so there were voices before Luther, both in England and on the continent, which anticipated the melodies of his time. But when the empire of the night was fairly broken, and this great chorister of the Reformation arose, he awoke the whole forest into harmony.

One of the first efforts of Luther in fulfilment of the great mission of his life, was to publish a psalm-book. Both hymns and tunes were composed mainly by himself. About sixty hymns were written by him, at a time when the history of fifteen centuries could not furnish more than two hundred hymns that had been used in Christian congregations. In this great undertaking he had a two-fold object: first, to restore to the people their ancient and long-lost New Testament right to the use of psalms in public worship in their own tongue; and secondly, by the graces of verse, and the charms of melody, to lodge the word of God effectually in their memory. He took care to embody in his verse the great foundation truths of the Bible, that, being sung over and over by the people, they might never be forgotten. This object he announced in a letter to Spalatin, written in 1524, in which he says: "It is my purpose, after the example of the ancient Fathers of the church, to make psalms or spiritual songs for the common people, that the word of God may dwell among them in psalms, if not otherwise. We are looking around everywhere for poets. I entreat you to help us. I would that new and courtly words might be avoided, and that the language be all suited to the capacity of the people, as simple as possible." So successful was Luther in this endeavor, that priestly influence might in vain have attempted to check the progress of the Reformation by destroying the Bible. Its doctrines were the soul of his songs, and the songs were embalmed in the people's memory.

They were sung everywhere. The singing habits of the early days of Christianity were fairly revived. "The hymns spread among all classes of people, and were sung not only in the churches and schools, but also in the houses and in the work-shops, in the streets and in the market-places, in the barns and in the fields." Wherever the principles of the Reformation were received whether in Germany, France, or Britain, psalm-singing was an almost universal practice. This was the blossom which the root of the new doctrines invariably produced. So contagious was this practice, and so wonderful the power of Luther's psalms in propagating his doctrines, that his enemies were obliged to adopt the same practice in self-defence. "The papists, finding that the people would sing them, and were almost running with delight in doing so, published hymn-books of their own, in which, with slight alterations, they incorporated almost all of the Reformer's pieces." The hymns found their way even into the French court; but they contained seeds of truth which it was not for the interest of the Romish church to have planted, and about the middle of the sixteenth century all Papists were prohibited from singing them. From that time, the name of "psalmodist," or "psalm-singer," was applied to the Protestants in derision. It became synonymous with Reformer, Huguenot, Calvinist, Heretic.

"Next to theology," said Luther, "it is to music that I give the highest place and the greatest honor." He had reason to say this, for it was music next to theology, and sometimes more than theology, that gave success to his cause. "In the city of Hanover, the Reformation was introduced, not by preachers, nor by religious tracts, but by the hymns of Luther, which the people sang with delight." A Protestant contemporary of Luther says: "I doubt not that the one little hymn, 'Now rejoice, dear Christians, all,'

(the first one that Luther published,) has brought many hundred Christians to the faith. . . . The noble, sweet language of that one little song has won their hearts, so that they could not resist the truth; and, in my opinion, the spiritual songs have contributed not a little to the spread of the Gospel."

But all the reformers, German, Swiss, English, and Scotch, were equally zealous that the people shall consider praise as appropriately and peculiarly their part in the services of the sanctuary. With great effort did they achieve for the people this "freedom to worship God." And now, the advocates of exclusive choir singing in America are surrendering again, to Popery, the very territory which was acquired in the battles of the Reformation. They willingly relinquish to the Man of Sin a stronghold captured by the sturdy valor of such men as Luther and Calvin, and John Knox, and are content that the praise of God should be sung in Protestant churches in the Popish manner.—Hymns and Chords.

Who wrote the "Marsellaise?"

The question as to who is the real composer of the "Marsellaise" is again raised. A correspondent of the Gartenlaube, a Leipzig paper, asserts it to be composed by a German, Holtzmann of Moersburg, Hof-Capellmeister of the Count Palatine. The organist, Herr Hamma, at Moersburg, is said to have discovered Holtzmann's manuscript, which leads to the curious result that the song, afterwards known as the "Marsellaise," was originally sacred music, and copied by Rouget de Lisle from Holtzmann's Credo in his "Missa Solemnis," No. 4, and adapted to his words. It was always wondered how a dilettante in music, like the engineer-officer Rouget, could have produced in a couple of hours in one night, such a splendid poem of many stanzas in the most perfect poetical form, and at the same time the beautiful air, without which the song, although fiery and enthusiastic, would hardly have acquired its historical fame. It was, therefore always supposed that Rouget made use of the musical reminiscences for his words. But whence the reminiscences of such a fine air, was a question which puzzled many a critic. During the last two or three years it has particularly occupied the French musical savants, especially MM. Kastner and Castil-Blaze. Prof. Bischoff, of Cologne, in reference to this new discovery, publishes a short historico-critical treatise on the subject, in the Kölnner Zeitung, from which we gather a few more interesting facts. So long ago as the year 1793—8 a rumor was current that the tune of the French National Hymn was a German air; it went so far as to ascribe poem and melody to George Forster. This rumor was hushed for a long time, till it rose again in 1830, when the "Parienne" was sung to an air notoriously German, a German national song, well known to the English-German Legion and the Hanoverian troops in 1814—15.

At that time a note was found in Bonchey and Roux's "Histoire Parlementaire de la Révolution" (xvii., p. 204) to the effect that the "Marsellaise" had originally been composed by a German for Biron's army. In contradiction to this, Rouget de Lisle says himself in a collection of French songs: "I made the air and the words of the song at Strasbourg in the night following the declaration of war, end of April, 1792." It is related that the daughter of the Maire Dietrich played it on the piano on the following morning. M. Kastner, in his attempt to vindicate the composition for Rouget, repeats the words of the sculptor David, of Angers, who told him, "Rouget made the stanzas of the song in the night, and accompanied himself with the violin." But this would speak more against than for him, as he could not have composed words and music at the same time. M. Castil-Blaze, in the "France-Musical" of 1852, gives very different explanations. He states that on the private theatre of Madame de Montesson, who was secretly married to the Duke of Orleans, in 1782, a German song, with chorus and burden, was performed for the first time, which those who had been among the auditory recognized ten years afterwards as the melody to the world-inspiring song of Rouget's. German music in Paris at that time came into vogue through Gluck and his success. A. M. Julien, sen., violinist at the Italian Opera House, had produced that song in Madame Montesson's concert; it was received with enthusiasm by the highly aristocratic company, against which it turned such a sharp weapon afterwards. M. Deslauriers, publisher of Gluck's operas, and M. Imbalt, who directed the orchestra, were both present on that evening, and confided their secret to Castil-Blaze in the eighth year of the Republic, although Imbalt, who became music vender, in contradiction to his own opinion, from speculation and regard to the public voice, had printed the "Marsellaise" himself, in 1792, with Rouget's name as the composer.

Both assured M. Castil-Blaze, that the melody originally, with its first words, had a mild religious character. With Rouget's words, the song became first a Chant de l'Armée du Rhin, which the regiments at Strasburg and in Alsatia sang and played as a March. From there the song traveled to the south of France; and from thence, with the Marseilles batallions, to Paris, where it was ascribed to the above-mentioned M. Julien, and others, as Gosssec, Pleyel, and particularly Méhul, who had set it more completely. M. Castil-Blaze quotes several examples where entirely change the character of the tune: he comes very near the truth and the latest news from Meersburg, when he says: "If you hear in our churches the song 'Sainte Cité, demeure permanente,' and when the singers intonate the finale, 'O ma patrie, O mon bonheur,' do you see everybody get excited and rush to arms? By no means; you have heard the sentimental tune a hundred times, and you never dreamed that it was one and the same with the faithful burden: 'Aux armes, citoyens! formez vos battallions!'"

Prof. Bischoff observes, that neither by the older works of Walther and Gerber, nor by the newer musical biographical dictionaries, nor by any authority to which he has access, can he learn anything nearer of the Capellmeister and composer Holtsmann; but, he continues, there have always lived in the south of Germany, and there are still living, a number of composers of sacred music, of whom no one, beyond the narrowest circle of their activity, ever hears anything. —Athenæum.

Handel and Haydn Society.

The annual meeting of this Society was held on Monday evening the 27th ult., at Chickering's Hall, the Vice President in the chair. From the Treasurer's Report it appears that the financial condition of the society remains much as it was at the last annual meeting; the profit on the performance of the Messiah at Christmas, together with some two hundred dollars, and upwards, contributed by members, just about squaring out the expenditures of the season.

The obligations of the Society amount to $1,362.58, to meet which, two first mortgage railroad bonds, valued in the present depressed condition of all such securities at $1,400 and on which the interest is paid semi-annually, are held; exclusive of the valuable library and other property belonging to the society.

The reading of the Secretary's Report was listened to with interest, particularly those portions having reference to a change in the By-Laws, whereby a better attendance may be secured at rehearsals; and also in relation to an annual assessment; as a necessity of the times.

We call attention to the Secretary's report, below, for other valuable suggestions of vital importance to the society, and which, if adhered to must prove of inestimable value to the society.

Dr. J. Baxter Upham was unanimously nominated for the office of President, and a Committee appointed to wait on him, and ask his acceptance. The meeting was then adjourned to Tuesday evening, June 4th, when a choice of officers will take place.

SECRETARY'S REPORT, MAY 27, 1861.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Handel and Haydn Society.—Another twelve month has passed since we met for the purposes which have brought us together at this time, and another year has been added to those already numbered in the age of our honored institution; but, as your recording officer I have little to communicate beyond the simple announcement of the number of public performances which the Society has given during that time, and the general result of the same.

Early in the season, your Board of Trustees conceived the plan of carrying through a series of subscription concerts, to consist mainly of standard Oratorios by the great masters; but owing, it may be, to the peculiarly unsettled state of the country at that time, the project failed for lack of sufficient encouragement.

The usual weekly rehearsals were commenced at this new hall on the 30th September. The Messiah was performed, according to long established custom, at Christmas; and the result, both pecuniarily and artistically, was highly satisfactory.

Three other concerts were given during the season, each in connection with foreign vocalists, but neither one proved to be of any pecuniary advantage to the Society.

A concert in aid of the Massachusetts Volunteers was given by the society at the Boston Music Hall on the 27th of April, which was cordially coöperated in by prominent vocal and instrumental talent, rendering it a highly attractive entertainment; and, as every service connected with it was voluntarily proffered, it was confidently expected that a large sum would be realized, but, for certain inexplicable causes the total receipts were but $378.50 which amount was handed over to the Governor of the Commonwealth in accordance with a vote of the Board of Trustees. Small though the sum was, it may contribute something towards upholding the honor of our national flag, and in bringing peace once more to our borders. With this concert the season closed.

The Society has appeared but five times before the public during the season, but the regular weekly rehearsals have been continued as usual, numbering since the commencement thirty-three. Four meetings of the society have been held during the season, and the Board of Trustees has been called together nineteen times. Nine persons have been admitted to membership, and three have been discharged.

I might here close my report, but it seeming highly proper that matters relating to the material interests of the Society should be freely discussed at times like the present, when we are met in council together; I venture one or two suggestions for your consideration.

It has become, I think, a well established fact that no Society can, in the present state of the public mind, sustain itself by its performances, relying on the public patronage entirely for support. It might have been so when this society was the only avenue through which musical compositions of importance could be brought before the public; but those times have long since passed, and we must prepare to meet the new demands made upon us. I speak of these things in no discouraging tone, but that we may look the facts squarely in the face, and thereby be enabled to unite in adopting some line of policy which may add to our usefulness as a choral society. I do not find that there are any societies in this country, so far as my knowledge extends, and I have taken some pains to inform myself on that point, that look to a series of public performances for their support. On the contrary, those existing under similar organizations to our own, and for similar purposes, are, without exception, supported by yearly assessments on the members. The Sacred Harmonic Society of New York assesses ten dollars each, and many others I could name have larger or lesser sums as the price of yearly membership. In view of those facts I would respectfully suggest the propriety of amending the By-Laws of the Society as to admit of an annual assessment of five dollars on each member. This sum would pay the current expenses of Conductor, Organist and rent of the Library room, with such librarian assistance and docr-keepers as we should require. The advantages to be derived from the adoption of this amendment to our By-Laws would be manifold. It would not only enable us to meet our current expenses without the necessity of giving concerts in the vain hope of realizing a sufficient sum above the expenses to meet those obligations; but it would do vastly more for the Society in enlisting the hearty coöperation of each and every member who may remain as such, in whatever may be undertaken; and it would insure a fuller attendance at rehearsals; for when we pay for our privileges, we are more inclined to prize them, than we are when furnished without cost. I consider it a privilege to belong to an association of this kind, and more particularly so when it is the first of the kind in point of age, numbers, and efficiency in this country. In no other way can we become familiar with those great sacred creations of genius that have been but partially revealed to us, as yet; and were it not for the Handel and Haydn Society, or some similar organization, those works would have remained to us forever as sealed books.

Another, and a still greater advantage to be derived from this proposed change in the internal management of our society, would be found in the entire freedom from all "entangling alliances," temporary though they be, whereby we are too often forced to appear before the public wholly unprepared, in connection, it may be, with those who care nothing for us or the audience to which we introduce them, and as unprepared as ourselves for rendering satisfactorily the music assigned them. We have often voluntarily assumed positions before the public like that described above, in the vain expectation of realizing a sufficient sum thereby, to help out the yearly expenses, and have, as often been doomed not only to disappointment, but to the mortifying consciousness of having been engaged in an exhibition in no wise creditable to our musical reputation, or profitable to our treasury. From all such connections we could, if we would keep entirely aloof; and yet we should not be unmindful of the fact that vocalists in every respect competent to the requirements of the Sacred Oratorio are often among us, from abroad, and that the public should have an opportunity of testifying their appreciation of such artists. Many of our own resident vocalists are so incomparably superior to those who have been associated with us from time to time in Concerts and Oratorios, that the public will learn to distrust the merits of all unknown artists who may be put forward by us, if more care is not exercised in the future.

Another important addition to our By-Laws is required by which the attendance of members upon rehearsals may be secured, on penalty of forfeiture of membership in certain cases without the tedious process of advertising in "three or more daily papers" for a roll-call, as now. This regulation is imperatively demanded, if we would retain our present high position among the musical societies of the country; and should our number be lessened from this, or any other cause, our efficiency as a choral body would not, in my judgment, be materially injured; for, although large bodies of choristers are quite essential to a correct rendering of the massive, and sublime works of Handel and Mendelssohn, yet a smaller number, well disciplined, would be far more effective than a large, but imperfectly drilled chorus can possibly be made. As at present, there is too little personal responsibility manifested by many of the members in the operations of the Society. With a little additional effort, our rehearsals might be better attended, and our public performances vastly improved.

A very material reduction of our annual expenses has been effected in the occupation of this hall, so generously tendered us one year ago by the Messrs Chickering, and it may be thought advisable to make yet other retrenchments, corresponding to the times, even should the annual assessment referred to above be decided on.

It might, perhaps, be well in furtherance of the object, to go back for a season to the accustomed mode of conducting the rehearsals in the early days of the Society.

The By-Laws provide, Art. 4, that "at all meetings for the performance of music, the President may conduct the same, or a suitable musical director may be appointed at the discretion of the Board." It is only within a comparatively short period in the history of the Society, that a regular conductor has been engaged; the early Presidents always assuming that duty, and I would not now recommend such a course, except as a necessary retrenchment. Should it be deemed advisable to make such a change, the President could wield the baton, or some member of the Society might be selected who could undoubtedly do it acceptably. I know we should sadly miss the aid and guidance of the skilful hand which has so long and so well controlled our movements, and it may not be thought expedient to resort to it; but should it be made trial of, we should hardly, even then, feel like undertaking a public performance without an experienced conductor; though our rehearsals might be made both profitable and pleasant without one.

A properly conducted sacred music society, in a community like this, I regard as second only in importance and influence to the church itself, and that as such it should be encouraged and supported. Indeed the church is indebted more than is generally conceded or understood, to all such associations, for that which is to many, the most pleasing, and to all an important portion of Christian worship. The music of the church, in its influence on the worshippers, cannot be too highly estimated, and we should so shape our course as to avoid the possibility of the accumulation of a debt, until the return of more prosperous times, that we may not suffer our usefulness in this, or any other particular, to become impaired. If we would elevate the character of our Society above the ordinary occupation of concert-giving, in competition with every class of vocalists who may happen for the time to be among us, we must do something more than spend an hour in this hall once a week for our own gratification or amusement; or if we would interest the liberal and wealthy in our behalf, we must first interest ourselves in the true and legitimate business of a Sacred Music Society, incorporated "for the purpose of extending the knowledge and improving the style of performance of church music." Ours should be an educational institution for the benefit, as well, of those who participate in the performances as for those who listen; and such was the original intention of those who first conceived the plan of, and obtained the act of incorporation for, this institution. We have departed widely from that intention, but circumstances seemed to force the necessity upon us. Entirely dependent on our own resources for support, we have often been induced to do that, which, under other circumstances I am quite sure we should not have attempted.

Gentlemen, I am encouraged with the thought, — and not without due reflection and assurances from those who are interested in our welfare, — that we may before the lapse of many years, be placed in possession of a permanent fund, through the liberality of some of our fellow-citizens, the interest of which shall be sufficient to defray our annual expenses at least; but if we would deserve this munificence at the hands of any number of our benevolent citizens, we must look well to our path of duty, and not allow distracting counsels or flattering appearances to entice us from our true course.

In the present disturbed condition of our country, when trade is in a great measure diverted from its accustomed channels, and almost the only occupation of our citizens consists in the arming, equipping, and fitting out of troops to serve in defence of the liberties of our common country; when the music of the fife and drum alone attract attention; I say, in times like these, we can do nothing.

Did I say we could do nothing? Have we not already commanded the Muse and brought her into the service of our country's cause? We have but just given a concert for the benefit of the troops, and paid the proceeds over to the Governor of the State for that purpose. May we not hope that our trouble will soon cease, and that peace may be proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of our land?

Then will we again unite in a grand triumphal jubilee of welcome to those who have fought our battles and contributed of their might to the upholding of the majesty of the laws.

Respectfully submitted,

LORING B. BARNES, Secretary.

We trust that the newly elected President will accept the office tendered him. His well known energy and enthusiasm in any good cause that he takes in hand, cannot fail to be of service to the best interests of this old association, and we doubt not that he will infuse into it a new life by his well directed efforts. We need not remind our Boston readers that to Dr. Upham more than to any one else is due the successful accomplishment of the project of building the Music Hall, and its great embryo organ, or that the brilliant success of the Boston School Musical Festivals is also to be mainly attributed to his labors.

MAD. CHARLOTTE VARIAN gave her third and last concert prior to a tour in the British Provinces on Saturday evening last. We can assure our British provincial cousins that they will find her an artist of great merit and deserving of their patronage. Mad. Varian was assisted at this concert by Mr. Rudolphsen, a baritone formerly well known here and by Mr. Hoffmann, as before. We regret not to have received the expected notice of this concert of which the following was the programme:

PART I.

1. Solo Piano—Martha.....Jaell
Mr. E. Hoffmann.
2. Aria—I Lombardi.....Verdi
Madame C. Varian.
3. Song—Wake, dearest wake.....Miller
Madame C. Varian.
4. Aria—Il Balen (Trovatore).....Verdi
Mr. Rudolphsen.
5. Recitative e Cavatina—Ma la sola, ahime! Son io.....Bellini
Madame C. Varian.

PART II.

1. Song—The heart bow'd down (Bohemian Girl).....Balfe
Mr. Rudolphsen.
2. Scotch War Song—McGregor's Gathering.....Madame C. Varian.
3. Solo Piano—Il Trovatore.....R. Hoffmann
Mr. E. Hoffmann.
4. Scena Ed Aria—Traviata.....Verdi
Madame C. Varian.
5. Song—The little fat Gray Man.....Blewitt
Mr. Rudolphsen.
6. Star Spangled Banner.....Madame Varian.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The first Saturday evening Concert of the new series, was given by the Orchestral Union last Saturday. The programme was of essentially the same character as those of the Afternoon Concerts, perhaps better, if anything. The Eroica, not played here since the days of the great Festival, was given very acceptably, and will, we are glad to hear, be repeated to-night. Beside this we had Gluck's Iphigenia Overture, a piece of solid build and interesting detail, as well as some lighter pieces, as for instance a Potpourri from Verdi's Masked Ball, a waltz, and Meyerbeer's Torchlight dance, the latter decidedly too big for any concert hall. Unfortunately a sudden storm half an hour before concert time prevented a full attendance. There will be an improvement in point of numbers on the part of the audience with each succeeding concert.

GERMAN OPERA IN PARIS.—There is a talk of establishing a German Opera-house in Paris, with Dr. Marschner as conductor.

CHEVE'S SYSTEM.—The recent article upon this famous system of musical instruction, published in this Journal, April 18, has called forth quite a number of inquiries from our readers, especially from those who are concerned in teaching music, what precisely, this system is, and how it differs from the plan of musical instruction in vogue in this country, of which Dr. Lowell Mason was the efficient pioneer. We hope that our correspondent "Amateur" will enlighten us as fully as he may be able, as to the merits and prominent features of the system which he has introduced to our notice.

Musical Chit-Chat.

IRISH MUSIC.—Every nation has its peculiar melodies. Irish historians contend that their country is the celebrated Hyperborean isle, and that music is the native production of the soil. Cambrenis, who was one of the earliest libellers of the Irish, was obliged to admit their perfection in music. After he had heard the minstrels who attended the Irish chieftains at a banquet given to them in Dublin, by Henry II., he wrote to one of his friends in England, that "of all nations within our knowledge, this is, beyond comparison, the chief in musical composition." When the celebrated Italian composer, Geminiani, heard some pathetic Irish airs in London, he exclaimed—"Ha! that is the music of a people who have lost their liberty. I have heard nothing so sweet and plaintive and of such an original turn on this side of the Alps."

Handel, it is said, often declared that he would rather be the author of Carolan's "Aileen Aroon," than of all his own compositions. This Carolan seems, from the descriptions we have of him, to have been a genuine representative of the ancient bards. Though blind and untaught, yet his attainments in music were of the highest order. He excelled in all that was tender, romantic, and pathetic. He was an universal favorite; wherever he went, the doors of the nobility were opened, and an honorable place was assigned to him at the table. He thought the tribute of a song was due to every house where he was entertained, and he paid it in his usual simple, touching, and elegant manner. He wandered with his harp from town to town, and, oh, how skillfully he swept its cords, when depicting emotions of joy, or sorrow, patriotism, anger, love, or despair. Many of the lovely Irish airs rescued by Moore from oblivion were, no doubt, the composition of the blind Orpheus, Carolan.

O'Connor in his Dissertations, says—"Military music made part of the studies of the Irish warriors. It filled them with courage and a contempt of danger, and it was by the help of the military song, they sounded the charge, rally, retreat, &c."

The Irish are essentially a musical people. Their songs are sung throughout the world, and are everywhere admired and applauded. While there is a love for the simplicity, sentiment, and beauty in the heart of man, Moore's melodies will be read, sung, and cherished.

SINGING PSALMS.—Archbishop Laud very quaintly observes:—"The difference between singing and reading a psalm will be easily understood if you consider the difference between reading and singing a common song that you like. Whilst you only read it you only like it; but as soon as you sing it, then you enjoy it—you feel the delight of it—it has got hold of you—your passion keeps pace with it; you feel the same spirit within you that seems to be in the words. If you were to tell a person who had such a song that he need not sing it, that it was sufficient to peruse it, he would wonder what you meant, and would think you as absurd as if you were to tell him that he should only look at his food, but need not eat it; for a song of praise not sung is very like any other good thing not made use of."

When the battle of Leuthen had been fought, and the victors, fatigued almost to death, were sinking down in the chilling rain among the slain that lay scattered on the bloody field; then, in the darkness of the night, a single voice broke forth with the old choral: "Nun danket alle Gott!" (Now let us all praise God); soon a second voice joined, then a third, and so more and more, until the whole army took up the hymn; and thus the single song—in which the feelings of patriotism and military glory, united with the consciousness of having accomplished the great deed, and pious gratitude towards the mighty Ruler of battles—inspired the hearts of these men with new life, and strengthened them to follow up the victory they had so nobly won.

THE FRENCH ORPHEONISTES.—There is to be another gathering of the French Orpheonistes in Paris on September 12th, in the Palais d'Industrie.

M. FAURE AND MEYERBEER'S NEW OPERA.—The Journal des Debats states that M. Faure has signed an engagement for the Grand Opera of Paris, to appear in the Africaine, or rather Vasco de Gama, by M. Meyerbeer.

Herr Reichardt has left London for Frankfurt; from thence he proceeds to Darmstadt and Wiesbaden, to give a series of representations at the theatres in those towns. The admirers of this talented vocalist will not therefore have the pleasure of hearing him at any of the fashionable concerts till late in the season.—Musical World.

Herr Franz Abt, the well-known composer of "When the Swallows," &c., and Capellmeister of the Ducal Opera at Brunswick, intends visiting London in the course of the season.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—After two disappointments, caused by the indisposition of M. Faure, Guillaume Tell was produced on Tuesday week, and we need hardly add, filled the theatre in every part. The amphitheatre, and amphitheatre stalls, above all, were crowded to suffocation, and, indeed, from this part of the house proceeded the real applause of the evening; for there, in consequence of the abridgement of the pit, were congregated all the musical spirits of the metropolis, drawn thither in anticipation of a grand performance of Rossini's grand work. Everything tended to the expectation of such a result:—the seeming completeness of the cast, the great resources of the theatre, the efficiency and power of the basses and chorus, the energy of Mr. Costa, than whom Rossini has no more ardent admirer. The cast was as follows: Guillaume Tell—M. Faure; Arnold—Signor Tamberlik; Walter—Herr Formes; Melchthal—Signor Polonini; Gessler—Signor Tagliafico; Fisherman—Signor Neri-Baraldi; Mathilde—Mad. Tagliafico. Guillaume Tell was first produced at the Royal Italian Opera—the old theatre, of course—in 1848, M. Roger sustaining the part of Arnold, Tamburini of Guillaume Tell, and Mad. Castellan of Mathilde. It was played once only that year, in consequence, as was said, of the indisposition of the French tenor. A year or two later the opera was produced with Herr Ander as Arnold, but did not create any great sensation. Subsequently, it was revived with Signor Tamberlik in the principal tenor part, and the Italian was found immeasurably superior to his French and German rivals. Had Signor Tamberlik, indeed, sustained the part of Arnold in the first instance, a thorough success, we believe might have been reckoned on. Every one who knows music and feels its power must recognise the immense merit of Guillaume Tell; but most unfortunately the climax is attained at the end of the second act, and the interest decreases thence to the last finale. In fact, the opera, like most French operas (which are almost interminable), is too long. The quantity of music in the first two acts alone of Guillaume Tell is at least equal to the whole Fidelio. The director of the Royal Italian Opera, notwithstanding was determined to give Rossini's masterpiece another chance, and for this purpose called in all the resources of the establishment; but as the performance commences so late at the Royal Italian Opera it was impossible to give the whole work, and curtailments were indispensable.

That the management has done everything possible to render the performance complete we feel assured. Signor Tamberlik is by far the best Arnold we have seen in this country. M. Faure, although the music of Guillaume Tell is too low for him, sings like a thorough artist, and acts with great force and intelligence. The Walter of Herr Formes would be inimitable in every way, if only his vocal power was economised a little in the magnificent trio of the second act. That the music of Mathilde would not suit the voice of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, was to be expected. Occasionally, when the voice has not to be forced, Mad. Carvalho sings with infinite sweetness and delicacy; but this cannot extenuate the fault of embroidering the air and subsequent duet with ornaments of her own manufacture. All the remaining characters are entitled to unqualified praise, and nothing better could be desired in their respective ways than Mad. Rudersdorff's Jemmy—a signal success—Signor Neri-Baraldi's Pescatore, Signor Polonini's Melchthal, Signor Tagliafico's Gessler, and Mad. Tagliafico's Edwige.

To the performances of the band and chorus we can apply the term "magnificent," with few reservations. Every evening the audience, after the great scene of the "oath of liberty," is unbounded on all occasions. One of the greatest hits of the performance is, of course, the famous air in the last scene, "Suivez-moi" ("Corriam, corriam,"), which Signor Tamberlik electrifies the audience with an "Ut de poitrine" that Duprez himself might have envied in his best days. The scenery is marvellously beautiful, and the appointments and dresses all in the best taste. Guillaume Tell was repeated on Thursday night for the third time.

Perhaps Il Trovatore was as good an opera as could be selected for the first appearance of Mad. Penco and Signor Graziani. Both received on Tuesday night the hearty welcome due to their merits and popularity. Mad. Penco, although comparatively a new-comer, is even now a general favorite, and, indeed, considering the rarity of first-class dramatic sopranos in the pure Italian school, is entitled to a distinguished place.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The third concert was given on Monday night, and attracted an immense crowd, the engagement of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglirl, no doubt, greatly enhancing the attraction. The following programme was given:—Overture, Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Grand Scene, Der Freischütz, Weber; Aria, "Dalla sua pace," Mozart; Symphony, "Power of Sound," Spohr; Cavatina, "Con d' bello," Donizetti; Concerto, G major, pianoforte, Mozart; Aria, "Aurora che sorgera," Rossini; Duet, Lucia, Donizetti; and Overture, Freischütz, Weber. This was a grandly constructed programme, and the execution was universally worthy of music.

Paris.

A new institution, called La Fondation Beaulieu, for the performance of classical vocal music has just commenced its second series. The programme included specimens of the vocal music of Felice Anerio, Orlando Gibbons, Handel, Pergolesi, Marcello, Graun; Haydn, Mozart and Cherubini. Mad. Viardot and M. Bataille were the chief vocalists. Selections from Haydn's oratorio of Tobias were executed at the commencement and at the close of the concert. Among the most curious as well as the most showy items of this semi-antiquarian entertainment was a bravura air from the Britannicus of Graun, chapel master to Frederic the Great, which was admirably sung by Mad. Viardot, who (as you must frequently have heard her do in London), with the true feeling of an artist, gave its full value to the substratum of passion which underlies the cumbrous adornments systematically resorted to by composers of that day.

At the Opera, Mlle. Gueymard is in full career as the acknowledged representative of Valentine in Les Huguenots, which is drawing large houses. She has restored the romance in the fourth act, cut out by her predecessors; and Meyerbeer has written a coda to append to it, expressly for her. M. Faure, who is now with you at Covent Garden, where he is engaged for three years, has just signed a three years' engagement at the Grand Opera, at 5000 fr. per month for the first year, 6000 for the second, and 7000 for the third. A congé from April to July enables him to fulfil his English engagement concurrently. Felicien David's Herculanum, it is said, will be shortly revived, and also the Muette de Portici, on a magnificent scale. It is currently reported that Signor Alary, of sacrilegious note (inventor of the dish Fricassee de Mozart, à la maître de chant), has composed a comic opera to a libretto by Scribo, called La Beauté du Diable, which is speedily forthcoming. The gentleman who has the toupet (Anglicè et vulgo, "cheek") to adapt Don Giovanni to the exigencies of an ambitious tenor and of his own notions of taste, ought to do something original. This was hardly the case, however, with the Tre Nozze, in which Lablache danced to a polka warbled by poor Sontag. Mario, by the way, has again, according to his wont (or shall we say according to his cant?), announced himself indisposed; and Montanaro, the slippery gentleman who jilted Mr. Beale, replaces him in Count Almaviva. So I hear that Grisi is again at the Royal Italian Opera. Is this to be another farewell engagement?

"Fare thee well, and if for ever, Still for ever fare thee well,"

has been fitted with a new reading, illustrating the confusion that may arise between bidding farewell for ever, and for ever bidding farewell. Norma, with her sickle for ever cutting and for ever coming again, might stand now as a female companion to Chrono, with his scythe. By the way, our experience of this artist may legitimately found a new idiom a contrast to the expression taking "French leave." As this means to leave without giving notice, so Italian leave would be to give notice without leaving. Mlle. Trebelli has just bidden adieu to the public of the Italian opera here in Rossini, after making a decided impression. Managers must be on the look-out, for there is very little doubt this young contralto is likely to prove a prize of importance. Mad. Penco has appeared in Norma, in which she shows so much dramatic power, assisted by a new Adalgisa, under the name of Blondini. Her real name is Mlle. Eunequist, and she is a pupil of M. Masset. Her nervousness rendered it impossible to judge of the capabilities of Mlle. Eunequist.

BRUSSELS.—Only the other day a theatre at Barcelona was burnt down, and now another at Brussels has shared in the fate which seems sooner or later to await buildings devoted to the drama. The Théâtre des Nouveautés, the establishment in the Belgian capital I allude to, was built only eighteen years ago. Like the fire at Covent Garden, it seems to have originated in the lofts above the audience part. Letters from Berlin announce that Mad. Lagrue has arrived in the Prussian capital, and will make her appearance in Nourmahal, and in Spontini's Vestale.—Musical World.

MEXICO.—Letters from Mexico give a more encouraging account of operatic affairs there. Maretzek arrived with his troupe on the 10th of April, and commenced his season on the 13th. The "Trovatore," "Ernani," the "Barbiere," "Norma," "Lucrezia Borgia," "L'Italiani in Algieri," and "Martha," have been successively given, with very fair success. The sisters Natali had made a most favorable impression, particularly Agnes. Madame d'Angri had also become very popular, and Bischi, the new basso, is spoken of in terms of high praise. It was in contemplation to produce the "Prophete" as soon as the necessary preparations could be got through. The mise en scene was to be on a scale of great splendor.

Galignani's Messenger of May 1st says: "M. Mario starts immediately for London, having in consequence of Smith's resigning the direction of Her Majesty's, where he had accepted an engagement for the season—again come to terms with his former manager, Mr. Gye. M. Belart, whose singing of the music of Rossini is now the best by far on the stage, is engaged by M. Calzado as second tenor for three years. Mme. Alboni is on a tour, singing in public concerts, in Ireland. Herz's well filled salle a few evenings since afforded one of the most reliable tests of the favor enjoyed by Mlle. Ida Boullée, one of our best lady professors on the piano, and a composer of taste and elegance. She was also much admired in "Morceaux" from Liszt and Chopin. She was assisted by M. Leon Lafant and Mme. Requier Delaunay. The crowning treat of the soirée was, however, the concerto, the orchestra being capitally led by M. Tilmant."

PARIS, MAY 10, 1861.—The pamphlet entitled Richard Wagner et Tannhäuser à Paris, which was merely mentioned in the last letter deserves more attention than could be devoted to them. The author Charles Baudelaire merely reproduces with few modifications a paper published in the Revue Européenne, adding under the heading, "A few words more," a dozen pages upon the failure of the work at the grand opera. The unsuccessful trials he explains on several grounds, some of which have already been mentioned in your journal. He concludes by asserting that the French public has not heard Tannhäuser, that the opposition was systematic, the work of the abonnés "who care more for the physical charms of the danseuses" than for any music, and who never could pardon Wagner for banishing the ballet from his work and leaving their protégées, to use a milder term than the author, in the back ground. There might perhaps have also been a secret opposition to the Emperor. However Charles Baudelaire augurs well from even the too quick passage of Tannhäuser. He speaks of a reaction as manifested in various circles in favor of the work.

The Grand Opera has been giving special attention of late to the ballet. Mad. Ferraris in Graziosa continues to be the chief attraction—Le marché des Innocents is in preparation. This is a Russian importation to be adapted to the French stage by Petipa for his sister-in-law Mad. Petipa. The music is by Pagni. The eminent Italian choregraph Borri is preparing for autumn a grand ballet in which Mad. Ferraris is to appear.

Of more serious productions, the Alceste of Gluck with Mad. Viardot is spoken of. The Freyshütz is in active preparation. We had the other night David's Herculanum.

At the Theatre Français and at the Odeon still Legouvé's pieces. It is enough to a satiety of the Academician.

The representations of Salvator Rosa at the Opera Comique were interrupted by the indisposition of Mlle. Lemerrier. Mlle. Belia however, is continuing the success of the work. The Circassienne is still played occasionally. Bataille is engaged at the Opera Comique. He is to make his first appearance June 1st in the Fée aux roses.

A Russian tenor Nikolski is much spoken of. A new opera by Schliebler "The Count of Santarem" has been represented at Leipzig.

The public mind is for the present somewhat diverted from the musical productions by those of the plastic arts now in exposition at the Palace of Industry. F. B.

COLOGNE.—A new Symphony by Th. Gouvy (No. 3 in C) has been performed here, the author conducting, and was received with warm applause. It is asserted that this composition denotes a great progress since the first two Symphonies were written.

THE MARSEILLAISE.—The "Gartenlaube," an extensively read German periodical, shows that the melody of the "Marseillaise" was composed by a German, a certain Holtzmann, chapelmaster at one of the small Rhenish Courts. The melody originally belongs to the Credo of Holtzmann's Missa solennis No. 4, lately found among old rubbish by the third or fourth successor of the old organist. The Marseillaise is not a reminiscence of it but a close copy. As in the times of the outbreak of the French revolution music for the Catholic church was circulated mostly in manuscript, the organists all over Germany and France being a large fraternity were constantly in communication with each other, exchanging music and observations on the merit of the same, this is not at all so likely as it might appear at the first moment. Rouget de Lisle, the poet, was no doubt a good Catholic, and may have been a good musician, too. Of course this explodes Lamartine's romantic story about the origin of the Song and air, which is rather a pity.

HAMBURG.—Mad. Louisa Michael-Michaeli, a Swedish singer, gave two concerts in this city last month. Her selection embraced every style; Schumann, Weber, Meyerbeer, Verdi. She is reported to be a singer of the very first rank. With a voice, pure as gold of true feminine character, reaching through two octaves up to D, she masters every difficulty, with the greatest ease. She is engaged in London for the coming season. She has been instructed by Gänther in Stockholm, and for the last year by Mad. Lind-Goldschmidt. Her voice is much like Clara Novello's, when in her prime.

A German traveller writes from the West Indies, that the colored sailors on board a steamer plying between Vera Cruz and St. Thomas, sang and danced to Kücken's well-known air, "The young recruit," provided with English words. In course of time it may get into the States as a new Ethiopian melody.

WAGNER'S FLYING DUTCHMAN.—Once more Mr. Richard Wagner. Since witnessing the Tannhäuser we had some vague misgivings that we might have been hasty in our judgment of his merits as a composer, and we seized the first opportunity of again hearing his music, while yet in the land of his birth. The Grand Opera offering to its patrons and the public generally, the "Zwischenakt," "Der Fliegende Holländer," (Flying Dutchman), by the author above named, we determined on being one of the invited. The opera house is not such an one as we had expected to see in this great capital of Germany; as, however, Government has under consideration plans for the construction of a new one, we will be silent in any blame merely occupying ourselves with the scene. The plot of the "Flying Dutchman" is exceedingly simple: A Norwegian vessel, on a homeward voyage, is compelled by stress of weather to enter a port only a few miles from her destination. She has not more than cast anchor and furled sails when another ship makes for the same haven. It is the phantom ship, or Flying Dutchman. The two captains get into conversation, the Norwegian informing the Hollander that his home is within a few miles of their landing; the latter, without any ceremony, invites himself home with the Norwegian salt, and to make himself the more welcome, presents a coffer full of pearls and similar valuables, brought from his vessel to his host. They progress rapidly in each other's favor, and the question of a daughter, passing fair is discussed and a marriage agreed upon. They leave for the home of the Norwegian, and act first ends.

The second act brings us in the midst of a bevy of Norwegian maidens, busy with the spinning wheel. The daughter, dressed like a countess, seems to be nursing a silent sorrow.

There is an old nurse of course—and a young huntsman; the latter during the absence of the maiden's parents, has been quite sweet upon the daughter, and they appear to have broken the "six-pence." When the scene opens however, an old portrait, which it appears had never seriously occupied their attention, rises all at once into a formidable rival of the young deerstalker. The daughter feels instinctively that her fate is connected with this portrait, she is interrupted in the expression of her sentiments by the arrival of her father accompanied by the Dutchman whose portrait, wonderful to relate, is the one in question. The father, like a sensible old fellow, leaves the pair to mutual explanations. The mysterious navigator goes at once into the matter, explains that he is seeking a wife who will be faithful under all circumstances. The young lady declares she has been a long time expecting him, and that she is willing to be his at all hazards—and the act closes.

The final act commences with a scene between the young hunter and the fair maiden, the former, in the warmth of his affections to the affianced bride begins to get rather spooney. She acknowledges that once she had rather a liking for him, but now her duty, &c., &c., that she would always consider him as a friend, &c., &c. The Dutchman, who has been eaves-dropping—instead of appearing satisfied with the declaration of the young girl, rushes off declaring that his fate calls him hence. His ship, very conveniently placed, starts at once with her commander, amid a terrific storm of blue lights, rattling of shot, shaking of sheet iron and the thundering of the big drum. The young maiden, with strength beyond what one could expect, tears herself from the grasp of her father and some half dozen others, rushes to a cliff, calls to the flying Dutchman that she will be faithful even in death—and throws herself into the rolling—canvas.—Vienna Cor. of N. The Massachusetts Line. Campaign Song.
Air "Yankee Doodle." 25

The words of this song, which nobly chime the praise of our old Bay State, have been written by the Rev Robert T. S. Lowell, to the air of "Yankee Doodle." They have been extensively copied by the newspaper press of New England, and no volume of Camp Songs issued will be without them.

A whisper from the heart. Frank Mori. 25

A very acceptable Song, by a popular English balladist, who always writes well, and as his own ballads always form the larger part of his concert programmes, writes also with a view to proper effect and the instant appreciation of an audience. He has well succeeded with this song.

Instrumental Music.

God save the Queen. Transcription. F. Oesten. 25

A very brilliant arrangement of this air, adopted by us as one of our national Odes. The piece demands hardly more experience in the performer than Oesten's well-known operatic Fantasies. In those times when all the patriotic airs are at a large premium, every good performer on the piano should add good arrangements of any of them to his or her portfolio.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, with symphonies and accompaniments, by Sir John Stevenson, and characteristic words by Thomas Moore. With a portrait. Price, $1.50; in cloth, $2.50; cloth, full gilt, $3.00.

In a very neat, convenient, and durable form we have in this volume the fine old Melodies of Ireland wedded to the charming ballads which have, more than any other of his works, immortalized the name of Moore, and made it a familiar household word throughout the civilized world. There has been, and always will be, a peculiar charm about the music and the poetry of this work, and though the expression in reference to a new book, has become somewhat hacknied that "no library is complete without it," we may venture to say, that used in connection with this elegant edition of "Moore's Melodies," it will come to each of our readers as a very truthful declaration. There are many editions of these Melodies published in this country, but this is the only one in which the words are accompanied by the music, and here we may mention that with Moore the words and the music are one. "So intimately," says an English writer, "were they united in his mind, that the sight of the songs crowded together in one volume unaccompanied by music notes inflicted on him positive pain."

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Bell-Song.

BY ROSE TERRY.

NO. 1.—"FUNERA PLANGO."

Toll, toll, toll! soar thou passing bell,
Over meadows green and quiet,
Over towns where life runs riot;
Do thine errand well!
Sing thy message, sad and calm,
Cold and holy as a psalm,
Hush us with thy knell!

Toll, toll, toll! over wind and wave:
Through the sunshine's sudden fading,
Through the pine-tree's voice upbraiding,
Where the wild seas rave.
Snow-drifts for the summer wait;
Slumber for the desolate;
Silence in the grave.

Toll, toll, toll! through the quivering sky;
Chime thy song of wintry weather;
Cruel through the rapturous ether,
Call the bride to die.
Chill, with thy relentless tongue,
Eyes that smiled and lips that sung;
Bid delight good-by.

Toll, toll, toll! heaven is in the sound!
Sad alone to souls unready.
They whose lamps were trimmed and steady
Christ rejoicing found.
On the rolling waves of tone
Float I to the Master's throne,
Life and love abound.

NO. 2.—FULGORA FRANGO.

Swinging slowly through the thunder,
Thrill the vivid bolts asunder,
Make the storm-wind quail.
Hurl thy challenge, stern defender,
Fierce against the tempest's splendor,
Past the hissing hail.

Leaping through affrighted heaven,
Swift the wrathful flames are driven,
Flashing death and fear.
Speak thou bell! with sullen clangor,
Overcry the tempest's anger,
Force the storm to hear.

Unrelenting, burning, streaming,
Red o'er livid oceans gleaming,
Lightnings rend the sky.
Break the thunder's fearful chorus,
Lift thy peal of triumph o'er us,
Floating strong and high.

Tell the soul thy signal story,
How its own inherent glory
Nature's might shall quell.
Ring a psalm for the spirit
Fire nor flood shall disinherit.
Praise thy makers, bell!

NO. 3.—SABBATA FANGO.

Calmly dawns the golden day,
Over mountains pale and gray.
Man, forsake thy sleep and pray.
Come, come, come!

Swinging through the silent air,
Lo! the call itself is prayer
Fence thy soul from sin and care.
Come, come, come!

Like a dream, serene and slow,
Through the dawn's aerial glow,
Hear the restful cadence flow;
Come, come, come!

Think that in my pleading tongue,
Through the dewy branches swung,
Christ himself this word hath sung:
Come, come, come!

Toil and battle, rest in peace,
In the holy lights increase,
Weary heart from labor cease;
Come, come, come!

Lo! up-rising from the dead,
God's own glory on His head,
His pure lips thy prayers have sped.
Come, come, come!

Verdi.

P. SCUDO, L'Année Musicale.

I have always done justice to the incontestable talent of this vigorous and passionate composer, who for twenty years has intoxicated Italy and charmed all Europe. I have not failed to recognize the splendor of his short-breathed melodies or the powerful sonority of various morceaux d'ensemble, or the originality of certain feats of the voice and of some formulas of accompaniment that are to be observed in his best operas; but I cannot forget that I have heard in my life the greatest works of Gluck, Mozart, Weber, Cimarosa, Rossini, Donizetti and Bellini; I cannot obliterate from my memory the impressions and recollections that have been left by the charming masters of the French school, Grétry, Méhul, Cherubini, Boieldieu, Hérold and Auber; I cannot shake off two hundred years of musical civilization and tradition which envelope and support my soul; in a word, it is not in my power to repel the influence of the glorious inheritance that has been left to me and of which I myself am one of the products, nor can I help preferring one page of Virgil to all the Pharsalia of Lucan; a sketch by Raphael to a hundred modern pictures that I could name; the Pavillon de l'Horloge in the Court of the Louvre to all the buildings erected in Paris within the last fifty years, the William Tell of Rossini to fifty operas by M. Verdi. I well understand the objections that can be raised against this way of contemplating the phenomena of Art. "Do you not like variety?" they say, "Do you not admit progress?" Each civilization impresses upon Art the physiognomy peculiar to it and the ideal of beauty which it has conceived. Virgil has not continued the epic of Homer, and the moral world that he has evoked resembles in no respect that of the Divina Commedia of Dante; Raphael has expressed a different ideal of beauty from that which inspired Apelles or Zeuxis; Praxiteles does not resemble Michel Angelo, who himself can in no way be confounded with any of his numerous successors. In the theatre and in music, this variety of types and horizons is still greater. What is there more unlike than the language and the moral world of Sophocles compared with the vast, bloody and complicated drama of Shakspeare? The tragedies of Corneille and Racine reproduce morals and paint characters that are not to be found in the profound and nature works of the English poet. The Faust of Goethe, the Wallenstein of Schiller, neither resemble the drama of Shakspeare or the French tragedy of the age of Louis XIV. Is the opera of Gluck the same as that of Mozart? The Freyschütz of Weber has no relation with Don Juan, the manner of Rossini does not resemble that of Cimarosa, and between the Freyschütz and William Tell, Meyerbeer has placed the combined type of Robert le Diable. Genius is not an absolute force which produces always and alone the same result. A work of art is the fruit of two elements which interpenetrate and are confounded with each other; of the individual inspiration of the artist and of the manners and tendency of the society for which he labors. M. Verdi, who is above all a dramatic composer, neither wished nor was able to continue simply the manner and style of Rossini. Endowed with another genius and responding to different wants he has produced a work full of passion which pleases the public and is played in all the theatres of the world. You are wrong to fight, as you have done, the only musician who remains standing, since the death of Donizetti, and who has sustained for twenty years the enfeebled sovereignty of Italy. The public is always right in applauding what pleases it, and when it is amused by a work of art, it pays little heed to the vain protests of criticism, which has never put anything down, or raised anything up. Variety is an imperious necessity of the human mind, which perpetually craves something new, even if there no more in the world, for it tires of everything, even of what is exquisite—even of pâtés d'anguille.

I do not think I have in any way weakened the language used by the admirers of M. Verdi. It would not be difficult however, to prove to them that one may be of a different opinion without failing to appreciate the value of the object which excites their enthusiasm. Criticism, it might be said to them, has not the ridiculous pretensions attributed to it. He knows well that it is not in her power to prevent the river from flowing or to create life where the breath of God has not passed. As a preventive power, criticism, when exercised with moderation and sagacity awakens good taste, establishes order in intellectual affairs excites the brave, supports the weak and sometimes brings back the erring. Criticism does not create the principles upon which its judgments rest, she deduces them from history and the works accomplished by the human mind. Either it must be conceded that justice and injustice, truth and falsehood, beauty and ugliness are only words, having an arbitrary signification and that there are only sensations that are of any value and which cannot be discussed; or we must recognize with the human race that error is possible and that man possesses in himself notions, presentiments of what is just, beautiful and true. Time develops the notions; these presentiments of a tender conscience become facts and are transformed into monuments, and these accumulated monuments mark the different civilizations that succeed each other upon the earth. Placing itself in this last point of view, and it is difficult, not to say impossible to choose any other without destroying the foundations of all credibility, criticism has a mission perfectly defined, and its part is so important that it need have no desire to fill a higher place. Armed with the immutable principles which govern the human mind, enlightened by History and knowledge of the processes that make up the traditions of every art, criticism, which is nothing more than reason clothed with sensibility, has the right to say, even to genius, that it deceives itself and that the work which draws down upon it such brilliant acclamations is not worth the price that is attached to it. Criticism can go still further in promoting the taste of a nation by scourging out, as did Boileau, bad poets and bad writers who obstruct the highways and usurp the place and the honors due to true merit; by exciting the pride of a people to shake off the yoke of imitation and create for itself a national literature, as did Lessing in Germany. It would be a fine task worthy of an enlightened mind (like M. Sainte Beuve) to write the history of criticism from the time of Aristotle, its founder, passing through the school of Alexandria, the Augustan age, the Renaissance, the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries down to the period of expansion in 1852, when when its voice gave forth a note which made an integral part of that glorious concert of the triumphal youth. It would be easy to prove how useful this noble faculty of the mind has been to civilization in enlightening genius, in divulging its secrets, in propagating sound doctrines, and in making popular great works that should excite an eternal admiration. And, to return to the subject before us, it would be proved that, without the lively and just reprimands of criticism, Rossini would never have given to the world his William Tell.

M. Verdi is not a great musician; the language that he has adopted is violent and often rude; he writes badly and is almost ignorant of the most important art of developing an idea and deducing from it its legitimate consequences. He dashes off effects, and storms with the passions instead of evoking them with skillful management; his characters are almost always in a fury with poniard in hand. The monotonous and bloody melodramas of M. Verdi have spoiled the taste of Italy and have taught her to forget to laugh who had known how to laugh so well! They have made her lose the fine traditions of the art of singing and have excited in a nation admirably endowed, but slothful and tolerably ignorant, a senseless pride. The imitators of M. Verdi are not to be tolerated because the manner of the master is altogether individual, and he himself could not modify himself; it is only Genius, seconded by science that can renew and transform itself and M. Verdi is only a man of talent who has experience without true learning. His music produces the same effect on the public, that the scarlet cloth does that is flaunted before the bull. It intoxicates it with a confused sonority, over-excites its material sensibility and renders it incapable of enjoying the qualities of that higher art which speaks to the imagination, awakens the fancy and penetrates gently into the depths of the soul. This is what we have been writing for ten years past nor have the successes of the author of Ernani, Rigoletto and Il Trovatore been able to shake our convictions. We do not dispute with the public the pleasure that it experiences in hearing certain operas of M. Verdi, but we do allow ourselves to say to it that it deceives itself as to the quality and worth of the object which pleases it, as well as in respect to the nature of the aesthetic or moral pleasure that it experiences.

Roger's Mode of Singing.

From the German of W. H. RIEHL.

Roger is more than a singer; he is a dramatic poet. By his wonderful power of acting he creates new situations, new causes of action, which are found neither in the text nor in the score; he gives such an abundance of individualization to his parts, that without our perceiving it, the opera hero is transformed into the more highly developed hero of tragedy. We hear an opera, and, when the curtain falls, it seems as if we had seen one of Shakespeare's dramas.

Eleazar, in Halevy's La Juive, sits in the vestibule of the court-house. He struggles with himself whether he shall deliver Recha over to death, or whether he shall save her. Only a few measures of ritornello give time for this dumb play. Most singers in this situation would do nothing more than indicate the inward struggle by looks and movements. But this does not suffice for Roger. He only gradually unfolds the situation in short but measured play. We do not only read one sensation in his face; but he shows us how thought follows thought, how feeling gives way to feeling; in these few measures of a ritornello he unfolds the whole series of thoughts, which is to be given to us musically hereafter by the aria, in a unique, logical clearness by this play alone. He composes a sort of by-plot in his face, he adds what poet and composer have forgotten, what they thought too general, what they have not satisfactorily individualized. But through this wonderfully active individualization, Roger often forgets the essential characteristic of tragic style; he weaves genre-pictures into the drama. Upon the whole the manner in which Roger conceives his tragic parts does not remind us of the historical, classical style of the old French tragedy, but of that modern school of historical genre-painting, now so much in vogue with French artists, but attempted only by a few as yet, to our knowledge, in the dramatic art. Perhaps the circumstance that Roger began his career in comic opera, for a long time gave himself entirely up to it, and only commenced much later to use his powers in tragic, will give us a useful hint. For even in tragic opera the comedian appears in him, wherever the situation allows.

Several of the greatest tragic actors have commenced their career as comedians. While tragedy is apt to lead to mere declamation, comedy produces a finer portraying of individual character. He who has acquired the art of acting by means of comedy is armed with the best protective against the very contagious disease of over-declamation. To be sure, this is a severe cure, and only a strong, really artistic mind can stand it. And for such a one, just on this account, it proves the more effectual. Roger treats the music in comic opera just as the French comedian treats the dialogue. He strives for single musical points, he concentrates the musical expression just in the place where it seems necessary to him, as in an epigram, he sings waggishly, jocosely, and—if the expression be not too daring wittily, not humorously. By his charming play he excites the powers of the intellect, mingling but rarely a flavor of graceful sentimentality. A German singer of the same rank would, notwithstanding all the witty points, in the end appeal to the secrets of the heart. French comic art is based on the idea of wit, the irony of form, the satire of outward deeds and appearances; German comic art upon the idea of humor, that is, the satire of the inner nature of man.

In Germany, the public was struck by the manner in which Roger treated even the purely musical portion of the comic opera. Having heard nothing similar before, it had nothing to compare him with, and, therefore, perhaps unjustly considered him as superior in his comic parts. For, even if it happens very seldom that we hear a German singer sing with humor, it was totally unheard of that such a one should sing wittily. Roger makes his points even in the coloring of the tone; he imparts to it, according to the circumstances, a tinge of whining or of bawling, or he lets the tone sink to the tuneless recitative, in order then suddenly to jerk it up to the highest power, by which means he produces such a drastic comicality, that we can not avoid laughing at passages which to judge from their rendering by German singers, we should never have dreamed to be comic. As the caricature purposely introduces misshapen figures in order to obtain the appearance of the ridiculous, so Roger boldly brings in what, under other circumstances, we should consider as a fault in vocal execution.

Roger sings entirely like a Frenchman; but he avoids French mannerism, elevating it by the power of his style. His singing is declamation; all French music, from Philidor to Halevy, wherever it was truly original, was at bottom more than declamation. It is true, indeed, that Roger, as far as regards science, was formed in the Italian school; but if you overlook the portamento, the intonation, in fact all that must be considered as acquired, as study, his whole delivery belongs to the French declamatory style. He avails himself of the mechanical advantages of the pure Italian school, in order thereby to render clearer and purer the true French mode of delivery. In fact, there are good singers of two kinds. The first sing in opera for the sake of the music; for the other, the music is only a means for the purpose of dramatic action. On the one side are the Italians, on the other the French and Germans. But Roger sings in such a manner that you at last entirely forget that he is singing. You consider his singing as his natural language. No doubt, there are singers with more colossal voices than that of Roger—singers with more dazzling exterior art, but perhaps none who by their singing make us forget that they are merely singing, so completely as Roger.

People have wondered that Roger sometimes uses so little voice. Just as if an opera character were for the voice, and not rather the voice for the character. How childishly they yet judge concerning the delivery in the musical drama! The time has long gone by when it was demanded of an actor that he should constantly use the full power of his voice; it is well known that just the timely dropping of the voice adds much to the heightening of dramatic expression. Nobody at the present time thinks of estimating the artistic worth of SEYDELMANN or of DOERING* by the power of his voice. But in opera they still do so. The public thereby places itself upon the same grade of criticism towards the opera as it occupied a hundred years ago in respect to the drama, when the audience always applauded, above all things, the loudest tones of the actors.

During the last century, notwithstanding many backward movements, the opera has adopted more from the drama. A further cultivation of the opera is indeed only practicable in such a manner that it may take the more individual characteristic from the drama and amalgamate it with its own organization. Roger has placed himself upon the boundary stone of the new epoch. Formerly when actors and singers sat together at the festive table, it was customary that an actor should bring a toast to the prosperity of the opera, and in return, a singer to the success of the drama. And during this ceremony each party shook their fists, under the table, at the others, and wished them in a place not to be mentioned to ears polite. There was a deep truth, and, at the same time, a bitter irony in this ancient custom. In course of time, however, it has ceased. In the time of Faustina Hasse, the composer cared, by the simplicity and naturalness of his vocalization, that the physical means of the singer should be able to finish the opera. Nowadays the singer himself must care for this by using his voice in an economical manner. In considering the opera as a musical drama, however, this external necessity is also justified aesthetically. Thus Roger knows to save the power of his voice exclusively for the decisive points in the drama, and thereby acquires a tenfold effect for it. For although it already possesses great intensity of tone, naturally, still it would never be considered as among the first in power, if the singer by his wise economy did not practice a very allowable deception upon us. And then when we hear the full power of his chest-voice suddenly come forth, we believe ourselves transported back to that old time of vocal wonders when Balthazar Ferri could with the greatest ease take passages of fifty seconds' duration in one breath; when Farinelli was able to sing with such power as to drown the fortissimo notes of the loudest trumpet. And then, also, we can believe the assertion of one of our best teachers, Nehrlich, when he says that it is only the laziness and stupidity of our present singers which make them declare such deeds of the masters of the olden time to be impossibilities, mere fables.

The art of increasing the force of the voice far above its natural power rests, with Roger, however, not only upon this wise economy of his. He also possesses the power of using, according as the text requires, entirely different kinds of voice; now the soft metallic tone of the Dstring of the violin; now the sharp, piercing toneless notes of the vox humana of the organ; now again the crashing trumpet-sounds of the tenor's fullest chest voice, or the sweet flute tones of his falsetto. The actress RACHEL made a similar use of different kinds of voice, in a masterly manner in the Alexandrine verses of French tragedy. On the German ear this has a singular effect; for it seems as if the verses were being sung in a sort of primitive chant of nature. In an opposite manner the same thing appears in Roger, so that it seems as if, in his musical tones, the performer were speaking the natural language of tragedy. Thus, even here, the favorite modern idea of the fraternization of opera and drama finds its realization. Roger, the singer, is to such an extent an actor that he usually abstains from painting, lest the finesse of the play of his countenance should be destroyed by the red color. The ancient opera hero, who came upon the stage with a dozen arias in one evening, was only satisfied with himself when his appearance was imposing. With Roger this is not at all so. On the contrary, you see that he was he was in fact not born to be a delineator of heroic characters. Even his outer build obliged him to form that style of historical, genre-painting in tragic opera which marks him so uniquely. He is small in stature, too small for a hero. But when in the second act of Lucia he appears at the top of the steps which lead into the festal hall, his countenance ghastly, his hair standing wildly on end, each motion awfully fixed, and measured, then this horrible figure glows before our eyes, surpassing every thing, so totally does the scene which we see with our mind destroy all proportion for the scene which is before our bodily eyes.—Musical Review and World.

*Celebrated German actors.

W. A. Mozart.

BY OTTO JAHN.—(FOURTH PART.)

I

We do not think we could begin a new annual volume of the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung better than by announcing the appearance of the fourth part of an artistic biography, the equal of which we should seek in vain among the literature of all civilized nations. With the fourth part of this work, Otto Jahn has given the finishing touch to the monument he has erected to the greatest master of any age—a monument which not only like a sculptured memorial, recalls to our mind and renders present to us him in whose honor it was raised, but which breathes intellect and life in every page, and opens the gates by which we arrive at the depths of genius. The work, too, is a monument of the earnest industry peculiar to the scholars of Germany. But, however meritorious industry and labor, together with thorough and conscientious investigation, may be, their invaluable results give the author only a partial right to the acknowledgement and gratitude of his contemporaries. That which, in the eyes of the musician and the lover of art, imparts to the book in its greatest value, is not so much historical as its critically æsthetical contents. The analysis of Mozart's works affords us a clear insight into the master's process of working, for the author penetrates, as far as it is permitted to human eye to penetrate, into the mysterious mode in which genius creates, and then exhibits to us, with conscious clearness, and not with fantastic sentimentality, the perfect beauty of the completed work of art, measuring and proving its truthfulness by the agreement which exists between its purport and its form. A rich treasure of musically æsthetical knowledge is contained in this book, especially in the last part, whose worth, when compared with the shallowness of our present art-philosophy, cannot be too highly estimated. May this treasure be drawn upon every possible manner—that is to say, in the best acceptance of the words—in order that it may become the common property of all establishments for musical education, and in all circles where musical art is loved and practised, as well as in all those where men discuss and gossip about it. It is impossible to find a more powerful antidote against that stupor of healthy feeling for what is musically beautiful, which has overpowered a portion of the youth of the present age, than Mozart's music, the explanation of its essential qualities, and of the reason of its especial beauties, as conditions of musical beauty generally.

Before we notice the rich contents of the fourth part, now before us, we cannot refrain from at once giving, in proof of what we have said, out of the first section (Book four, 12), which treats of Mozart's pianoforte music, a few of the principal passages referring to the sonata (the fundamental form, at the same time, of the symphony, the quartet, &c.)

"After the contrapuntal treatment of a theme in the strictly close style was abandoned, there arose in the development of the sonata, as the starting point, the characteristic extension of certain motives, in opposition to the style with figures and passages, and particularly, side by side with the principal theme, a second theme, independently enounced, and, by sharply defined limits, standing prominently forth, which, in conformity with a rule soon established, commences in the dominant of the principal major key (C major, G major), or on the parallel of the principal minor key (C minor, E flat major), these are the two principal supports of the movement; their farther working out, their connection, by means of intermediate members, and conclusion of the part, were not fixed by rules, except in so far as that the conclusion of the part followed in the dominant. In the place of a more or less elaborated transition into the principal key, came the important second part, the working-out. One or more of the motives used in the first part, or even completely new ones, are subjected to a treatment, at one time more peculiarly harmonic and at another thematic, which—by causing, with vivifying force, blossoms and fruit to spring forth from the germs contained in the former part—heightens the interest, and at the same time, organically effects the return to the first part; here, also, is artistic strength concentrated, geniality and mastery being especially manifested in the modulation and return to the first theme. The repetition of the first part takes place with various modifications partly necessitated by the fact that the second theme now appears in the principal key, in which the movement closes; besides this, there may be introduced changes in the grouping of the separate elements, abridgment or extension of certain details, but especially a lengthening and heightening of the conclusion, which cause the first part repeated to appear as the third, not only as regards its arrangement, but its importance.

"Mozart found these elements and their organisation ready to his hands, but he extended and stamped them in a manner corresponding to his own nature. With him, the second theme, which is here the principal subject of consideration, not only appears as an independent one, as it is always very definitely announced, but, in its whole character, as a counter-theme to the principal one, which, as such, stands out prominently in a remarkable manner from the mass of the whole part. It is in the formation of the themes, however, that Mozart's peculiarity is especially exhibited; its most prominent character is vocal-ity (das Gesangmässige), in which Nägeli (Vorlesungen über Musik, p. 156), in consequence of a one-sided view of the freedom of instrumental music, beheld an abuse of style, and the ruin of pianoforte playing. We may say much more truly that Mozart essentially promoted what Ph. E. Bach considered to be the task of the pianoforte player and composer (I., p. 10), and what Haydn adopted from him, namely, the task of writing vocally. There is a fact too, which is not without significance: Mozart's musical education commenced with vocal music, and his inclination tended towards it in a higher degree than was the case with the composers above mentioned. Just as the pianoforte composer gave up the polyphonic style, and just as it was no longer a question of inventing a theme, to be worked out in certain forms according to rule, but of free melody, capable by its beauty and symmetry, of becoming the satisfactory expression of artistic feeling, song necessarily became the starting point for the formation of melody. We would not say that certain forms created for song should, without more ado, be transferred to the pianoforte; these could only constitute an analogy, and the laws on which they were based must necessarily be applied in conformity with the exigencies of the nature of the instrument. Hence, we never find in Mozart's pianoforte or instrumental compositions generally the forms of the Italian cantilena; a cursory glance at his Italian operas will prove the difference in the treatment of the melody. Where, in the instrumental works, there is an affinity with vocal compositions, it points to German opera, especially Die Zauberflöte, and this is very intelligible, for, in his instrumental music, Mozart gave his feeling the nearest and natural form of expression, without, as in Italian opera, being restricted to any particular form: as, in the German opera, he treated song with the same freedom, the inevitable result was that the forms, already developed, of German instrumental music, presented him, in many points, support and analogies. The general condition of a beautiful melody, as grounded on the mutual relations of interests, rhythms and harmony, were perfectly appreciated in the pianoforte compositions. Each separate melody is completely developed as well as symmetrically organized, and possesses in itself character and significance, an excellence of formal construction, rendered still more striking by that peculiar charm or harmony and delicacy inseparable from Mozart's being. In the execution of such melodies the most beautiful excellence or Mozart's pianoforte-playing, that something which, according to Haydn's assertion, went to the heart, was perhaps especially prominent; it is sometimes astonishing how, for instance, in the concertos, the principal effect is concentrated on the execution of a long, simple, and sustained melody, which he must have understood in a masterly manner.

"To this advance in the song-like and significant treatment of the separate melody is joined an extraordinary richness of melodies generally.

In the place of those connecting members which usually form runs and passages deduced from the principal motives, or introduced independently, Mozart, however, as a rule, substitutes completely developed melodies, and thus wreathes a garland of beautiful melodies, where people had been accustomed to hear merely musical turns.

"Two essential advantages were gained. By this sharp juxtaposition of the developed melodies, the musical phrase, the merely effectuating turn, the simple playing with figures, for the purpose of getting on, was excluded, or, at any rate greatly circumscribed. Such expedients are commonly very rare with Mozart. He mostly uses figures and passages as ornaments twining around and adorning a definite and solid kernel, but not constituting independent members of the whole. When, too, mere formula of transition appear indispensable, he employs them mostly without much ado, just as in architecture the pillar is applied as an artistic motive in such a fashion that its constructional importance is clearly apparent. To this head we must refer the emphatic and broad treatment of the finales, and half finales, which are now so striking that they appear to many people as a specific peculiarity of Mozart's style; they are, however, no such thing; they were, at that period, general, and proceeded from the necessity of being maintained fixedly and definitely in the key, a necessity on which, at that time, especial stress was laid. That composers have become freer in this respect, and learnt to introduce varied, charming, and exciting traditional turns instead of a plump common-place, is an undoubted advance; but that, notwithstanding, Mozart is not deficient in delicate and interesting turns, any one may convince himself by observing his returns to the theme in the second part, and, for instance, merely the richness to which the simple fundamental force of the point d'orgue, is developed, in the most beautiful and most charming modes of appliance.

"The second advantage was the comprehensive clearness of the plan of a musical movement, a clearness which is as intelligible as in an architectural ground-plan, and which, both in great little things, is one of the unalienable excellences of Mozart's art. By means of this, the principal points of a thoroughly developed organization were fixed. These, necessary in themselves and sufficient for the object in view, could in their turn become the points of support for a rich and copious amplification, and before such a detailed and thorough development was possible, it was necessary that the simple scheme should be clearly and securely fixed.

"Mozart has in no wise exhausted the substance of the form of representation thus founded by him; others have merely imitated what he did. Beethoven entered on the intellectual inheritance, and has shown what depth and fullness there lay concealed in it, but whatever astonishing results he may have obtained, all the germs are far from being developed. Our own age, whose invention and skill are preponderantly apparent in interesting and delicate forms of transition, and in a consistent spinning-out of small motives, which can lay claim only to a subordinate place in a great whole, is, above all things, to be reminded of the fact, that well-developed, firmly articulated melodies, should constitute the fundamental elements of a composition.

"In the choice and arrangement of them, so that the one shall set forth the other in the most varied manner, is Mozart's delicate feeling invariably evident. He has the skill more particularly, in some part of the work where we least expect it, to surprise us by a new melody of peculiar beauty, as for instance, immediately after the first theme, which generally causes a certain satisfaction, a completely different motive is introduced. But, above all, he produces an inimitable effect by bringing forward, when everything is tending rapidly to the end, a melody decked out with all the charms of freshness and sweetness, and which not only again excites our interest, but gives a new turn to the whole. To adduce a striking example of this, and one known to every one, I would remind the reader of the first symphony in C major. Who has not, with ever-reviving astonishment, been entranced by the melody introduced at the last, and which, like a gleaming meteor, darts forth a flood of light and gaiety? Similar effects, if not always so brilliant, are by no means rare; they have never been equalled, and, indeed, scarcely attempted by any one else. On the other hand, it cannot be denied that the partiality evinced by Mozart for placing in a strong light the conclusion and some other points, not generally so prominent, injured the second theme properly so called; and which is usually the weakest portion. The cause of this is partly, perhaps, attributable to the fact that, in opposition to the principal theme, it was intended to have a more tender and lighter character; but, compared with the other motives, it is frequently not important enough, and even sometimes produces the impression that it is neglected.

"The further extension of the fundamental scheme thus obtained could not be effected by the interpolation of mere outwardly connecting phrases between the principal members, but by the development of their purport by means of thematic treatment. We have seen above how, by the study of Bach and Handel, Mozart was guided to this course, and this tendency is very decided in later pianoforte compositions. It does not appear, however, as the return to the metrical style (gebundene Schreibart) in certain strict forms, as of the canon and the fugue, but as the free development of those general laws, on which the essential attributes of polyphonic representation and contrapuntal form depend generally. Instrumental and most especially pianoforte music, after it had been freed from the shackles of strict form, was in danger of following one-sidedly the direction of homophonic representation, and thus of becoming shallow. It is one of the services rendered by Mozart that, in the modifications, which the altered character of the conceptions and representation generally, and the nature of the instruments required, he did justice to the polyphonic and thematic mode of treatment in free and beautiful forms. This is apparent, as is natural, more especially in the modulating portions, on which the principal weights necessarily fall, and which, by this treatment, could first obtain due importance. Although Mozart did not bestow on them that extension and powerful elaboration to which they were developed by Beethoven, they yet appear in his works—even when, scantily elaborated, they are still presented as a transition—as the culminating point of the whole movement, on which its motive powers are concentrated in more lively activity. The mode of treatment is free, like the choice of motives brought into play; but it is nearly always essentially a thematic course of treatment, and frequently one very skillfully planned out and intricate, on which the effect depends. Still, at the same time, the harmonic element is by no means thrown into the background—as is well-known, it is here that the boldest and most original modulations are usually found; on a closer observation, however, we shall find that the really vivifying element is the thematizing element, and that the fashioning impulses proceed from this quarter. Thus, there are developed movements full of life, and, if we have not always an overpowering catastrophe, a knot is tied, and we are anxious to see it untied, which it always is, with agreeable certainty and ease.

"The slow movement is, as a rule, founded on the song (das Lied); it is consequently, according to its first plan, frequently bipartite, but the plan has only exceptionally been developed with the breadth and richness which have become usual in the first movement; the single or manifold repetition of the fundamental theme, which, in conformity with the custom at that time, did not often occur without ornament and decoration easily led to a treatment in the fashion of variations. In every case, the first requisite was the invention of a melodious movement, important both in substance and form, which should not be appreciated simply as a motive through the treatment, or from connection with others, but which, of itself, afforded a full and satisfactory expression for sentiment. It has already been noticed (I. p. 577) how the tendency, followed by the feeling of the time, favored the development of exactly such movements, which undoubtedly must be classed among the most beautiful creations even of Mozart. These simple and impressive melodies, beautifully articulated and steadily carried out, which die away, as in a long full breath, redolent of warm deep feeling, without sentimental weakness, appear to be a happy inheritance of that period, which produced likewise the purest strains of our lyric poetry. In the repose by which they are mostly pervaded, the pleasure and satisfaction of artistic creation are superseded in an uncommon manner; in the unlabored and easy way also in which, by a partial working out of the fundamental thoughts, by variations of the latter, by freely introduced and often contrasting under parts, these monuments are built up, without departing from the fundamental tones of feeling first laid down, we perceive how naturally and freely this mode of expression forced its way through the musical sentiment and soared to such a height. Without entering here into the details of the working-out, we may still direct attention to the delicacy and grace with which Mozart, in this case also, understood how to prepare and bring about the conclusion, so as to lead the hearer up to it with a continuous feeling of perfect satisfaction."

Of the Disposition or Vocation for Music.

Considering the importance which we attribute to musical education, and the large demands on time and powers which application to it requires, the question becomes serious; what result can be reasonably expected by each individual from his exertions in this pursuit?

This education, in order to be profitable, assumes certain predispositions in the pupil; and many a person may be drawn into a chain of labors and sacrifices, which, from want of natural appliances, may remain unrewarded. Many indeed, not ungifted individuals, capable of participating to a certain extent in art, being seduced by its charms, devote their whole lives to it and discover too late that their musical power is not sufficient for the profession, although it enables them to increase their enjoyment of art, and to have a deeper inward perception of its richness and beauty. The danger of a grave error, perhaps of a life thrown away, is more considerable to a gifted individual, than to one not so endowed; and even in the minor case of a mere amateur, the question is so important, that we cannot pass it over in a serious view of musical education, although we cannot hope to give a general and particular answer, which shall be in all cases satisfactory.

All men, with extremely few exceptions, have a disposition for music. They have even more disposition than is generally attributed to them; more than they themselves are accustomed to think. But nothing is more common than that this disposition, unrecognized by hesitating prejudice, neglected through idleness and indifference, or led astray by erroneous treatment, should become suppressed. The extremely rare exceptions are manifested by a perfect indifference to music, even to its corporeal effect, or, indeed, in some cases, by a physically perceptible repugnance to it. In this case, pleasurable sensations can be derived from the measure, or from the rhythm only.

It is much more difficult to decide, how far the disposition of any determined individual extends; what may be expected from its cultivation; and whether it be such as to justify the adoption of music as the special vocation of life.

It may be asserted in general, from hundreds of experiments and instances, and from the contemplation of the subject, that

The disposition of each individual is equivalent, and is worth cultivation, in proportion, to the pleasure felt by the individual in the art itself.

The pleasure in the art itself, not in the many subsidiary gratifications it may produce, and which may accompany an artistic life—not, therefore, the caprice of fashion, to learn music because others do—not the vanity of being better educated, nor of gaining the highest prize by redoubled exertion; all these pleasures abandon us, either before or soon after we have accomplished our object; they have been our reward such as it was, but they were not the true pleasures of art, which in the real artist grow with his growth, and are immortal as the soul that feels them. Hence, we see so many scholars, discontinuing, as soon as the days of instruction are past, all connexion with art; and hence, also, many a master, when his daily task is done, drags on the burthen of a weary life in an unloved profession, in useless sighs or resigned indifference.

But that the disposition exists in the proportion of our love of art, will be confessed by every keen observer of experience; and even without experience, we might infer that such would be the fact, since it would be purposeless to have a faculty implanted in us, which we have no power of calling into action.

He who takes pleasure in music, will soon try to imitate it; as we may remark in the youngest children, who generally sing, after their fashion, before they speak. It is chiefly in the means of musical employment, from ignorance of technicalities, that errors occur. A person may be seized with a desire to sing, but have only an indifferent voice, or rather, more probably, whose voice has been injured; or he may devote himself to an instrument, for the performance on which he is deficient in power or in corporal structure. But even in this latter case, nature will often maintain her rights, if the musical desire be original (not instilled or caught from example), and the insufficient organ will at last be developed, or it will be sustained by other powers, and completed or replaced. In all such cases, however, it is advisable to seek counsel from the skilled in the matter.

If, apparently contrary to our views, the disposition for and pleasure in music be so often concealed, or, indeed, seemingly absent,—or, if the advance or delay of the learner vary from our expectations, we shall be led to acknowledge the probability of our departure from the system required by nature for education in music, in addition to our doubtful judgment, as to the musical disposition. This disposition is composed of several powers, which are sometimes found singly, and sometimes in combination, but each of which must be separately sought and nourished, long before musical instruction, commonly so called, begins. We must come to a clear understanding upon these points. They are decisive as to the question, whether music ought to be comprehended within the course of our occupations, and very important in the consequences of its admission.

Every participation in music presupposes that it makes some pleasurable impression either corporeal or mental. The most immediate is that which is produced by the mass of sound, or any particularly agreeable character of sound, the crash of a brass band, or the silvery tone of a little bell, &c. It is simply of an elementary and material nature, and warrants no mental participation, and therefore no mental disposition. It is only in the higher region that the spiritual effect of sound is perceived, and the corporeal sensations then show themselves to be a distinct portion of the disposition for art.

Our attention is next called to motion, measure, and rhythm. A deep meaning may be in rhythm; and the forms of bars are susceptible of endless variety, whereby significance is endeavored to be shown. The groundwork of all this is the placing or distribution of more or less emphatic moments in equal measures of time. Rhythm and measure depend upon the fixing or estimating one tone to be twice, four times, or half, one fourth part, &c., as long as another. The process is facilitated by placing together parcels of moments collectively equal (though unequal among themselves) into equal divisions of time, which time within the divisions is divided in the simplest manner possible, by two or three, forming the bars of two or three parts, or of more parts in the same ratio. This is a matter merely of the understanding, of measuring and reckoning. The distinguishing of the chief and secondary parts of the bar, by accentuating the first, is also purely mechanical. We may therefore consider the rhythmic disposition to be within the capacity of any rational being. We may conclude further, from the multitudes of raw recruits who march in exact time, and of threshers, who wield the flail in perfect three or four-part order, that the idea that men in general are defective in the perception of measure in time, is a mere prejudice.

A higher qualification, quite distinct from the preceding, is the perception of tone; the capability of distinguishing different tones, and of forming a determined and more or less durable conception of their relation to each other.

The pitch, or height or depth of a tone, is represented scientifically by the number of vibrations of the sounding body which produces it. Leibnitz has even described Music (mathematically considered) as a concealed mental arithmetic, making unconscious calculations. But it seems more probable that the immediate apprehension of tones depends on a sympathy between the nerves of the hearer and the vibrations of the sounding body. The vibrations, however, of even inanimate bodies, produce sounds in other bodies similarly tuned; and moreover, call forth different but related sounds; and we find also, that trained or imitating birds, and the youngest infants, when they begin to learn singing or whistling from us, become imbued with, and can reproduce tones and successions of tones simply from hearing them.

Hence we may presume that also the faculty of a musical ear is common to most, if not to all men, so far as they can hear at all. But in this particular quality, the degrees of endowment are widely different, according to inward disposition or foreign assistance. The Author has never met with an instance of any person incapable of perceiving the difference between low and high; but it is common to find persons unable to distinguish with certainty a tone from half a tone, a third from a fourth, or a fourth from a fifth, until after some instruction and practice. Smaller intervals, as for example, a comma, or even what is called a quarter-tone, are often unappreciable to otherwise gifted musicians, especially pianists; while on the other hand, the finest gradations are usually perceptible to persons not possessed of any considerable musical qualifications, such as experimenters in acoustics, and pianoforte-tuners, who have educated the ear to such minute discrimination.

It is very common to confound this appreciation of sounds, with talent for music; or at least to consider it as an indication of that talent. This, however, must not be assumed without many allowances. If this faculty be deficient or manifestly feeble, we may certainly suppose that the original powers of the mind have not been applied to the living sounds of music; nevertheless, more than one example can be named of very small or very imperfectly developed appreciation of tone, accompanied by very considerable susceptibility for music.* On the other hand, the keenest perception of tonic differences, is by no means a sign of, nay—it is not essentially necessary for musical talent. Still less are certain external capabilities of this faculty, which are not uncommon, to be considered of any importance. Thus, there are persons not at all remarkable for musical talent, who can carry home with them from the orchestra the pitch of any piece of music, and reproduce it at pleasure. This is certainly not a useless faculty of memory, but it has no connection with deeper powers, and may indeed rather indicate a diminished activity of the imagination, unless it have been acquired by long habituation to the orchestra. On the other hand, it occasionally happens that highly-gifted singers and violinists permit themselves certain deviations from abstract purity of intonation, not from any want of perception, but from an impulse of the original and natural relations of sound, as distinguished from our artificial temperaments, or possibly from exaggerated expression.

If to these fundamental qualifications we add memory for musical compositions, a moderate activity of intellectual comprehension, and a certain degree of courage or confidence, with the necessary dexterity of limb, member, voice and speech,—we shall have assembled all the qualifications necessary for the cultivation of music. We should, however, never delay encouraging the growth of the higher faculties—the sensibility of the mind, and feelings for the significance of compositions, and of the forms of composition, and that direction of the mind which tends to give musical form and embodiment to sensations and ideas—the potent spell and mystery of the poet-musician.

We have thus endeavored to give a determined idea of the disposition for music. It is, as we have seen, a combination of properties, and is therefore found in different states of completeness. It is rarely denied altogether to any individual, but seems to exist in the most diversified gradation and variety. But as aptitude, like every other human faculty, is capable of indefinite extension and improvement, it is never possible, at least in the beginning or before some cultivation, to predict how far we may expect any specified individual to advance. We must return to our original assumption—

Every one will advance or be led so far as his sincere but unalloyed pleasure in music calls him.

He, therefore, who has a susceptibility for music, and feels pleasure in it, may with confidence devote so much time and labor to it as his peculiar calling and circumstances may allow. So long as it is a labor of love with him, it will be a labor profit also; and thus, to such a one, instruction will be no unnecessary nor useless birthren, until the limits of his faculties be attained. And let every one remember, that the chief end of all artistic education is no other than the exaltation of our susceptibility of, and participation in art, for our greater happiness and improvement. In this view, neither will the heated imagination drag us into a professional life against nature and intention; nor will the poor ambition of showy attainments, quite foreign to the true idea of art, rob us of the genuine reward of our exertions.

He, however, who thinks he feels an impulse to devote his entire life to music, should examine seriously whether this impulse be not imaginary; whether it be not rather a feeling of occasional and momentary enthusiasm, than a permanent and steady love for art. Whether the chief inducement be not, perhaps, the apparently unrestrained and joyous tenor of artistic love, or ambition excited by the brilliant career of others. These outward seductive allurements are, for the most part, bitterly repented of when too late. There are, indeed, examples of success attained under such insufficient motives, but rarely accompanied by inward satisfaction, and generally embittered by the loss of the real pleasure of art, and of bodily health.

Those, finally, who consider themselves called upon to adopt composition as a profession for life, should undergo a most rigid self-examination. Their calling is the highest, but it is also the most exacting and uncertain; and no one can counsel them with well-grounded decision. No person ought to dedicate himself to this branch of the profession, unless constrained by every impulse of his soul; no one who can endure with patience any other occupation—who is not willing to sacrifice, for the satisfaction of that vehement and restless vocation, all the security and comfort of his existence, and who cannot look with firmness on the chance of missing the chief aim of all his exertions. Such a vocation is generally, if not always, indicated in early years, by fanciful prelude, and attempts at composition. He who waits to compose, until he has learned the rules of composition, will rarely, if ever, be a composer. It is also to be considered, that a disposition thus early manifested, and in some degree fostered and nourished, has had time for development before the application of scientific rules,—that it is therefore in a more expanded and invigorated state, and gives the scholar the inestimable advantage of many imaginings and experiences, whereby confidence has been acquired, equally remote from timidity and from presumption. This advantage, however, is not indispensable. True love and perseverance, although later in the field—but not too late—may still gain the victory.

A composer by profession will, however, soon discover that his occupation cannot be the exclusive business of life, for the simple reason, that no one can compose always. Poetry, whether in tones, or words, or colors, demands the most vivid moments only of our existence; and with all the requirements for its production and exhibition, must still leave much of our lives in vacancy; the brightest and richest genius has no other destiny; neither would any be endurable. Further still from the student, must be the vain and unhallowed hope of obtaining a competence by his productions. The greatest artists, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, were not able to accomplish that object. Such, indeed, has been sometimes effected by fashionable composers of the Italian Opera, patronized by the caprice of prime donne, but then only in advanced age. A subsidiary occupation has always been found necessary to a composer, such as singing, playing, conducting, or teaching; and notwithstanding the hindrance or hurthen this occupation may perhaps now and then seem, it will be found a salutary and invigorating companion. Each of these occupations has a favorable and important aspect to the composer—one or more of them he must embrace, and this circumstance should have due weight in the choice of the profession.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

* This seems to be particularly the case among the mass of the people of France. In that country, singing is perpetual, and yet it is, in an incredible proportion, false and unsteady in tone. The small development of the musical faculties, in this instance, seems to arise from the manner of life, more external than intellectual, of the nation. It is indicated by the circumstance, that, notwithstanding general education and a great susceptibility for music, so few great composers have been produced in France, and that the most remarkable advances in art in that country have been occasioned by foreigners, namely, Lully, Gluck, and Spontini. We Germans, however, remember with gratitude that our Gluck acquired his perfection and recognition in the bosom of the refinement and intellectual activity of that highly distinguished nation in his days, and that the susceptibility of that nation has shown an equally noble appreciation of Haydn and Beethoven.

On the Prime Seventh as an Essential Element in the Musical System.

By HENRY WARD POOLE, Engineer, Boston.

It is now ten years, since, by original investigation in the mathematical, mechanical, and practical departments of music, I was led to the belief that this science was a solid foundation in the relations of numbers, and that all the supposed impossibility of Just Intonation and the necessity of Temperament, have their origin only in the short-sightedness of the theorist, and the unskillfulness of the practitioner.

Having settled upon the rule that musical ratios must not exceed a certain limit of simplicity (the limit to be determined by the ability of the ear to appreciate them), it was stated* that those ratios only were admissible which were derived from the prime numbers 2, 3, 5, and 7. That the three lower primes 2, 3, and 5, belong to the musical system has been universally admitted; but no one, before myself, so far as I know, has made this claim for the prime seven.†

The interval 4:7 derived from the prime seventh has not been unnoticed, as a curiosity in acoustics; and it is occasionally referred to as the "Za" of Tartini. A living writer,‡ whose statements are entitled to the highest respect, and whose works contain most able arguments in favor of Just Intonation, says of the sounds produced from the prime seventh: "They may be called anomalous. They are wheels, but not wheels which will fit in with the previously constructed parts of the machine, and therefore they are left on one side."

The sound 4:7 has been known to be the seventh harmonic of the horn and æolian string, but has been called a "false" note, and has been rejected even by the advocates of just intonation, as opening the way for inextricable complication in theory and practice. It will from this, appear necessary to make the declaration which is the subject of this paper, and which is as follows:

The Prime Seventh belongs to the Musical System; its ratios are altogether appreciable by the common ear; and are in constant use in common music. It is this which constitutes, when added to the common chord, the concord (falsely called the discord) of the Seventh, and this element, combined with the other prime chords of Octave, Fifth, and Major-Third, makes the great variety of noble harmonies in which cultivated and uncultivated ears delight.

The prime seventh is necessary to complete the series of simple ratios, which extend as far as 10; and it was by noticing the blanks which its omission would leave that its necessity was discovered. The series is as follows:

1:2, 2:3, 3:4, 4:5, 5:6, [6:7, 7:8] 8:9, 9:10 or, if written as below, we shall have the natural series of harmonics, or what may be called the primary or HARMONIC SCALE.

1:2:3:4:5:6:7:8:9:10.

As some reason should be assigned to the mathematician for not extending the series by the introduction of the Prime Eleventh, it will be found in the inability of the human ear to appreciate such complicated relations. The "Chord of the Eleventh" exists in nature, and I am able to tune it and to recognize its harmony in combinations specially made for the experiment; yet, so far as my examination of the works of the masters has extended, it has not been used by them in their written music, and perhaps never, unless possibly in the harmonics of a Paganini. I do not claim for it a place in our practical system of music, but leave it where all the former theorists have set the Prime Seventh. The Eleventh may hereafter be admitted, when the musical faculties of men have been sharpened by familiarity with the more simple concords in their purity, and when music is carried to a higher degree of refinement.

From the Harmonic scale may be derived, by combination of its chords, an indefinite variety of other scales. The Octave is divided into eight intervals, which are convenient for melodic use, and the result is popularly called the Diatonic Scale, which, although generally taken as the basis, in explaining music, is not a primary, but a secondary Scale. The method of forming it, according to all former treatises, is to take common chords (4:5:6) upon the tonic, dominant, and subdominant. Thus, the scale of C is tuned by taking a Fifth and Major-Third on C, on G, and on F, and bringing all the notes within the same octave.

But the introduction of the prime seventh allows of another division, in which only two fundamentals are employed; namely, the Tonic (E) with its common chord, (C, E, G) and the Dominant (G), on which is taken the chord of the seventh and ninth (G, B, D, F, A) in the ratios 4:5:6:7:9. To distinguish these scales, I have called the first Triple Diatonic, and the last the Double Diatonic. Assuming the tonic or the keynote, as C, with 48 vibrations, the two scales will stand as follows:—

TRIPLE DIATONIC.

(With common Chord on C, on G and on F.)

C	D	E	F	G	A	B	C
48	54	60	64	72	80	90	96

DOUBLE DIATONIC.

(With common Chord on C: and Chord of 7 and 9 on G.)

C	D	E	(F)	G	(A)	B	C
48	54	60	63	72	81	90	96

It thus appears that the fourth and sixth notes may be taken differently in intonation; and that this is done, can be easily observed by giving attention to singers. The Triple Diatonic has but three different intervals, namely, 8:9, 9:10 and 15:16. The Double Diatonic has, in addition, two others; namely, 20:21, and 7:8; and in combinations its variety is greatly superior to the Triple Scale, whose chords and intervals are rather duplicates of one another.

And the remarkable fact is, that this Double Diatonic, which no theorist has defined, is more in practical use than the Triple, which stands in all the elementary books. A familiar example of the former is the "O dolce Concerto" of Mozart, and the principal movement of the "Dead March in Saul" of Handel. The melody of the "Hundredth Psalm" is the Triple Diatonic. The two scales often interchange, and an example of this is to be found near the close of "O dolce Concerto," where for a single measure the dominant seventh and ninth yield, to admit the fourth and sixth of the Triple Scale.‡

If it be feared that the distinctions which have been described as belonging to the scale will complicate it for those learning to sing or play, let it be added, that singers naturally observe them all, and need have no other instruction than to hear the sounds given by the teacher. What is here set down is of interest to him who wishes to know what is, and what ought to be done. It may not be necessary for the singer to be even told the dimensions of any of his intervals; and it perhaps does no harm (except to the one who utters the falsehood) to say that all intervals are compounded of "semitones" or artificial twelfths of the octave.

It is true that when all the four primes have furnished their numerous chords and intervals, we shall have assembled a large number of notes, and it is not impossible that those unacquainted with music may fear that the number will be unmanageable, and prefer the compromises and limitations of temperament. As the experiment has been practically made, such persons may be assured that the musician can most easily produce his desired effects, when he has the full and abundant materials which the system of just intonation gives him.

The singers and players upon the free instruments, of their own accord, use the true intervals to the best of their ability; and in spite of the tempered instruments with which they are sometimes obliged to join. It is for men of science to indicate to the makers of imperfect instruments the way to perfect them; and to withhold their approval from players, who, from indolence or incapacity, only make a pretence of interpreting the music of the great masters. There are wanted no more apologies for, or speculations upon, the choice of temperaments; that subject has long ago been exhausted; and nothing more can be done than is now done with twelve tempered notes in the octave. When some economical astronomer shall propose to reduce the bulk and expense of the Nautical almanac, by sacrificing that accuracy which gives it priceless value, the men at Greenwich will regard him as the scientific musician will, at a future day, look on those who would restrict him to the meagre and barbarous system of temperaments of twelve notes. —Mathematical Monthly.

* American Journal of Science, Second Series, Vol. IX. pp. 68, 199.

† I do not wish to conceal the fact, that even now the principle of just intonation (or the possibility, in theory or practice, of exact fifths, thirds, &c.,) is denied by high mathematical authorities. Sir J. F. W. Herschel, in his treatise on Sound, declares, that singers, violin players and others who can pass through every gradation of tone, must all temper, or they could never keep in tune with each other or themselves. [The work of Herschel not being at hand, this extract is copied from the treatise on Sound, by Professor Benjamin Peirce of Cambridge, who has reproduced (with his indorsement, it is presumed,) these and like views of Herschel.] By a late letter from Sir John Herschel, dated Collingwood, June 14th, 1859, addressed to the Musical Pitch Committee, at the Society of Arts, he evinces his continued belief in Temperament as inherent in music, and his opinion that this temperament gives some peculiar character to the different signatures or keys in music in general. He says, in regard to the concert pitch:—

"All are desirous that when once lowered, it should be kept from rising [1] again, to which there is a continual tendency arising from a distinct natural cause inherent in the nature of harmony; namely, excess (amounting to about eleven vibrations in ten thousand) of a perfect fifth over seven-twelfths of an octave, which has to be constantly contended against in upward modulations, whenever violins or voices are not kept in check by fixed instruments. But perhaps all are not aware that the evil of fine ancient compositions having thus been rendered impracticable to singers in their original normal key involves the sacrifice of the adaptation of the peculiar character of the key (a character intended and felt by the composer), and the substitution of a totally different incidence of the temperament [2] in the series of notes in the scale, and goes therefore to mar the intended effect, and injure the composition, as much as an ill-chosen tone of varnish would damage the effect of a fine Titian."

1. There is nothing better to test the "natural tendency" in this respect than a good glee-club without accompaniment. If they start with too low a keynote and are in good spirits, the tendency will be to rise to the better pitch. It does not appear that temperament affects the concert pitch.

2. Observe the same glee-singers. They sing in every key with the same relative intervals, and do not use a "different incidence of temperament," in different keys. Did any composer of glees wish such temperament? If so he should indorse his score something after this manner: "Four flats, equal temperament" (as the composers of fugues for the organ have actually done;) or "Four flats, with a great wolf in A flat, and a whelp in E flat."

I only desire here to put on record for historical reference the most respectable authorities of this day against Just Intonation, and to prove that the views I put forth have such opponents, and hence need to be told.

‡ Gen. T. Perronet Thompson. Just Intonation. p. 72. 2d Edition. London, 1857. See also his "Exercises, Political and Others." London. 1843. 6 vols. Both are in the Boston Athenæum.

§ In view of the numerous names required, and to supply those needed for these unnamed intervals, I have proposed (at least for mathematical and theoretical uses) names derived from the ratio. A fifth then will be "two-three," a major-tone "eight-nine," a diatonic semitone "fifteen-sixteen," the interval (unnamed) between the third of the scale and the dominant seventh, is the "twenty-twenty-one." The next interval (dom. seventh to fifth) is the "seven-eight." This proposition as yet needs the approval of other theorists. The desideratum is accuracy and clearness.

¶ Not to disfigure these mathematical pages with musical types, I have chosen examples with which every one is familiar. Every composition will furnish others. If a choice is to be made in the examples of the profuse employment of the prime seventh, there may be taken any of the vocal scores of Haydn, Mozart, or Rossini.

Musical Correspondence.

ST. LOUIS, JUNE, '61.—This article is headed St. Louis for obvious reasons, although I am in the beautiful village of Penn Yan, Yates county, New York, and am improving the first day of country leisure by giving you an account of our last concert for this year.

PART I.

1. Finale from "First Symphony"..... Beethoven
2. Chorus, from "Les Huguenots"..... Meyerbeer
3. Cavatina, "Tamo slocome gli angeli"..... Cantameri
4. Andante from "Second Symphony"..... Beethoven
5. Sextette, from "Lucia" (by general request)..... Donizetti

PART II.

1. Overture, "Leonore"..... Beethoven
2. Chorus, "Bone Jesu"..... Palestrina
3. Duo for two Flutes, "Rondo brillante"..... Furstenau
4. Sextette and Chorus, from "Nabucco"..... Verdi
5. Duo from "Puritan"—"Suoni la Tromba"..... Bellini
6. Overture, "Jubilee," introducing the Air: "God Save America"..... C. M. von Weber

It was a sight calculated to awaken many reflections, to see all, forget for a few brief moments, their politics, which would cause us almost to cut each others throats, and sit down together for the last time this year to listen to the glorious old music. Over 2,700 were in that room, and the concert gave more than satisfaction, if possible, than any before. At the conclusion of the Jubilee Overture the enthusiasm exceeded all prescribed bounds, and "God Save America" caused such a commotion as never I saw before in that city. Ladies waved handkerchiefs, gentlemen cheered till they could articulate no longer. There is no mistaking the feeling. No other tune could have done it, and tears of joy stood in more than one eye.

The orchestra part was perfect almost. The Over- (Leonore) was admirably performed, especially the latter part; the orchestra numbering sixty-seven. The Andante (Second Symphony) was also fully up to the standard. In short could you have been present and heard what our Society, only one year old did, you would give us all the credit we claim for energy and talent.

The Cavatina was sung by Miss McGonegal, the "Soprano solo" of the evening. Miss Annie Dean sang the part of Lucia in the Sextette assisted by Miss Harlock, and Messrs. Sabatzky, Catherwood, Barrel and Pfeiffers. Miss McGonegal and Miss Dean even exceeded the anticipations of their friends. I hope my praise will be believed and taken without discount, for I am only the cool critic. I am not acquainted with any of the members of this Society whose names appear in your paper, and never see them save at these concerts. I only wish to have their real talents known and appreciated. This Society has developed fifty times the amount of talent I ever supposed was in the city. The Sextette and chorus (Nabucco) was sung by Miss Tourney. Mrs. Allen of whom I intend particularly to speak in a future article on "Church Music"—Miss Foster, Sabatzky, Spalding and Zell.

The "Duo" by Catherwood and Capen—in in which Catherwood gained fresh laurels by that voice of his.

The rehearsals will continue all summer. The money matters are all right—and you know how important that is. The next concert will be in October, unless Missouri and her people should be involved in a common ruin. This is no place for a political essay. Yet upon politics depends now the existence of our Society. Missouri is outwardly calm, but how long she will remain so, no one can tell. Indications are for peace, and I see by the papers that the eleven Kansas regiments have "resolved to discountenance any invasion of Missouri for the present." No one feels a deeper interest in Missouri than I do, but she could easily now bring upon herself a ruin, swift as the thunderbolt and appalling to think of.

My next article on "Churches and Church Music" will be ready in a few days; subject, "Trinity Church," Episcopalian. BROWN.

Max Maretzek commenced his operatic season in the city of Mexico, April 13th, and we learn the prospects were encouraging. The new basso Bischi, is highly spoken of, and the sisters Natali are also warmly praised.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Our readers can hardly, in these times, ask even an apology for a thinly spread banquet at the Editorial table. Concerts are ended, here and everywhere; operas are unheard of and unheard; correspondents have buckled on their armor and are thinking of other things; exchanges even, to a considerable extent, have suddenly fallen off, under the government regulation withdrawing the mail service from the Southern States. "Trovator" and "—t—" have gone abroad; the "Diartist" is fitting over Europe, now here, and now there, pursuing the faintest shadow of a rumor about his loved Beethoven; the editor, at the last date, wrote from Venice, but seems to have eaten of the Lotus and relapsed into silence in the charmed air of Italy. We hear nothing from any of them, and are left, single-handed, to glean such meagre crumbs of intelligence as we are able, which is all that we can offer. Of such things enough is as good as a feast.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The second concert of the new series of evening concerts, offered the following programme:

1. Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," (Opus 55)..... Beethoven.
 1. Allegro con brio. 2. March Funebre. 3. Scherzo and Minuetto. Finale, Allegro Molto.
2. Overture, "Meeresstille"..... Mendelssohn.
3. Potpourri, from the Opera "La Juive"..... Halvy. By the Germania Band. Arranged by A. Heintze.
4. Polonaise, from "Struensee"..... May-Reber.
5. Duet, "William Tell"..... Rossini.
6. Fackeltanz, (Torchlight Dance)..... Meyerbeer. By the Orchestral Union and Germania Band combined.

It is hard to anticipate the time when any organized body or any individual can engage in any new concert enterprise, so that this series of concerts will probably be the last opportunity for an indefinitely long time, for hearing good music. The chance should not be neglected by any who love good music.

A Baltimore musician has published the Declaration of Independence of the United States, "arranged and adapted for vocal and instrumental music, as the great national chant, and dedicated to the world." The title is embellished with a lithograph of the room in Independence Hall in which the Declaration was signed, and the fourth page contains fac similes of the signatures of the signers.

Music Abroad.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—"The projected Leeds Musical Festival for 1861 has been abandoned, a resolution to this effect having been passed at a special meeting of the Committee held on Thursday last. The causes which have decided the Committee to take so important a backward step, are—the visit of the Royal Agricultural Society to Leeds a few weeks only prior to the time fixed for holding the Festival; the dullness of trade consequent on the American crisis; the exorbitant demand made by vocalists whose services are considered indispensable; the meeting of the British Association at Manchester during the first week in September, being the identical days of the proposed Leeds Festival; the resignation (from illness) of Mr. Walker Joy, one of the hon. secretaries; and the conduct of the chorus-master with respect to the selection of a chorus.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—We annex the programme of the fifth concert.

PART I.—Sinfonia in C, No. 1 (Beethoven); Recit. and aria, "Zum Liedn," Mad. Rieder, Zaubersflöte (Mozart); Fantasia appassionata, John, M. Vieuxtemps (Vieuxtemps); Scena and romanza, Signor Delle Senie, Ma.ia Padilla (Donizetti); Overture, Freischütz (Weber).

PART II.—Sinfonia in G minor (Mozart); Aria, Signor Delle Sedie, "Deh, vieni alla finestra" (Mozart); Concerto in D minor, pianoforte, Signor Nacciarone (Mendelssohn); Duet, "Ai Capricci," Mad. Rieder and Signor Delle Sedie (Rossini); Overture, F. Alcade de la Vega, (Onslow). Conductor, Professor Sternedale Bennett, Mus. D.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—At the second opera concert, on Friday week, Madame Grisi made her first appearance this season. Her voice, though showing signs of wear and tear, has lost none of its charm, and the first movement of "Qui la voce" was listened to by a very numerous and fashionable company with great delight. The Cabaletta was delivered in that perfect manner which has for years been Madame Grisi's characteristic, though, perhaps, only less brilliant than when it issued in time past from the same lips. The prima donna's other song was "Home, sweet home." It was sung in English, and was encored.

PARIS, MAY 17, 1861.—The Univers Musical publishes two items, side by side, that show the two extremes of artist life.

1. "One of the most celebrated artists of Germany, Joseph Staudigl has just died in a hospital of Vienna, where he has been since 1854. The concourse of people at his obsequies was so great that the body had to be exposed in the court of the hospital that the crowd might be allowed to go through the ceremony of sprinkling holy water.

"This manifestation of popular sympathy honors the artist who has deserved it more than it shows the solicitude on the part of the Austrian administration for art and artists."

2. "The pretensions of singers have no more bounds. The celebrated cantatrice Czillag lately demanded from the director of the theatre of Vienna 10,000 florins a month for an engagement of eight months, that is to say, 40,000 florins more than the apauage of an archduke."

The authors of the five plans that were rewarded at the late concourse for the construction of a new opera house have been invited by the Minister of State to present other plans. The time allotted is, however, pronounced to be too short as the designs must be handed in by June 15.

We have had a concert at the "Italiens" this week rich enough to inspire a just amount of enthusiasm even in this fault-finding capital. It was given by the "Société de l'union des Artistes," on last Tuesday. The orchestra numbered over eighty members, the chorus sixty. The general director of the concert was M. Tilmant director of the orchestra of the Conservatoire. With such artists as Roger, Cazaux, Gourdin, Mlle. Rey, success was assured.

The programme presented the following, unpublished as well as published music, it will be seen:

PART I.

Meeres-Stille and Glückliche Fahrt, Mendelssohn
Benedictus from Mass in Re..... Beethoven
Allegro from Concerto in Re minor, J. S. Bach
Ave Verum (unpublished)..... Gounod
Solo by Mlle. Rey.

Symphonie in La (Andante and Finale)..... Beethoven

Le Jugement Dernier..... Felicien David

PART II.

Fingal (Opera de Concert), words by de Flobert, music by E. Membre—Roger as Fingal, Cazaux as Ullin, Gourdin as Camil and Mlle. Key as Comala.

At the Theatre Lyrique Prince Poniatowski has produced a light opera "Au Travers du Mur,"—different in every respect from his "Pierre de Medicis."

At the Opera Comique "Salvator Rosa" still maintains its vogue. This is the season of benefits and rather mixed representations. To-night Mad Viardot has her benefit at the Lyrique. We are in consequence to have two acts of Gluck's Alceste—one of Otello—a comic operetta Le Buisson Vert by Gastinel. Besides all this Mad. Ristori is to recite Lamartine's Isolément and the fifth canto of the Inferno of Dante.

Speaking of Ristori I am reminded that I have seen in several journals, not French, words of blame on account of what is styled "an abandonment of the artist's native idiom." Now nothing seems farther from Mad. Ristori's thought than to abandon the Italian language. It is but the other day that she appeared again as Medea. To-night I hope to hear her read Dante. A countryman of her's Giacometti is preparing a new play for her. The success of her French Beatrix will assuredly not be sufficient to cause her to neglect the language in which alone she succeeds fully. But she will not stop at French and in a letter has already expressed the wish of appearing before a Spanish audience in a national play acting in Spanish. This may show mastery of language, but it is a dangerous game and may prove destructive of much originality. F. B.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—La Sonnambula, on Tuesday, May 14, was one of the most interesting performances we have witnessed at the Royal Italian Opera. The success of Mlle. Adelina Patti—now, indeed, the principal topic in London Musical circles—took everybody by surprise, except those who had been present at the rehearsal, and who were let into the secret. The reports of American journals, alluded to in our last, although apparently overcharged and extravagant, must really be received as a close approximation to the truth. The writers in the London papers on Wednesday, except in one or two instances, are as high-flown, uncompromising, and enthusiastic in the young artist's praise as their contemporaries of the New Orleans and Philadelphia press, whose articles we have published. Mlle. Patti is even now, at eighteen years of age, in many respects, a great singer. Her voice is beautiful in quality—a real soprano equal in every part of the register, without the slightest tendency to tremulousness, and reaching to F in alt. with astonishing ease. It is, moreover, extremely flexible, and is managed with more than ordinary skill. The young lady, indeed, is almost a thorough mistress of vocalization, and has evidently devoted her whole soul to her profession. One so young and so accomplished on the operatic boards we never heard, and no doubt the highest destiny awaits her in her future career. It would be ungracious just now, after a single hearing, to endeavor to find out faults in Mlle. Patti's method and style. We shall prefer hearing her again before pronouncing an adverse or even qualified opinion on any one point. It is much more agreeable to declare that we were surprised and delighted beyond measure with her performance of Amina, which created the greatest sensation we have known at Covent Garden for years. Mlle. Patti's histrionic—if not so marked as her vocal—powers, everywhere betray the true instinct of genius; and there are some parts of her acting in the Sonnambula which could hardly be surpassed for truth, grace, and intensity of feeling. Her second appearance in the Sonnambula is announced for Wednesday. Signor Tiberini was Elvino, and Signor Tagliafico Count Rudolph.

Don Giovanni was given for the first time this season on Monday—an extra night—and filled the house in every part, as it has never failed to do for many years. Although three of the prominent parts were sustained by foreigners, or more strictly speaking, by non-Italians, the performance recalled old times, and was in most respects worthy the best days of the opera. An ideal Giovanni is hardly to be looked for now, and the comparison of the last new aspirant with Signor Tamburini becomes tiresome perforce of repetition. When we have said that M. Faure has neither the grace nor the spirit of Tamburini, and that his voice has neither the richness nor the flexibility of his renowned predecessor, we have merely stated what might have been assumed in advance by those acquainted with his talent. On the other hand, it may be fairly asserted that, viewed as a whole, the Don Giovanni of the French barytone is superior to any that has been seen on the boards of the Italian Opera since Tamburini retired from the arena of public exhibition. M. Faure has more of the required nobility of presence, and enters more thoroughly into the dramatic exigencies of the character, than nine out of ten who have essayed it during many years past. He has, besides, completely mastered the musical text, and displays an equal degree of fluency in the recitatives—which, being in what is called the "Parlante" style, are extremely trying to a Frenchman—the airs, the duets, and the concerted pieces. His performance, indeed, both in a musical and histrionic sense, is one of level and well-sustained excellence, correct to the utmost nicety of expression, note-perfect, and always prepossessing from its gentlemanly ease and naturalness. It was an unqualified and, what is more, a well-merited success.

Mad. Cailag's Elvira is not only the best the London stage can boast just now, but the best in our remembrance of Don Giovanni. Critical justice, however, has been awarded to this; to the Don Ottavio of Signor Tamberlik; to Signor Tagliafico's Commendatore; and to the Leporello of Herr Fornes, whose last scene is a powerful conception, and upon whom—as was evident from the manner in which he kept his voice under control in all the concerted music—well-intended counsel has not been thrown away. Of Mad. Penco's Donna Anna and the Zerlina of Mad. Miolan Carvalho—both new to the English public—we must speak on another occasion, premising that there is much to call for eulogy in both impersonations. Signor Ronconi's Masetto—one of the most racy and perfect embodiments ever witnessed of a subordinate part—gave unusual strength to the "caste." A character generally thought unworthy the attention of a first-class artist, became, for the first time, one of the most important features in the opera, simply because the admirable Italian barytone (whose versatility is unrivalled) made Masetto what Mozart intended him, a well-defined and complete portrayal, and not the propitious nonentity to which the artists of the Italian stage have accustomed us. The strange association of earnestness and weakness, of the anxious solicitude and genuine desire of a sincere lover, with the awkwardness and imbecility of a boor, worried almost beyond redemption by the insolent invasion of his rights at the hands of a rich and profligate nobleman, was depicted to the very life; and although Signor Ronconi in his long career has played many more arduous parts, he certainly never distinguished himself more honorably.

Hymns and Choirs.

From a work published at Andover, entitled Hymns and Choirs, which contains many excellent æsthetic ideas on the important subjects of Hymnology and Congregational singing,—we copy the closing directions. They contain some things inapplicable to our service (Episcopal); but in those things which do apply they are excellent. They also show that in many other Christian denominations, our own church ideas are being adopted; as, for example, in the 1st, 2d, 3d, 14th, and 15th.

These changes are mainly due to the learning, taste, and conservatism of Dr. Lowell Mason, who has not only imparted general instruction, but has never failed to alter and improve his own idea on the subject of Congregational singing, upon good cause.

1. The congregation should stand when they sing.
2. They should rise, simultaneously and promptly, when the organist, in giving out the tune, has reached the beginning of the last line.

3. They should stand, in the usual attitude of worship, facing the pulpit.

4. If the help of a choir of singers, well disposed toward congregational singing, can be secured, they may be of great use in leading the congregation. But if the congregation are not led by a choir, they should be led by a precentor.

5. The organ and choir precentor should be in front of the congregation, near the pulpit, and on the same level with the pews.

6. Children should be instructed in singing, at home and in the schools, and should be encouraged to sing with the congregation.

7. The greater part of the congregation, male and female, should sing upon the treble of the tunes. It is indispensable that there be men's voices in this part.

8. Let the hymns and tunes that are used be made familiar by frequent rehearsals, both in public and in families.

9. Use any given hymn always with the same tune.

10. Use a book in which the hymn and tunes are upon one page.

11. Let the singing be in steady uniform time from the beginning to the end of the hymn, without any noticeable acceleration or slackening of the time.

12. Let there be no forced pauses for the observance of punctuation, nor any needless delay at the end of the lines.

13. Let there be no labored effort after "expression" by means of frequent and sudden changes from soft to loud and the reverse, or by the swelling and tapering of the voice, or by studied accentuation.

14. The connection of the hymn should not be broken by organ interludes, or needless, long pauses.
15. The singing of a familiar hymn will often be more spirited if the reading of it from the pulpit is omitted.

16. Use tunes that are strictly congregational in their structure. But, until these are learned, it may be advisable to use such choir tunes, judiciously selected, as are already familiar.—Banner of the Cross.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Cavalier's Serenade. W. Lee Apthorp. 25

Words from Mrs. Stowe's new novel "Agnes of Forevento." The setting shows taste and musical ability.

Jonathan, what say? Patriotic Song. 25

Turning on the war. There is a pretty touch of humor in it. The music is easy and intended to offer as little difficulty as possible. The melody is good.

Ellen of the Lea. Song. S. Glover. 25

One of those cheerful, pretty, little songs, which, next to his sparkling Duets, have made Glover's name familiar to young singers. As a lesson it will be found both useful and appropriate, as the words are free of ought objectionable.

Once more upon the sea. F. Buckley. 25

If a few good singers find out this ballad, whose prettiness is striking and undeniable, it cannot fail to become popular.

Give me thy blessing, dear mother. Cherry. 30

A boy going off to sea is taking leave of his mother. There is a sort of naturalness about this song, which makes it quite touching. The title-page is handsomely illustrated.

Instrumental Music.

Brindisi from "Traviata." Transcribed. A. Baumbach. 35

A brilliant arrangement of the famous air, of medium difficulty.

Fest March, for three performers on one Piano. T. Bissell. 35

Nothing is better calculated to make pupils good timists than to make them take part in four or six hand pieces, the latter being even preferable to the former. For this purpose Gungl's well known and strongly marked Fest March, in this clever arrangement, makes a very good piece.

German Choral, "Mach's mit mir," for the Organ. Fischer. 25

This piece is quite a curiosity for the student of harmony and counterpoint. It is a masterpiece of contrapuntal writing. The piece is written in three parts, of which the treble sustains the melody of the choral (Cantus firmus) while the other two perform a canon, the second beginning it, and the bass imitating a seventh lower, note for note, to the end, being always half a bar behind the second.

Books.

CAMP SONGS. 10

This is a collection of all the popular National Songs, with several home favorites, published in a very neat and convenient style. It will serve to enliven the soldier's life, and will prove a source of much enjoyment and recreation to all into whose hands it may fall.

BIRD'S VOCAL MUSIC READER. 12

This is the first number of a series of instruction books in vocal music, prepared by J. Bird, author of the "Singing School Companion," and is designed for quite young pupils, to whom it will prove useful and attractive.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

VOL. XIX. No. 11.

A Day in June.

And what is so rare as a day in June ?

Then, if ever, come perfect days :

Then heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,

And over it softly her warm ear lays :

Whether we look, or whether we listen,

We hear life murmur, or see it glisten ;

Every clod feels a stir of might,

An instinct within it that reaches and towers,

And, groping blindly above it for light,

Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers ;

The flush of life may well be seen

Thrilling back over hills and valleys ;

The cowslip startles in meadows green,

The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,

And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean

To be some happy creature's palace ;

The little bird sits at his door in the sun,

Atit like a blossom among the leaves,

And lets his illumined being o'errun

With the deluge of summer it receives ;

His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings,

And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings ;

He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest —

In the nice ear of nature which song is the best ?

Now is the high tide of the year,

And whatever of life hath ebbd away

Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer,

Into every bare inlet and creek and bay ;

Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it,

We are happy now because God wills it ;

No matter how barren the past may have been,

'Tis enough for us now that the leaves are green ;

We sit in the warm shade and feel right well

How the sap creeps up and the blossoms swell ;

We may shut our eyes, but we cannot help knowing

That skies are clear and grass is growing ;

The breeze comes whispering in our ear,

That dandelions are blossoming near,

That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing,

That the river is bluer than the sky,

That the robin is plastering his house hard by ;

And if the breeze kept the good news back,

For other couriers we should not lack ;

We could guess it all by your heifer's lowing—

And hark ! how clear bold chanticleer,

Warmed with the new wine of the year,

Tells all in his lusty crowing !

Joy comes, grief goes, we know not how ;

Everything is happy now,

Everything is upward striving ;

'Tis as easy now for the heart to be true

As for grass to be green or skies to be blue —

'Tis the natural way of living :

Who knows whither the clouds have fled ?

In the unscarred heavens they leave no wake ;

And the eyes forget the tears they have shed,

The heart forgets its sorrow and ache ;

The soul partakes the season's youth,

And the sulphurous rifts of passion and woe

Lie deep 'neath a silence pure and smooth,

Like burnt-out craters healed with snow.

Charlatanism in Music.

III.

THE MUSICAL FANATIC, OR THE COMPOSER-PIANIST.—SKETCHED BY BENDA.

The subject of this sketch may be compared to the charlatans in religion ; those saints, who keep their eyes continually turned up to heaven, supposing themselves to be the very essence of christianity, while their hearts are full of hatred and ill-will towards their fellow-men. And if you call their attention to the fact that all their pious demonstrations are of no use so long as they daily violate that commandment, which bids us love our neighbor as ourself ; if you remind them that the doors of the heavenly kingdom shall not open for those who have no love or charity, or, still better if you are bold enough frankly to tell them that they are just the opposite of what in their immeasurable self-conceit they pretend to be ; then these charlatans will grow pale with astonishment that you dare to smite them with such language. But you are much mistaken, if you suppose that you have in the least shaken their confidence in their superior worth. Nay, if the eloquence of all the world united should try to convince them of their error they would not believe it. They no saints ? They pretenders, charlatans, quacks, fanatics ? Ridiculous, absurd, malicious !

So our hero may call it absurd, or malicious, that we count him among the charlatans in music. He considers himself such a model of musical excellence, such a pattern of artistic purity and integrity ! And, indeed, he is regarded so not only by himself, but by many others, who are too inexperienced in musical matters to know what title he has to such lofty pretensions. He loves to style himself a composer pianist : but he is neither a composer nor a pianist ; he is a little of both, although his talent for composition exceeds in some measure his qualifications for a performer. If, first, we regard him as a pianist we find that his execution is stiff and inelegant. He may know how a piece should be played, but his fingers do not obey him, and his listeners are frequently obliged to "take the will for the deed." He essentially lacks that confidence, freedom and boldness, which are among the first manifestations of a born player. Even his own compositions sound harsh and clumsy under his fingers, if he manages to go through them without actual blunders, that are likely to happen every moment. In the works of the older masters up to Beethoven he has the freak of never employing the pedal, however much their effect might be improved thereby. He also keeps in his study an old clavichord, which he uses exclusively for the works of Sebastian Bach, presuming that the great master himself never played but on such an instrument and that, therefore, the true power of his music cannot be realized through a pianoforte. His culture, taste, sentiment and expression, according to his own estimation, are of such a high order that all must be enchanted, who are fortunate enough to hear him. This illusion and the wish to play before a select audience prompt him to fix the price of admission ridiculously high when he gives a concert, which for the sake of honor and reputation he thinks necessary once or twice every year ; and when, naturally, his auditors appear in so select a number that it is difficult, even with lantern in hand, to find them out among all the empty seats, he begins to complain of the indifference, bad taste, want of appreciation and so forth, that characterize the community where he resides. As he has not the means of engaging first-class performers to assist him he calls in for his aids some of the third-rate singers who abound in every town and are the bane of the public. The pieces which make up his programme are mostly such as any advanced amateur may play for himself at home. From principle he never performs the work of a composer still living, except himself. We see then how much cause he has for his lamentations respecting the indifference of the public.

Now, sir, if you are resolved to test the sympathy of the music-lovers ; if you wish for a select, but numerous audience ; or if you desire to know, who is to be blamed for the empty seats at your concerts,—why don't you give us pieces, which are too difficult and too rare to be accessible to ordinary players, and to hear which every true friend of art would gladly pay a high price, even higher than it is your pleasure to charge ? The reason why "he don't" will easily occur to every one ; it is because "he can't."

Regarded as a composer we find his style to be dry and pedantic, scrupulously squared and pruned. He strictly observes every rule, never permitting himself the most harmless license. His orchestration is thin and meagre ; he is always afraid of overdoing the matter, and therefore, rarely avails himself of all means at his command. This he does in part on the authority of Mozart and other masters of the past who likewise (but for better reasons) did not always employ the whole body of instruments, which constitute the orchestra. Authority, tradition, conventionalism—these are among the chief forces which guide the fanatic in his creations. It is of significance, in order to obtain a just conception of the man, to know that he never attempts to write an opera, because he deems it profane. He thinks it also profane to compose a dance, though he almost weeps with joy at those little Minuets, that are to be found in the smaller Symphonies, Quartets and Sonatas of Haydn and some of his contemporaries, and which in reality are nothing but dances, many of them as light, or as frivolous, if you will, as ever a waltz was. The same principle he carries out as a teacher. We need hardly say that he supports himself by giving lessons. His scholars are not permitted to play anything that bears the name of Quadrille, Waltz, Polka or Galop, though he does not scruple to give them plenty of such as rejoice in the title of Fandango, Siciliano, Bolero, Tarantella and so forth. But we will not subject him to any criticism in his capacity as a teacher; he don't pretend to be one; he only—as he has it—gives instruction. Yet, notwithstanding, he considers himself the sole person competent to teach and seizes every opportunity of slandering all others engaged in that profession.

We have now viewed the fanatic as both a player and a composer, and my impartial readers may judge for themselves, if it be absurd or malicious to class him among the charlatans. But, we have not done with him yet; he shall not so easily escape our fangs; full justice shall be meted out to him. We have yet to consider more particularly how far in his life and dealings with his fellow men he realizes the object of true art, of which he believes himself so superior an exponent. If neither his playing nor his compositions gave promise of his ability to represent the beautiful in a beautiful manner, we can hardly expect that the man should redeem the musician. With such beings life and art are so closely united that they must be considered as one. It is an established fact that no where are to be found instances of such passionate devotedness to the chosen vocation as in music; and in consequence no other artist is so likely to become a fanatic as the musician. So we may say of our hero that the man is completely merged in the artist; as is the latter so is the former; nay, he is no man at all, he is merely a musician. His love for the art knows no bounds; he considers it the only occupation compatible with the dignity of man. Accordingly, he looks upon all outsiders with a kind of scornful pity; especially on all bankers, brokers, jobbers, dealers, traders, farmers and other innocent people whose occupation is more prosaic, more substantial and material than his. It is, however, a mistake to infer from this that he regards those belonging to his own craft with a milder view. He is rarely on friendly terms with his fellow artists; because weighed in his balance they are all too light, not solid, not orthodox, not classical enough. Neither does his selfishness permit him to take any interest in the musical doings of the community where he resides, except so far as he can become the centre thereof. Without him any enterprise is likely to go the wrong way. He disparages every man and every thing. For the classical composers alone, for Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart and the earlier Beethoven his love and admiration know no bounds, and he is proud of it. You just try to engage him in a conversation about these composers and you will hear in what a torrent of superlatives he gives vent to his enthusiasm. If you are not completely overwhelmed by the force of his speech it is because his mouth is too full and one word chokes another. He will give you by the way to understand that he has some claim to be heard, since none can love, understand or appreciate those masters better than himself, being a somewhat kindred genius. Should you be able to silence him for a moment in order to ask him what he thinks of Berlioz, Wagner, Liszt, and their followers,—your question will immediately be answered by a counter-torrent of invectives, which will sweep these men clean of the last marks of honor and respectability and leave them bold adventurers, pretenders or charlatans. He means to persecute them till his last breath and to whatever extent his small influence may permit him. He can never forgive them that they dared to shake the sacred ground of tradition and authority and set up a theory of their own. Take heed that he does not suspect you to be yourself among the admirers of those musical reformers; he would speedily turn upon you and give you what he thinks his duty; friend, or foe, it matters little when his fanaticism is roused. In general his tirades are harmless, for, if you permit him to speak out all he has to say, he feels easy after such an outburst and goes on his way, rejoicing as before in his own superiority. It sometimes happens that a deluded critic becomes so interested in him as to advocate his cause publicly, or that he himself ascends the editorial chair,—then his narrow, illiberal views and notions may cause much damage to the art and artists of the community in which he lives. It has happened in cities whose size, situation, social institutions, and so forth, peculiarly favored fanaticism, that all enlightened musicians have been driven out, while the fanatic and his crew kept their black and white colors victoriously waving amidst the vehement applause of the sour-faced inhabitants. However, these cases are rare; he seldom attains to such importance as to become the leader of a party; generally he is too shy, too timid; he loves to walk in silence and commit secretly whatever mischief his supposed duties prompt him. Sometimes he professes a total indifference to everything beyond his own dear self. It is then that he boasts of never reading a newspaper or any other paper relating to art and science, those treating of musical matters not excepted. The latter he is afraid might contain something about himself, which, when read, would perhaps tend to perplex him or make him falter in his righteous course. But this is not the chief reason; there is a more substantial one. Who is there that presumes to know more about music than Mr. Fanaticus? Who dares venture to suppose he could teach Mr. Arrogance? Now, it is plain, if he subscribed to such a paper he might be suspected of keeping it merely in order to learn from it. He knows what he is about.

It might perhaps be expecting too much of such a narrow-minded, short-sighted being; though he thrice blessed himself every morning on opening his eyes that he is an artist—to suppose he should know that an artist should, in his appearance manifest taste and expression, the cultivation of which in music he has made the purpose of his life. The fanatic is utterly ignorant of this fact. His manners are blunt, awkward, nay, boorish; his dress is shabby and always anticipates the coming fashion by ten years. He gives as an excuse that it is the prerogative of genius to set fashion and etiquette at defiance. Yet it would be a mistake to fancy that he is not vain and that he does not with much satisfaction behold his own profile; that would be entirely inconsistent with his love of self. When he is to appear before the public at his concerts he takes much pains to ornament himself tastefully, as he imagines; and even several days in advance he devotes some minutes every time to practicing the bow or obedience before a glass; yet when the time for exhibition comes he cuts the same sorry figure as before. His body is not an agile one. He is on the whole averse to locomotion. You may be sure to find him ten years hence occupying the same rooms in which he now lives.

The home of the musical fanatic, I will state in conclusion, is in all countries where the climate is ungenial and life laborious. Thus, while he thrives well in the Northern States of the American Union, in England, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, &c., he begins to dwindle in France and farther south, as in Italy and Spain, disappears altogether. A certain degree of culture in the more serious kinds of music is necessary for a country, which may pretend to favor his growth. Strictly speaking he is a product of the very laudatory movement to establish the art in her purest and highest forms; but a mishapen product, an excrescence, which in our days—alas!—is multiplying to an alarming extent.

W. A. Mozart.

BY OTTO JAHN.—(FOURTH PART.)

(From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.)

II.

The Fourth Part embraces the second half of the history of the last ten years of Mozart's life (1781—1791), the period during which his genius produced his greatest creations, which have rendered him immortal. It contains the sections from 12 to 25 of the Fourth Book, the first eleven comprising the contents of the third volume of this work. While the latter treat mostly of Mozart's material circumstances, the historical element is thrown more into the background in Book Four, since, except the account of two professional journeys—to Berlin and to Frankfort-on-the-Maine—only the moving narrative of Mozart's death and its immediate consequences belong to the biographical portion, properly so called; while the analysis of his works, on the contrary, together with the most careful accounts of their production, carrying out, &c., take up most of Volume Four, which is the thickest of all, containing 748 pages of text, 40 pages of appendix, a complete catalogue of names and facts, 16 pages of supplementary notes, and a portrait of Mozart, after a picture painted in Verona in 1770, when he was fourteen years of age.

The mere comprehensiveness of the list gives us a foretaste of the rich contents of the last volume; a cursory sketch will teach the reader what he has to expect, and what he will find carried out in a manner which, from beginning to end, attracts, fascinates and instructs.

The first three sections (from 12 to 14 inclusive) show us Mozart as a pianoforte player and composer of instrumental music. Section 12 discusses his works for the piano, the variations, rondos, fantasias, sonatas for the pianoforte alone, and with violin accompaniment, the trios, the quartets, and the quintet (in E flat), as well as the concertos. In the catalogue of the latter, pp. 51 and 52, we find the concerto for two pianos (printed in Offenbach, by J. André, as Op. 73, Edition faite d'après la Partition en Manuscrit), but not with the orchestra (quartet, two oboes, two horns, two bassoons), which is not mentioned either in any part of text.

In relation to the concertos, the author brings prominently forward services rendered by Mozart towards the combination of the orchestra and the solo instrument into one whole, as eventually, and in the received form, creating something new, and shows how the orchestra has full symphonic justice done it, not merely in the tutti movements, but as continually introduced into the piano part, also participating directly in it. "An art of blending all the various kinds of sounds in the orchestra, which at once proves an uncommonly fine sense, supported by the most accurate knowledge of instrumental effects, for what is harmonious." "The happy nation," the author observes further on, "in the close combination of the various instrumental resources into one whole is so completely successful, that in this particular Beethoven, who made an especial study of Mozart's pianoforte concertos, as every one who knows them at all thoroughly will easily perceive, has not, in any essential point, gone further; the higher importance of his grand pianoforte concertos has another foundation. It is true that, with Mozart, there was something more than the mere delicately-fostered sense for the appropriate mixtures of the various kinds of sound; the invention, treatment, and distribution of the motives were conditional on the nature of the means for their manifestation; it was necessary in the first sketch that the different resources should be well considered, if they were to have justice done them in the mode in which they were carried out; even in the bud, the various motives must have been endowed with the faculty of free development under various conditions. The result is a race between different agents, the orchestra and the pianoforte—and the principal charm of those concertos rests upon the lively interworking of the opposite elements, by means of which process the separate motives, as if under an ever changing light, are grouped into a rich and brilliant picture."

It is very correctly remarked that Mozart's concertos require, "besides a clear and song-like execution, especially of the melodies, which are often greatly spun out," "the calm, steady" hand, which "causes the" roudades (Passagen) "to flow like oil." Nearly all his roudades depend upon the scale and the broken chords. His aim was not a number of notes (he purposely rejected runs of octaves, sixths and thirds), nor any kind of mass-like effect, but clearness and perspicuity. At any rate, the clear unfolding of the peculiarities of the piano, in contradistinction to the orchestra, was the right way to the development of technical skill on the piano."

"But the principal importance of the concertos lies in their musical purport. In their conceptions and treatment, they exhibit great dash and perfect freedom: it is clear that it was not only the greater and more important means which called forth a corresponding degree of mental activity, but that Mozart felt the more pleasure in giving free scope to his powers, because he used to perform these compositions himself. The fact of their being concertos, destined to produce an instantaneous impression on the public, explains, also, why he allowed himself more liberty here than anywhere else in the employment of strongly exciting means of expression, and it is a very characteristic trait, that he endeavors to produce this effect, not by virtuoso-like effects, on the piano, but by the increased charm of musical expression."

Section 13 treats at length of the violin quartets and quintets. The author has already spoken, in Vol. III., of Mozart's relations towards Joseph Haydn, from which, as a sign of the highest respect, sprang the dedication of the first six quartets to that master. These belong to those compositions which Mozart wrote, without any immediate external cause, not to order, but for his own satisfaction. Jahn first enters on the essential elements of the quartet—as he does afterwards of the quartet generally—and on the peculiarities of these compositions of Mozart for chamber-music. Without subjecting them singly to a strict analysis, he gives us, in general touches, an excellent and characteristic account of them. It is only the C major quartet and the G minor quartet that he discusses at any length. The difference in style between the last four quartets (especially of three of them, written for Friedrich Wilhelm II., King of Prussia) and of the first six is, also, charmingly described.

Especially welcome is all that is said concerning the quintets. We are delighted that Jahn stands up for these magnificent compositions, explains their character—which is different from the last quartets, and approximates again to the style of the first six—and describes their beauties. It is an indisputable fact that Mozart's quintets are too much neglected in the public quartet associations which nearly every town of note possesses. It is true that the signal was given by a great composer of the modern school, who always used to leave the room when one of Mozart's quintets began. This is partly true even of the quartets, for how many lovers of music are there at present who have heard—not once, perhaps, but frequently—all the ten written by Mozart? We hope, too, that the eulogy which Jahn pronounces, which is but the echo of our own sentiments, on the grand trio on E flat major, for violin, viol., and violoncello, will direct the attention of associations for chamber-music to the gem of its kind. He justly calls it, "one of the most wonderful of Mozart's works, a genuine cabinet specimen of chamber music." (Page 94).

Well worthy our consideration is the analysis of the G minor quintet, containing the expression "of a passionately excited frame of mind, of grief conscious only of itself, and of a struggle of the heart with it, changing, in the finale, to the opposite mood (a gushing dithyrambus), which, however, belongs to the same nature, that is rendered with perfect fidelity and truth." Hereupon we read, at page 103.

"Involuntarily, with such physiological development, we seek the man in the artist, and who can deny that the most evident marks of Mozart's own nature are impressed on the work of Art? If however, we tried to find a definite inducement in his immediate circumstances, for its production, we should most certainly be led astray. Mozart's circumstances were at that time (1787), generally speaking, good. He had not long returned, richly rewarded with success and money, from Prague and in the Jacquin family enjoyed the society of those who satisfied both his mind and his heart. It is true that, shortly afterwards (26th May), he lost his father, but whoever carefully weighs the letter he wrote his father on the 4th of April, at the thought of the possibility of death (III., p. 279)—at the same time he was engaged on the first quintet in C major—must own that the tone of the G minor quartet could not be suggested by the thought of a dying father. The springs of artistic creation flow too far below the surface to be immediately called forth by every emotion in common life. It is true that the artist can give no more than what is in him, and what he has himself gone through; but even of the musician does Goethe's assertion hold good, that in a work of art there is nothing which the artist has not experienced, only not as he has experienced it.

"A second question now forces itself upon us: Does a piece of music which, like this one, unrolls before us a true soul-painting, follows the course of psychological development with the strictest consistency, and exhibits sharply and characteristically the tottering emotion of passionate sensations in the most delicate touches—does, we repeat, a piece of music like this obey also the formulas and laws of musical construction and technique? Without doubt, any one who chooses to disregard entirely the psychological development can show, by a purely technical analysis, how this quintet, which constrainedly obeys the conditions of musically beautiful form, by the most uncommon combination of invention and discernment, reaches a high degree of formal perfection, and whoever follows these indications will become aware that both the truth and strength of the psychological development, and the purity and beauty of the artistic form, coincide, and are one and the same in their essential manifestations."

Lastly, in this section, the author treats in a similar manner the composition for reed-bands (Harmonie-Musik) and the seven symphonies which Mozart wrote in Vienna. Concerning the improvement of the orchestra by Mozart, concerning his contrapuntal art, as a free phenomenon of artistic beauty and concerning the union of this art with the free employment of the various kinds of sound, the author says much that is very excellent and characteristic of Mozart's genius. In the fact that the three grand grand symphonies in E flat major, G minor and, C major (with the fugue), were written within six weeks (from the end of June to the 10th of August, 1788), and, though equally rich and equally profound in purport, are yet most different in their character, Jahn justly perceives a fresh proof: "that, amidst the most manifold impressions of life, the artist's soul is always laboring and producing, while, in secret, the threads of which the work of art is woven are continually and mysteriously converging."

The Development of the Musical Faculties.

We must have recognized that nature has given musical capabilities to most individuals; but that these powers and susceptibilities exist in the most manifold variety of gradations. The germ of these faculties, like that of all our other powers is strengthened and unfolded by all the appearances and impressions of the outer world on us, from the moment of our birth; and when placed at the disposal of the instructor, it has already undergone a certain degree of expansion from the unconscious tuition of daily experience.

The development of the musical faculties, however, as far as regards the meaning of sounds, labors under disadvantages, particularly in northern climates, from which our other faculties are comparatively free. The most pressing wants and constantly urging requirements of life, call chiefly into action that other spiritual sense, the eye, in combination with the understanding. The child learns to distinguish earlier by the eye than the ear; while its understanding is almost incessantly employed in seizing the significance of sounds, as indicative of the objects of sense by which it is surrounded, rather than the meaning of sound in any musical relationship: a kind of affinity, which to the uneducated ear remains, perhaps, through life unknown. The musical element has less occasion to be exhibited by us more silent Germans, than among our southern and western neighbors. It is, nevertheless, as deeply significant, well defined, and powerful in our language, even as in the Italian, which, indeed, can claim superiority only in some degree of clearness, and an old prejudice in its favor.

Long continued neglect and suppression, indeed, of musical qualifications, are much to be lamented: more particularly during musical education itself, when such neglect operates most severely. Parents and teachers are more apt to complain of the want of disposition in their pupils, than to seek in themselves the cause of that deficiency. Only when the delays and the misapprehensions shall be attacked on all sides, and overcome, will our conviction be complete, that the musical qualifications given to most men are much more considerable than is generally believed.

OF THE TIME PREVIOUS TO LEARNING.

This period requires domestic care and solicitude, as a preparation for the directing hand of the master; and here it is, that the mother, as monitor of the awakening senses of her child, is called upon to exercise the budding susceptibilities on salutary objects, and shield their tender impressiveness from violent and distracting sensations. Certain determined sounds have an incalculable and lasting effect on the infant mind and senses, when presented to them without constraint or obvious intention. The pure sound of a little bell, the combined sounds of two or three glasses, producing, for example, c—g, and then g—d—b, the contrast of high clear sounds and low murmurings are best calculated to affect the infant perceptions. It can easily be imagined, how at a later period, listening to the rolling thunder, to the whispering and rustling of the evening breeze, to the murmuring brook, to the moan of the impending storm, to the warbling of the nightingale, may penetrate into, and influence the yearnings and aspirations of fresh youthful existence, wherein are imbedded those bright germs of thought, whose future expansion and manifestation are exhibited in the high productions of genius, at once the glory and the despair of each succeeding age! But how many circumstances conspire to disturb, counteract, and disenchant these beautiful and fructifying moments of early youth, particularly in large cities! How necessary is help, where nature cannot be left alone! How harassing and destructive, while the precious moments of culture are so few, that the delicate and tender perceptions should be jarred by the harsh rolling of the streets, the deafening crash of brazen bands, and the rough growl of drums; that their fine organizations should be either rent or palsied by coarseness or force, while yet scarcely awake to their legitimate functions! Let, therefore, every mother who has a perception of the charms of music, and of its civilizing influence, weigh well the importance of the early education of the senses. Her simple song, in which perhaps the infant voice is blended is the most natural, and often the most fruitful lesson. A march of the most simple melody, and merely drum rhythm, which the boy and his father perform together, round about in their apartment, inspires more delight and feeling of measure, than many a half-year's instruction. If by great good fortune the tender ear of childhood should be indulged with the delicious enchantment of an opera, the few enraptured hours thus spent may cast a broad and glowing beam of sunshine to the latest days of life. For such an initiation we could wish every child to enjoy the dear old, but ever fresh and young Zauberflöte, that child's fairy play, which Mozart has immortalized with the power of prolonging and reproducing all our lives the earliest and most innocent blossoms of youthful delight. In this play, congenial childhood enters with the sweetest self-devotion into the wondrous and inconceivable passions of maturer age, and is carried away at last to the perception of the truth, to the dreaded dagger; but, with such guileless purity, such forgetfulness of self, that the star flaming queen can scarcely be reproached when she rises delicately, and without effort, in melting harmonies, from the midst of her sufferings. On the other hand, we would withhold from the young sensations, the old and revived operas of mere show and exaggerated effect; and more especially those prosaic representations of ordinary life, in which the music sinks with its subject into mere triviality and nothingness. In like manner we would spare our young pupils the infliction of chamber or social music, which in general they do not understand; and lastly, we recommend moderation in quantity. The first opera once,—the full organ in the church, when empty,—seldom warlike music, and still more rarely, a concert. These are important moments in the young and impressible existence, and must be of extraordinary occurrence. Moreover, we would petition for the liberty for all children to play freely after their own fashion, on the pianoforte; to invent, and search, and lose themselves as they please, so long as they do not injure the instrument. This ad libitum playing is mostly prohibited, particularly if the days of instruction have begun. The child is told to employ itself more usefully, in finger exercises or written compositions. But how shall the individual musical feelings, or the yet feeble inventive imaginings, be fostered and educated to self-power and trustfulness, if the only, and at this age indispensable means of cultivation be withheld? We are delighted to hear of the infant Mozart, who, in the third year of his short life, sought to arrange sounds in musical combination; and at the same time, we forbid the like practice to our own children, or disturb their often burning dreams of harmony with our short-sighted and self-sufficient worldly prudence.

We wish to say another word in these nursery details, concerning speech. It might almost be maintained, that we, in Germany, have more men who write, than speak well; so hollow and uncertain, so feeble and oppressively restrained does our magnificent, copious, and universally appropriate language appear in speech, while its perfections have only attained for it the calumnies of undistinguishing foreigners, and the neglect of our own countrymen, who have mistaken, disfigured, and corrupted it. How seldom do we hear any one among us speak openly and freely from the chest! How rare is the pure, full sound of the vowels, or the clear distinctness of the manifold characteristic varieties of the consonants! When do we hear modulation of the voice in speaking? and rarer still, any attempt of raising or depressing the intonation, without the most abrupt helplessness? Much of this defective condition of our speech is probably owing to the rarity with us, of public speaking, and other restricting circumstances; but we doubt not that early education, and want of attention in after life, are, at least, equally culpable, in not removing these disadvantages, whose baneful influence indeed does not affect music alone.—Dr. Marz.

Adelina Patti in London.

Many of the friends and admirers of our young prima donna, will be glad to see the following extracts from the principal papers of London.

It is delightful to experience a new sensation—more especially in art, in which the highest excellence is the greatest rarity nowadays. Good actors and good singers are so seldom to be found, and disappointments are of such frequent occurrence, that we have long since relinquished our faith in new-comers on the dramatic or operatic stage, even when the trumpet of fame has been sounded loudest and longest in advance. The cry of "Wolf" has lost all its power, and we quietly determine to trust nothing but our own eyes and ears. Such were our feelings when we went to the Royal Italian Opera on Tuesday evening to witness the debut of Mlle. Patti. We had read about the lady in foreign journals, and had written about her no later than last week; but, although all we had read was highly eulogistic, and though we presented her in the most favorable light to the reader—as far as we were enabled to do, not having heard her without compromising ourselves, we were by no means sanguine as to the result. The general audience, of course, who knew nothing whatsoever about Miss Adelina Patti, was apathetic in the extreme, and there was not the least excitement manifested. The theatre, though subsequently full, at first, indeed, was badly attended, and little interest or curiosity was betokened for the débütante. A few, however, who learned what had taken place at rehearsal, were anxious and excited, and these were her solitary friends; and so Mlle. Adelina Patti made her first appearance in England with little or no hope or expectation from any feeling previously created in her favor. Never did singer make her debut in this country with so little known of her antecedents, and with so little stir made about her beforehand. Generally speaking, a new candidate for lyric and dramatic honors, as soon as announced, becomes the topic in musical circles, and affords matter for speculation in clubs and drawing-rooms. A new "first lady" in the operatic world is a great fact, and subscribers prepare their opera-glasses as astronomers their telescopes on the advent of an unexpected comet. Mlle. Patti, however, had not figured in the programme of the season and her name had only appeared four days in advance of her debut, and without a single remark in the advertisements. Not only was the young lady unheralded by puff of any kind, but the usual, indeed indispensable, statement as to who she was, and where she came from, was omitted altogether. Did the director, assured of success, follow this unprecedented mode of securing a sensation? Or did he fear for the result, and so hold his peace? We think the latter most probable, as the temptation to disclosure involved in the complete conviction of having something great to exhibit would be almost too much for managerial forbearance. Mlle. Adelina Patti, we may therefore conclude, came out with out any extraordinary hope on the part of the director—at all events until after rehearsal, when announcement was too late—and with no expectation on the part of the public.

Never was surprise greater, nor result more triumphant, Mlle. Patti was welcomed with the warmth due to her extreme youth and prepossessing appearance; but there was no enthusiasm. The utmost attention, however, was paid to the recitative preceding Amina's address to her companions, and the first hearing was satisfactory. The young artist for a moment or two betrayed nervousness; but she instantly shook off all fear, as if conscious of her strength, and executed a passage di bravura, which completely electrified the house. The audience was indeed all ears, and Mlle. Patti's success may be chronicled as a perfect climax, rising from the first scene, and attaining its culminating point in the famous rondo finale, "Ah! non giungo." What our opinions of the débütante are will be found in our notice of the young lady's performance in its proper place. Meanwhile, we may assert emphatically that Italian Opera has obtained an accession of strength in a certain line which we did not expect to witness in our own time. Mlle. Adelina Patti is a triumphant refutation that art and genius have deserted the operatic stage. Having now obtained the legitimate successor of Bosio, Persiani—we were about to add (and why not?) Jenny Lind—why may we not look for another Pasta, Malibran, Catalani, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache? Why should not the advent of Mlle. Patti fill us with hope for the fortunes of Italian Opera? We may indulge imagination so far. At all events we have experienced a new sensation, and that is something.—Musical World.

The London Times speaks thus of our young prima donna. We copy the whole article:

A new Amina does not usually excite much curiosity among frequenters of the Opera. There have been since the days of Malibran so many Aminas, and nineteen out of twenty of them commonplace. Even the announcement of a new singer, irrespective of Amina, or Lucia, or Arline, or Maritana, or any other character, Italian or English (not excepting the Traviata herself)—so strong the reaction against preliminary flourish—is now a-days received with something like indifference. How many Pastas, how many Grisis, how many Jenny Linds ("nightingales," of course), have suddenly come forth and as suddenly vanished, or at best, remained, content to occupy a second, third, or fourth rate position. The musical public has sunk into a sort of lethargic and cynical incredulity, the result of many sanguine hopes raised, and just as many wofully disappointed. At present, we may venture to suggest, the most prudent way to obtain an impartial and indulgent hearing for a new aspirant to lyric honors, is to say nothing in advance. Mr. Gye has adopted this course of action, or inaction, with regard to a very young lady who made her first appearance last night as the heroine of "La Sonnambula," and who, we may add at once, created such a sensation as has not been paralleled for years. It was simply advertised, late last week, that on Tuesday, May 14, Mlle. Adelina Patti would assume the part of Amina, in Bellini's well-known opera. Apart from those who had visited the United States, or those in the habit of perusing the musical notices of American journals, no one had ever heard of Mlle. Adelina Patti; and thus, although the house was brilliantly attended (it being a "subscription night,") there were no symptoms whatever of a more than ordinary degree of expectation. As that diverting necromancer, Gaspardin Frikell, used to declare, there was "no preparation;" certainly there was no "claque"—no disposition to anticipate favor or extort applause. The débütante was at first calmly, then more warmly, then enthusiastically—judged; and she who, to Europe at any rate, was yesterday without a name, before to-morrow will be a "town-talk."

And now comes the difficult part of our task. "Is Mademoiselle Adelina Patti"—it will naturally be asked—"a phenomenon." Decidedly yes. "Is she a perfect artist?" Decidedly no. How can a girl of scarcely eighteen summers have reached perfection in an art so difficult? It is simply impossible. We are almost inclined to say that she is something better than perfect; for perfection at her age could be little else than mechanical, and might probably settle down at last into a cold abstraction, or mere commonplace technical correctness. No, Mlle. Patti has the faults incidental to youth and inexperience; but these in no single instance were the semblance of being ineradicable; on the contrary, they are in a great measure the consequence of an ardent ambition to attain at a jump what can only be attained with years of laborious application. The management of the voice, the gradation of tone, the balance of cadence, the rounding off of phrases, are all occasionally more or less defective; but to compensate for these inevitable drawbacks, there is an abiding charm in every vocal accent, an earnestness in every look, and an intelligence in every movement and gesture that undeniably proclaim an artist "native and to the manner born." And let it be understood that these qualities of charm, of earnestness, and of intelligence are not merely the prepossessing attributes of extreme youth, allied to personal comeliness, but the evident offspring of thought, of talent—we may almost add of genius, but assuredly of natural endowments, both mental and physical, far beyond the average.

Mlle. Patti's first appearance on the stage seemed to take the audience by surprise. So young an Amina, young enough in appearance to be the daughter of her Elvino (Signor Tiberini), an Amina, in short, not yet done growing, had never before been witnessed. The recitative, "Care compagne," however, showed at once that in this particular case youthfulness and depth of feeling might be found both naturally and gracefully united; while long before the termination of the air, "Come per me sereno," with its brilliant cabaletta, "Sovra il sen la man mi posa," a conviction was unanimously entertained by the audience that a singer of genuine feeling, rare gifts and decided originality stood before them. A high soprano voice, equal, fresh and telling in every note of the medium, the upper "E flat," and even "F" at ready command; admirable accentuation of the words, considerable flexibility, dashing and effective use of "bravura," expression warm, energetic and varied, while never exaggerated, and last, not least, an intonation scarcely ever at fault—such were the valuable qualities that revealed themselves in turn during the execution of Amina's well known apostrophe to her companions on the auspicious day that is to unite her to Elvino, and which raised the house to positive enthusiasm. A thing that must have astonished every one was the thorough ease and "aplomb" (an excellent term) with which so young a stranger confronted so formidable an assembly, in the midst of difficulties that at times are apt to unsettle the oldest and most practised stage singers. Too much self composure, it might be urged, for one of Mlle. Patti's years, were it not that the ingenious confidence of youth, when unchecked by the susceptibility of a nervous temperament, often makes it unapprehensive of danger and careless of results. At any rate, Mlle. Adelina Patti's first essay was a veritable triumph, and her ultimate success thus placed beyond a doubt. When the applause at the end of "Come per me sereno" had subsided, there was a general buzz of satisfaction. The consciousness of a new sensation having been unexpectedly experienced, seemed universal among the audience, who in grateful recognition might have addressed the new songstress in the language with which the village chorus apostrophize Amina:

Vivi felice! o questo
Il comun voto, o Adelina!

The history of Mlle. Patti's first appearance is told in the foregoing. The descent of the curtain was the signal for loud and long continued plaudits. For the third time Mlle. Patti was led forward by Signor Tiberini; and then, in obedience to a general summons, she came on alone to receive fresh honors. To conclude, if Mlle. Patti will rightly estimate the enthusiasm caused by her first appearance before the most generous (although, perhaps, the most jaded) of operatic publics, and—not regarding herself as faultless—study her art with increased assiduity, a bright future is in store for her. If, on the other hand—but we would rather not contemplate the opposite contingency.

There never perhaps was a lyric part with musical and histrionic traditions so firmly established, or so obsequiously followed. It is really enterprising in such a case to attempt anything novel; and Madlle. Patti's performance was more than enterprising, and new, for it was at the same time sterlingly good. This praise, be it understood, applies specially to her singing. All, or nearly all, the cadences, variations, and embellishments introduced by Mlle. Patti were original. The particular grace and fancy by which they were honorably distinguished were her's alone; and thus in a musical sense, the debutante's Amina was a creation. To say that Madlle. Patti must prove a valuable acquisition were recognise too coldly the merits quite hors deligne of this gifted young lady. It should rather be predicated of her that she will presently become a very "bright particular star" that all musical London will do homage to. Mlle. Patti's success with the public was immense; and that rarest of all enjoyments, a "new sensation" of pleasure, was, we are quite sure, drawn forth by her fresh and delightful vocalisation.—Post.

A new star—a star of the very first magnitude—has suddenly and unexpectedly appeared on our musical stargazers. This star is a young girl, Adelina Patti—a name till now unknown in this country—who appeared last night in the Sonnambula, and achieved a triumph such as we have never seen surpassed during our not very brief theatrical experience. Her powers of execution are something astounding. The compass of her voice seems to have no limits; she disports herself in those regions of the scale which all other singers that we have ever heard can reach only for a few notes with a great and painful effort. In the invention of original and varied passages her imagination seems exhaustless, and she executes them with the ease and certainty of a Joachim or a Vieuxtemps on his violin. Mozart's celebrated airs of the Queen of Night, in the Zauberflöte, seem intended to tax to the utmost all the powers of the female voice; but these airs, in respect to difficulty, are mere children's play compared to the achievements of Madlle. Patti in the air we are speaking of, and still more in the famous "Ah, non giunge," the finale of the opera. Were these things merely feats of execution—tours de force and nothing more, we should not attach any great value to them. But, with this young singer, execution is only the means to an end—that end being the expression of feeling and passion. Of every variety of expression, too, Madlle. Patti is mistress. The few simple notes, breathed by the sleeping girl as she unconsciously suffers the withered flowers to drop from her hands, were as heart-touching as when they were uttered by Lind herself—more they could not be.—News.

The American journals have asserted that Mlle. Adelina Patti is the legitimate successor of Sontag and Bosio, and have prophesied that her claim would be acknowledged directly she was heard in London or Paris.

The American writers were correct both in their assertion and their prophecy. The success of Mlle. last night was enormous, unparalleled, indeed, since the first appearance of Jenny Lind. Nor was success ever more legitimate, ever more free from prejudicial anticipations from party, from claque, from preparation. On Friday last the name of Mlle. Patti appeared in the advertisements of the day, unheralded by puff or special comment. No doubt hundreds asked, "Who is Adelina Patti?" and few could answer them. To-morrow the name of the young artist will be wafted abroad on the four winds of Heaven, and her reputation will be universal. Then the cry will be, "A new phenomenon of song has at last appeared, and she is called Adelina Patti."

We cannot enter into a minute description of Mlle. Patti's qualifications at this hour. It will be enough to say, at present, that her voice is a pure soprano, of wonderful extent in the upper register, reaching, with positive ease, to F altissimo. It is clear, powerful, sonorous, bright, and firm as a rock; not a single vibrato being evidenced last night, even when tremulousness might naturally be expected. Moreover, her voice is invariably correct in the intonation—one of those fresh voices, indeed, which cannot sing out of tune. Mlle. Patti's facility is immense. She sings the most difficult passages without an effort, runs the chromatic scale with the perfectness of a player on a tuned instrument, and has an incomparable shake. She indulged in several tours de force last night and created a furor, and astonished beyond measure the heat judges of singing, in the house. If we were inclined to be hyper-critical, we might assert that Mademoiselle Patti was not invariably perfect when she attempted these astonishing flights of fancy, but we cannot stoop to find a fault in what was really so dazzling and so enchanting on the whole. We must say, indeed, that no other artist since Malibran has afforded us the same delight, and filled us with the same astonishment in Amina, and we believe that every unprejudiced person will say the same thing. As an actress, Mlle. Patti is intense rather than demonstrative. She is always earnest, and her attitudes and motions are invariably natural, and sometimes irresistibly beautiful. There is not much display in her acting, but when occasion calls it forth she shows herself possessed of great impulse and great power, as exemplified in the bedroom scene, and in the rondo finale. At present we shall say no more than that every auditor in the theatre was enchanted beyond measure, and that the young artist has already made herself famous.—Chronicle.

At the Italian Opera the plaudits come from the amphitheatre (vulgo, the gallery). The fashionable style of applause of Sir Fopplin Flutter in the orchestra stalls, and Lord Fitz-Hanaper in the private box, is to tap two gloved fingers gently upon a gloved palm. To the singers the more generous and inspiring encouragement of the amphitheatre audience is so invaluable that it would answer the purpose of lessee and artistes, nay even of De Boots himself, to let them in without payment in return for the exertion they are good enough to undergo in clapping their hands violently together, shouting "bravo" and "encore." The more distingue audience down stairs, if left wholly to themselves, would, I fear, paralyse the singers, and envelope the entertainment as in a wet blanket. But on Wednesday night Mlle. Patti fairly broke the ice of fashionable coldness and reserve. Gloves of the whitest kid, in pit and orchestra stalls, came together with explosions that would have done honor to the gallery of the Victoria or the pit of the Surry. Old gentlemen became red in the face with clapping and shouting. A low and involuntary murmur of "bravo" ran round during the passages justly held sacred against interruption. And finally, when in "Ah non giunge," that brilliant and uncontrollable burst of joy, the debutante carolled and trilled, and heaped up intricacies and difficulties for the express purpose of showing how easily she could surmount them, you might have thought yourself in La Scala of Milan, or the San Carlo, at Naples, with their impressionable audiences, rather than among cold reserved Englishmen. The music of "Sonnambula," so seldom heard in these days of Prophètes and Huguenots, seemed like the music of one's boyhood, beautiful in its elegant sensibility and pure flow of melody, but having no more in common with the grand and difficult orchestral combinations of Meyerbeer than the harley sugar and currant wine of early days with the claret and olives of the epicure.—Manchester Express and Guardian.

The judgement of European connoisseurs will, we feel satisfied, endorse the favorable opinions of her Transatlantic critics. Her voice is a high soprano, extensive in compass, and exquisitely pure and sweet in quality. Its perfect freshness is one of its most charming features, and her upper notes are deliciously round, and at the same time of bird-like brilliancy. Her remarkable natural powers of florid vocalisation have been cultivated with striking success. Nothing could well surpass the graceful fluency, the delicate precision, and the faultless intonation which characterise her delivery of elaborate passages, which are given, too, without the slightest appearance of effort. Equally worthy of praise is the tenderness and pathos with which she gives more subdued phrases—singing them in a clear, even, and thoroughly natural style, with no tinge of that affected tremulousness which some vocalists have recourse to as a substitute for genuine feeling. In her case, an organ rich in natural resources has been trained in the best school, and her eminent vocal abilities are allied to equally remarkable dramatic powers. Viewed merely as an histrionic impersonation, the character of Amina has never been, within our recollection, more admirably played than it was by Mlle. Patti last evening.—Star.

Musical Correspondence.

WEIMAR. — We are permitted to make the following interesting extracts from a letter by a young lady from this city who is pursuing her musical studies at Weimar:

"I have been to a court concert a few days ago. It was given in the palace to the guests of the Duke, and in the gallery around the hall were places where people could go by paying. Liszt directed it, and it was a very fine concert. A full orchestra, a violin, piano, and flute solo. A young lady played the piano but I did not like her. The Court people were all in full dress. Some of the gentlemen's dress coats were covered with orders. One old General was completely covered, from his neck down to his waist. The orders were set in precious stones, diamonds, emeralds and rubies, and looked very brilliant. The ladies were all handsomely dressed. I could hardly realize that I was not at the theatre, and that all these people were not parading back and forth through the hall for my amusement, as long as I had paid to go in. After all, there is very little difference between real kings and queens and those in a play. "'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view." Last week there was an artist's festival, in honor of the birthday of Franz Schubert. It commenced with a concert. Afterwards there was a supper and at the end a ball. At the concert, Liszt played. He has not played in public before for ten years. When he sat down at the piano, there was a perfect storm of applause, which lasted five minutes or more. He bowed and bowed, but the people would not stop applauding. He plays wonderfully. There is a certain charm about his playing, which distinguishes it from that of any one else. Other people may play the piece just as perfectly. Bendel, for example, plays just as astonishingly as Liszt, but Liszt inspires his hearers just as a fine orator does. You get quite carried along with him, and he is complete master of his audience. When the music is animated you are exhilarated, when it is plaintive you feel like weeping. The music has complete mastery over you, and it is not the music either, but the playing of it, which is so effective. It is the result of his genius. Any one else might play the piece and seemingly play just as well and it would not have anything like the same effect on an audience. No player ever affected me so much. And it is so with every one who hears him. In Leipzig and other places there is a great prejudice against his compositions, and they are not brought out at all. One of these people was at this concert, a thorough hater of Liszt and his music. When he had finished playing, this man turned to a friend with him, and said, 'I declare, that man must be a devil! When I hear him play I have no longer a mind of my own. I feel willing to accept all his musical eccentricities, and am completely under his influence while I listen to him.' This is the secret of Liszt's immense fame and great personal influence. He almost magnetizes people with his playing. No artist will ever again create the enthusiasm which he has created, and would still, if he were to play in public. He devotes almost all his time to composition."

SPRINGFIELD, MS., JUNE 6, 1861.—At last we have had a concert after a dearth lasting I can hardly say how long. Mills, Hinkley, and Taunt (I place them according to their degrees of excellence) visited us last Tuesday evening and drew a fine house. As you and most of our readers have heard these artists, any extended criticism from me is unnecessary; so I will only give you some of the impressions they made a Springfield audience.

Almost every one was pleased with Mr. Mills, who did himself much credit, though laboring under many disadvantages and perhaps not in the best humor in consequence. He had only a square piano—a Steinway, and a poor one at that—which to increase his troubles, was miserably out of tune. Still, he showed himself a pianist of no ordinary ability and his listeners left with a desire to hear him again under more favorable circumstances. Some would have been better suited with his selections, if he had treated us to something more solid than fantasies. As it was, the one by himself on "Le Pardon de Pörmel," seemed in many respects superior to the others.

From the glowing reports concerning Miss Hinkley, some of them emanating from high sources, we had a right to expect some really fine singing from her, but I believe the general feeling of the audience was that of disappointment; and I cannot help thinking that, for some reason (indifference perhaps), she failed to do herself justice. She has certainly a flexible voice—her lower tones being by far the best—but it is not "in perfect command" and by no means always "in excellent tune," as was remarked in one of the dailies. She made some downright failures, that at the close of the rondo from "Don Pasquale" being one of the most apparent. She endeavored just at the finale to reach a note somewhere in the upper regions, found she couldn't do it in tune, and gave it up. A like failure in Boston by any singer however beautiful and popular would have been hissed. But she was not hissed here and because we were not rapturous "Miss Hinkley thinks she was not well received in Springfield!" Very likely she would have been more successful in opera.

Miss Hinkley's programme was made up of selections from different operas and the usual number of national airs. Of the former the polacca from "I Puritani" was sung very nicely and justly merited the encore it received. We had among the latter, the Star Spangled Banner, the rendering of which was said by the papers to be incomparable, but it was open to criticism, especially in the matter of enunciation. It will be a happy day for music when our public singers learn that a simple melody "unadorned is adorned the most" and that the stereotyped embellishments of the Italian opera are in such instances wholly misapplied. Some old master (who was it?) on being told of the remarkable execution of a young singer inquired, "can she sing plain notes?"

On the whole, we rarely hear a singer who varies as much from quite good to quite poor as did Miss Hinkley on Tuesday evening. It was evident more than once that she can in time become a good singer, but at present she attempts more than she accomplishes.

A word concerning the balladist, Mr. Taunt has a pleasant but not remarkable voice and is praiseworthy in singing what he can sing—Irish ballads. In his last song, however, he was occasionally the trifle of half a tone flat—something, I need not say, which might have been remedied or at least made less apparent by the accompanist, Mr. Mills. R.

PHILADELPHIA, JUNE 1.—Messrs. Wolfsohn and Thomas gave the last of their series of Concerts to a larger audience than their most sanguine friends could have expected. In spite of hard times, "war and rumors of war," the Foyer of the Academy was uncomfortably filled, and that too on a sultry evening. I give you the programme:

PART I.
Sonata appassionata (F minor, Op. 57).....Beethoven a Allegro assai. b Andan e con moto.
c Allegro ma non troppo e Presto.
Carl Wolfsohn.

PART II.
1. "Le trille du Diable".....Tartini
Theodore Thomas.
2. Rakoczy March.....Liszt
Carl Wolfsohn.
3. Andante con moto (from D minor Quartett). Schubert
Messrs. Thomas, Kammerer, Hassler, Schmits.
4. Grand Duo concertante "Les Huguenots".....
Wolfsohn and Hopkinson
Carl Wolfsohn and Theodore Thomas.

PART III.
Quintett (D major).....Mozart
a Larghetto e Allegro. b Adagio. c Minuetto.
d Finale. Allegro.
Messrs. Thomas, Kammerer, Hassler, Muller, Schmits.

I was unable to reach the Academy before the beginning of Part II. Tartini's strange "Trille du Diable" (as manipulated by Vieuxtemps) was played with the usual correctness of Thomas. I can say but little else of this performance. There is one melancholy air, affording scope for the display of taste and feeling, while all the other parts remind one more of the Etudes of Kreutzer than of aught else. Divested of the interest lent it by its age and the Tartini legend, it is truly an ungrateful solo both to performer and listener.

The best features of the soirée were undoubtedly, the Andante from Schubert's D minor Quartett and the Mozart Quartett in D major. Both of these were played in a style that left nothing to be desired. There was not a feature in the performance of either to mar the pleasure inseparable from good music well rendered. The Andante by Schubert seemed a new treasure to Philadelphia amateurs. The charming melodic figures and pleasant surprises in modulations of the author are ever new. In an earlier soirée Messrs. W. and T. introduced his E flat Trio. Though it is not very clear to the uninitiated, at first hearing, it was very favorably received.

And here let me say that Thomas' Quartette playing is infinitely more acceptable than his Solo playing. His neatness of execution and "cold passion," to me, seem more appropriate in those concerted pieces in which the violin, though sustaining the leading part, should not be too prominent.

If the Rakoczy March, by Liszt, is a fair specimen of music of the future, it were a decided blessing to have that future deferred as long as possible. If it were not that Mr. Wolfsohn played it, I should have believed its execution physically impossible. As it was, I could not help thinking that if he had played some other morceau he might have given his audience more music out of one fourth the labor and one tenth the noise.

In the Duo from the Huguenots, the strings of Mr. Thomas' violin were much affected by the temperature of the room. In spite of this, his double stops were remarkably pure though the variation went somewhat unevenly. An inconvenience to the audience (and probably to Mr. Thomas) was the undue prominence given to the piano part by the loud playing of Mr. Wolfsohn.

I contemplate a trip to the west and may send you musical notes from Cincinnati and St. Louis, if I find anything worth noting there. CHANTERELLE.

WORCESTER, MASS., JUNE 11.—Miss Hinkley assisted by Mr. Mills, pianist, and Mr. Taunt, balladist, gave a concert at Washburn Hall, last evening which was one of the most brilliant ever heard in Worcester. We went to hear the performers rather than the music, knowing that the music was to be mainly Italian and operatic, and so it is with them that we have to do. Miss Hinkley, whose unaffected vivacity is really exhilarating, was in excellent voice, and charmed all by her correct and spirited singing. Mr. Mills' piano playing was enthusiastically received. His execution is wonderfully correct and brilliant, and his style has a certain grandeur which we should have been glad to have heard tested in some really great music. Mr. Taunt's ballads were tastefully sung.

A fine historical painting is now on exhibition at Misses Robinson and Gardner's Academy of Fine Arts—Schwartz's "Pilgrim Fathers holding their First Public Worship in America." The picture is doubtless familiar to you and many of your readers, as it has been on exhibition in some of the large cities. It is a masterly production.

The following is spicy, and something more than an on dit. The organist of a certain church which is not far remote from this good Heart of the Commonwealth, not long ago, being in a commendably "classical" mood, "played the congregation out" with a fine rendering of a Bach fugue. The performance was deeply enjoyed by—two or three, who lingered to hear, but the majority of the congregation were—shocked! Ay, that's the word! Our hero, coming from the organ loft, and from his communion with the great tone-poet, was met by the singing committee.

"Tis but a step," &c.

One member was particularly indignant and gave vent to his wrath in a lecture, thus winding up his remarks: "Mind you, Sir, we won't have any more of your d—infernal jigs!" S.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

Chevé's System.

Many correspondents have asked for more information in regard to this system of instruction now in vogue in Paris, of which our correspondent "AMATEUR" gave us some hints recently. In default of anything further from him, (from whom we hope to hear), we obtain some light from M. Scudo, who in the second volume of the Année Musicale, devotes considerable space to a synopsis of the controversy between M. Chevé, the apostle of this new principle of musical instruction, and certain famous musicians in Paris. The subject matter of the controversy, he says, is so well defined by the authors of the pamphlet under notice, that he reproduces a part of it verbatim, from which we quote.

"M. le docteur Chevé," they say, "is the author of an elementary system of vocal music, which has for its basis, notation in figures. At various times, committees that have been consulted upon the value of the doctrines of M. Clévé, have decided that they saw no reason to approve his system of instruction, and official decisions have confirmed the opinions of these committees." Some of the authors of the pamphlet, it appears, have served upon the committee of 1850 which pronounced a similar verdict. Chevé, they say, has replied to these opinions, by various publications, of which they give the titles, in which as we are told, he claims to have utterly crushed his adversaries, who say that no one professing any self-respect, could reply to such accusations as he makes against them. Profiting by their silence under these circumstances, they say that Chev   proclaims that they have been "overthrown, crushed and confounded," so that they feel compelled to discuss the claims of his system and the "principles of his pretended discovery in the matter of musical instruction."

"All the efforts of this method tend," we are informed, "to the substitution of a system of figures for the usual notation. In the very first page of his book, M. Chev   lays down the principle that "musical writing is bad, essentially defective and absurd." He develops this proposition, exalts the merits of figures, and adds, "we substitute instantaneously (momentan  ment) figures for the black points which we write instantaneously upon the five lines of the musical staff." Thus the master makes his disciples understand that he is going to teach them instantaneously, what is perfect and excellent, and put an end to what is bad and absurd."

Chev  , they say, treats the notation that is universally known and practiced, as "absurd, full of monstrosities, of imbecile complications, bad logic and frightful conjuring."

This old system, then, the authors of the pamphlet proceed to defend, as a system of notation which for 800 years has proved to be sufficient, and is now equally known and read in every part of the civilized world; which has shown itself to be adapted to the wants of all ages and all nations; has been used by all the great men of genius and is alike accessible to the intelligence of all. The Orpheonists, the Conservatoire, Neidermeyer's school, even infant schools—all read and all understand it. It is the same everywhere, in all countries and all schools. They ask, in conclusion whether "this universal adoption, this general and voluntary submission to rules which no one has imposed, and which every one recognises is not a certain, evident, and indisputable proof of the excellence of this system?"

They then put into the mouth of Chev   an address to his pupils which Scudo says contains his principal ideas, of which the upshot is, that "We will return to the notation of the first ages; only, instead of saying with Pope Gregory, A, B, C, D, E, F, G, we will say 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, as did J. J. Rousseau and before him P  re Souhaitty and many others before them. I know they did not succeed. I know that Rousseau disavowed his attempts after he had studied music. Rousseau, however, was a blunderer, I am more skillful than he."

The authors of the pamphlet proceed to say that "it is evident that M. Chev   could not have actually used this language. If he had, he probably would have found few adherents. So he simply says, "I am the apostle of a new idea." This is much better as it suppresses discussion, facts, and the history of the art. The impression too is happy, mysterious; and has the odor of martyrdom about it, so that M. Chev   is pictured as delivered over to the wild beasts of the committees."

M. Scudo concludes by saying that the writers of the pamphlet (which is signed by Auber, Hal  vy, Clapisson, Ambroise Thomas and others), do not give due credit to the zeal and evidently sincere convictions of the skillful professor whose system of instruction they attack. "M. Chev  ," he says, "is a man of talent, a generous soul who believes himself to be in possession of a system of instruction better than the existing one, and who consecrates to the propagation of his method courage and faculties by no means common. Refute his system, if you believe it dangerous, but you have no right to doubt the sincerity of the master. Success cannot but be attained before the public as before the Academy by manoeuvres and false convictions."

M. Scudo is willing to go even further than these writers in their conclusions that these principles of Chev   "would chain up Art within limits that have long ago been passed, and would leave in the minds of those who should be tempted to adopt them notions entirely inexact and altogether contrary to the general practice, that is to say, to reality." Scudo adds, that "even if all France could learn to read music by its means in twenty-four hours, the advantage would not compensate for the perturbation which this system, of barbarous simplicity, would introduce into the usual notation, which is the only universal language existing in the world."

M. Chev   replies to his assailants in a similar pamphlet, of which Scudo also gives an impartial synopsis and to which we may return at some future time. Another reply was also made by a committee of the patrons of his system; among them being the Count de Morny, Prince Poniatowski, Felicien David, Lefebvre-Wely, Offenbach and others, equally well known to fame as the authors of the original pamphlet. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?"

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—At the adjourned annual meeting of the above Society, held at Chickering's Hall, on the 4th inst., the following list of officers was chosen:

President, Dr. J. Baxter Upham.
Vice President, Oren J. Faxon.
Secretary, Loring B. Barnes.
Treasurer, Matthew S. Parker.
Librarian, George H. Chickering.
Trustees, George W. Hunnewell, Thomas D. Morris, Theophilus Sover, Ephraim Wildes, George W. Palmer, James Rice, William Hawes, H. Farnam Smith.

A vote of thanks was passed to the retiring President, Col. Thomas E. Chickering, who responded very happily to the vote, pledging his influence on all occasions for the interests of the Society.

Votes of thanks were passed to the other retiring officers; to the lady associates; and to the Messrs. Chickering, for the use of their hall the past season; after which, some amendments to the by-laws were freely discussed, and referred to a committee for consideration.

The election of Dr. Upham appears to give very general satisfaction, not only among the members, but to the friends of the Society: and the known ability and indomitable perseverance of the newly elected President, in carrying forward to a successful issue, any enterprise which he undertakes, warrant the belief that a prosperous future is in store for the old Handel and Haydn Society; though little can be expected at present from this, or any other organization for musical purposes.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this Association was held at 4 o'clock Wednesday afternoon. The Treasurer's Report showed the total receipts, including uncollected dues, during the year, to be $10,106.98; expenditures, $7,298.92. The old Board of Directors was re-elected, as follows: J. Baxter Upham, E. D. Brigham, Eben Dale, George Derby, J. M. Fossenden, H. W. Pickering, J. P. Putnam. It was announced that the new organ now being built for the Association in would be ready to be shipped in a month, and the time of shipping it will be left discretionary with the Directors.

These well illustrated books continue to appear with regularity. The text of the Natural History is interesting and instructive, the illustrations being remarkably correct and spirited in design, as well as admirably executed.

L'ANN  E MUSICALE, &c., par P. SCUDO. Deuxi  me ann  e. Paris, 1861.

We have received from F. Leupoldt, 1323 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, the above entitled volume of which an elaborate notice was recently given in this Journal. It makes a valuable addition to the library of every musician, as no one can read the intelligent and candid criticisms of Scudo without pleasure and profit.

An American Company of strolling singers, called the Alleghanians, gave in December last, in the Island of Hewey, one of Cook's Archipelago, a grand concert, which was attended by the King of the Island, Makea. More than 2,000 tickets were sold, and the receipts were 78 pigs, 98 turkeys, 116 fowls, 16,000 cocoanuts, 5,700 pine-apples, 418 bushels bananas, 600 pumpkins, and 2,700 oranges. It required a day and a half to embark all these articles. The concert consisted of a vocal quatuor, and of several morceaux executed by means of bells of different sizes—from the dimensions of a bucket to those of a tumbler. The savages who composed the auditory listened open-mouthed, and remained motionless from admiration when the march from Norma was performed. At the end of the sitting, one of principal personages present rose and gravely complimented the performers by saying:—"We shall never forget you!"

There has been some talk of another Orpheonist expedition to London for another Orpheonist festival, but it has been put off, wisely, perhaps, seeing how badly the first was managed. Instead, there is to be a festival of the Choral Societies of France, at the Palais d'Industrie, at the end of September.

GIVING GYE A LIFT.—Describing the d  but last week of Mlle. Patti, whose performance seemed to promise us a second Jenny Lind, one of the critics made a remark that she "raised the house en masse to a high pitch of excitement." On reading this, the Wisconsin, who chanced to be just then in one of his facetious moods, observed to his friend Bernal, "Raised the house, did she? Why, really, she must be quite a hoister Patti!"—Punch.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

At the Grand Opera, after incessant groans of parturition, we have been at last presented with David's Herculanum. It did not take so long to disinter the buried city itself. On the first night of the revival all the dilettante world was assembled. The principal parts were filled by Mad. Gueymard-Lauters, M. Obin, and Mad. Fortunata de Franco (nee Tedesco). The last played the part of Olympia, originally assigned to Mad. Borghi-Mamo, and acquitted herself with complete success. Mad. Gueymard-Lauters was applauded to the echo in Lilia, and called before the curtain at the end of the second act. Owing to this lady's indisposition, the work of Felicien David was not repeated again till Monday last. Der Freisch  tz is to be the next revival, and it is already in hand.

The Italian Opera closed its doors for the season, on the 1st of May, and the troupe is now dispersed over every land, as at the fall of another Babel. Tenors, sopranos, barytones, basses, contraltos, birds of many a tuneful passage, have taken wing in all directions, like frightened wild fowl. Zucchini is to Bologna gone—his own, his native land—the realm of sausage and of song; Mad. Penco and Signor Graziani have crossed the British Channel in search of the golden fleece which Allion ever yields to foreign adventure. Signor Mario has quitted Paris for London, and so has Mad. Grisi. Not so Signor Badiali, who goes I know not where. The theatrical sheet, L'Entr'acte, publishes the financial and statistical reckoning of the past season, which is summed up as follows:—The total number of performances was 121, the highest number hitherto reached. Of these Rossini had for his share 21; Verdi, for his, 49; Bellini came off with 11; Donizetti with 5; and 5, too, was Flotow's share; Mozart's 8, and Cimarosa's a like number. The number of operas performed was 19. The total receipt from the 121 performances was 809,819fr. 95c., giving an average nightly receipt of 6,692fr 72c.

The Op  ra Comique holds out, in expectancy, a new work, the joint product of M. Rosier and M. Limander, in which the principal part will be allotted to M. Montanbry. M. Bataille is to make his reappearance in La Fee aux Roses, an opera by Hal  vy. Mad. Viardot had a benefit at the Th   tre Lyrique last night, the attractions being of the most remarkable description. The fragments, namely, of the second, third and fourth acts of Alceste, which created so great a sensation at the last concert of the Conservatoire; following these the third act of Otello, sung by Duprez and Mad. Viardot; the first act of Maria Stuarda, with Mad. Ristori next; then a new opera comique—first time—called Le Buisson Vert, by M.

Michel Carré as to words, and M. Gastinel as to music, M. Jules Petit, prizeman for singing and opéra comique this year at the Conservatoire, playing the principal rôle; the whole concluding with Les Rendez-vous Bourgeois.

BERLIN.—Mad. Lagrue has been giving a series of "starring" performances, which were excellently attended. This lady is a great favorite with the Berliners, and will, no doubt, soon pay them another visit. Her engagement was a real success, though, I am sorry to say, she was, on one occasion, prevented from appearing by sudden indisposition. She was announced to sing in Norma, but Mlle. Lucca took her part at a very short notice, and acquitted herself, under the circumstances, most creditably. She possesses intelligence and dramatic talent, but is over-weighted in the character of the Druid-priestess, for which her voice wants the requisite volume and power, and her acting the necessary dignity. Any impartial individual would have been at once convinced of this by her rendering of the first recitative, which struck me as singularly deficient in that grandeur and elevation with which we have been accustomed to hear it given. She sang the "Casta Diva," however, very pleasingly, and merited the applause bestowed on her. Adalgisa found an agreeable representative in Mlle. Fliess, who, although a novice, displays great ability, and will ere long, I am inclined to believe, prove a valuable acquisition to the operatic stage. Herr Fricks was an excellent Oroveso.

"Business" is exceedingly good just now at the Friedrich Wilhelmstädtsches Theater, the attraction being Mad. Janner Krall, who is engaged for a limited number of nights. She has been playing in Dittersdorf's burlesque opera of Die rothe Kappe, which has been revived expressly for her, and in which she lately created a great sensation at Dresden and Breslau. She is one of the best bravura singers in Germany, while, for playful archness, there are very few actresses who can equal her.

Every one imagined, some weeks since, that the regular concert season was at an end, and jaded musical critics fancied they had, for a time, escaped from close rooms to revel in al fresco Garten-Concerts, at the various semi rural coffeehouses in the neighborhood of Berlin. But, alas! how often are we doomed to experience the truth of the old proverb, "Der Mensch denkt, Gott lenkt," or, as the French have it, "L'homme propose, Dieu dispose." Winter seems to have set in again with its accustomed rigor, and the hail and cold have effectually put an end, for a time at least, to all outdoor amusements, which spring up here with the daisies and flourish with the flowers. The result is that the covering have been again removed from the benches in our concert-rooms, the gas is relighted, and a new course of indoor concerts inaugurated. This week, for instance, a concert was given for a charitable purpose by Herr Radecke. The principal novelty was a duet-sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, by Herr Rud. Radecke, brother of the concert giver, which was very well played by Herr Radecke and Dr. Bruns. The concert was brought to a close by Schumann's Pianoforte-Quartet, Op. 47, admirably executed by Herren Radecke, Grünwald, Kahle and Bruns.—Another very good concert was the fourth and last given by the Frauverein for the benefit of the Gustav-Adolph Fund, at which a new sonata in G major, by Taubert, for pianoforte and violoncello, was performed for the first time, by the composer and Herr Stahlknecht. No less interesting was the execution of Beethoven's so-called "Horn Sonata," Op. 17, by Herr Taubert and Herr Schunke. Mad. Jachmann-Wagner sang, among other pieces, the beautiful alto air from Elijah; and the Royal Domchor gave Meyerbeer's Brautgeleite in first-rate style. I cannot conclude this short summary of our doings in the concert line, without mentioning a concert given by Herr Friedrich Kiel, assisted by Herren Stahlknecht and De Alna, at which four very pleasing compositions of his own were performed, and met with unanimous approbation.

Herr Richard Wagner has gone to Carlsruhe for the purpose of being presented at Court. It is reported that his opera of Tristan und Isolde, dedicated, as you are aware, to the Grand-Duchess Louisa, is shortly to be produced there under his own superintendence.

London.

HERR DALLE ASTE, a bass singer of great continental repute, and pupil of the lamented Staudigl, has arrived in London. For some time past the foreign papers have spoken in high terms of his merits as a singer and the beauty of his voice. In Paris, Vienna, Dresden, and lately in Holland, Herr Dalle Aste has, it appears, created great effect in Don Giovanni, Fidelio, Le Nozze di Figaro, and Euryanthe.

Signor Dalle Aste, it may be remembered, produced a highly favorable impression in London some years since.

MR. CHARLES HALLE'S BEETHOVEN RECITALS at the St. James's Hall are likely to prove one of the most interesting features of the musical season, as it is proposed to give in a series of eight concerts, the sonatas of the great master in the order in which they are written. A very striking instance of the advanced taste in such matters is to be found in the knowledge and appreciation of the "tone-poet," who towers above his contemporaries, and who for originality, largeness of conception and power of expression stands almost alone. But a very few years since the later works of Beethoven were to the public almost a dead letter, while even by the majority of professors they were but imperfectly appreciated. True, his symphonies were periodically heard at the Philharmonic or other high-priced concerts, but the quartets, sonatas and chamber compositions in which he was so prolific, were all but virtually ignored. To the inauguration of the new state of things, we need go no farther back than 1859, when the Monday Popular Concerts first began the mission of introducing to the "musical masses," works all more or less new to this generation. We have so frequently dwelt upon the merits of these entertainments, that we need say no more here than to express our opinion that they have been the means of preparing the way and educating the taste for the reception of the recitals in question, and had this experiment been attempted some half dozen years since, we believe it would have then been as complete a failure as it appears now likely to be an entire success. The presentation of these sonatas in regular succession, appears to us in the same light as the arrangement of the pictures at the Manchester Art Treasures Exhibition in 1857, the chronological order being strictly observed, and the spectator thereby enabled to judge of the progress of art in infinitely less time, and with much greater certainty than by devoting years to travel and viewing scattered examples at different times and places. Thus in the four sonatas which were given on Friday the 17th, Op. 2, F minor No. 1, A major No. 2, C major No. 3, and E flat Op. 7, we have the influence of Mozart exhibited over the mind of the composer, although there is still more than ample evidence of the perfect independence and self-reliance which hereafter manifests itself in so remarkable a degree in what are known as the second and third periods of his career. It requires a pianist of no ordinary calibre to attack the difficulties involved in some of the best known sonatas, and even with the aid of a book is no small tax upon the physical and intellectual powers of the player, but when executed from memory alone, the undertaking almost approaches the line of hazardous, and it says no little for Mr. Charles Halle's qualifications, that all the four sonatas in question were given without the music. If he follows the example in the remaining concerts, as an effort of mnemonics alone, it will be something marvellous. Two songs, Dusek's "Name the glad day, dear," and Macfarren's "Ah, why do we love?" both sung with the unaffected simplicity of manner which is so characteristic of that rapidly rising artist, Miss Banks, agreeably relieved both pianist and audience.—Mr. Harold Thomas was the accompanist.

ANTWERP.—Nicolai's opera, Der Templer, translated by Dangias, has been successfully produced. Nicolai composed this work, under the title of Il Templario, in Rome, before he composed the Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor. It is quite Italian in style, and full of pleasing melodies.

A SECOND PAGANINI.—A Leipzig correspondent, writing to the Athenaeum, speaks in very high praise of a M. Lotto, a very young, but very fine, violinist, of the French school. The universal verdict is, that since Paganini no such "wonderful" player has been heard. We learn from the same source that a selection of forty of Sebastian Bach's songs, ten for each voice, taken from his various oratorios, cantatas, motets, &c., has been published by Whistling, of Leipzig. The selection has been arranged by Robt. Franz, who has arranged the accompaniments for the piano. M. Lotto is a pupil of M. Massart, one of the most respected professors in the Paris Conservatoire.

A BARBEROUS COMPLIMENT.—A popular hair-dresser, who is also a fanatico per la musica, and a devoted admirer of the composer of Il Trovatore, has just invented a new pomade, which, by way of compliment to the great musical maestro, he has styled "Verdi grease." We have little doubt but that, like the hundreds of popular airs of Signor Verdi, this brilliant emanation of genius, à la perruque, will soon be in everybody's head.—Liverpool Porcupine.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Father Molloy. 25

Those who visited the charming Parlor Operas, performed by Mr. and Mrs. Drayton, will recollect, among other songs, in which Mr. Drayton's fine voice and talent for the Comic shone prominently, this history of the Irishman's confusion to Father Molloy. The song is capable of producing great effect, and is now published for the first time.

Resignation. Sacred Song. Miss Lindsay. 30

This Song has quickly found its way into every musical family in England. It is highly prized as a valuable addition to their Sabbath Music.

Weep not fond heart. F. W. Kucken. 25

A new gem from the German. Kucken is the most popular modern German Song writer. His Songs are translated into all the principal languages. His Melodies sound in the School and in the Parlor, on the street and in Concerts. This Song is in his best style, and ranks with "Good night, farewell" in point of compass and difficulty.

Instrumental Music.

Union Quadrille. J. S. Knight. 35

Fine spirited music, with no lack of striking melodies. The Quadrille calls to mind some of Strauss' strains, whose compositions every dancer delights in. It is, of course, capital for dancing. Figures are added.

God save the Queen. Varied. A. Baumbach. 30
An excellent arrangement of medium difficulty.

Band Music.

DITSON'S SELECT BRASS BAND MUSIC; (on Cards). Lotos-Land.

Oh, land beloved! oh, land unknown!
By what blue Rhine or rapid Rhone,
Or any river man hath known,
Shall I arrive at thee?
Or by what mighty trackless seas,
Where the unwearied northern breeze
From dumb and frozen cavern flees
Triumphant, to be free.

Or by what desert, red and vast,
Breaking the flowered tropic blast,
Shall my too lingering steps at last
Attain to thy sweet shore?
Oh, plains serene! oh, rivers rolled
Like babbling dreams o'er sands of gold!
Fair birds that do your pinions fold,
And singing, cease to soar!

Skies, where such slumbrous mists are shed!
The heart forgets it ever bled,
And sleep lies on the lonely head,
Forgetting and forgot.
There nothing has been, or shall be,
But all things are, eternally.
The tired soul may not think nor see,
Such quiet rules the spot;

For there is neither hope nor fear,
No hated thing, nor nothing dear,
Nor any troubled atmosphere,
Nor any thing but rest.
Such utter sleep, such thoughtlessness,
As might a mortal life redress
And set aside its deadly stress,
From even a woman's breast.

Oh, land, dear land! sweet-visioned shore,
That no man's footsteps may explore,
Nor any but a fool deplore,
Yet would I slept in thee!
The jester tires of cap and bells,
The disenchanting laughs at spells,
The past all future lies foretells.

Dear land, come true to me!

ROSE TERRY.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Through the Country of the White Hills.

We went away from town to escape for a while the bustle, the restlessness, the wear and tear of mind and body. Regularity, the first requisite of a "respectable" man in any vocation, cuts deep ruts into ones road of mental progress. There is no better mender of such roads than Nature, the kindly mother of all. A few days with her at her own house and all those ruts, be they ever so deep cut and irregular, are filled up; the road is smooth again, and thought no longer halting, flashes forth, swift and far away, without let or hindrance. And if you go in "The charming month of May,

When all the flowers are fresh and gay," they are filled up with pleasant things such as it is hard to tell of, though we all know them. There are the little shining blades of grass, the buttercups, the stately trees with their young, fresh leaves, and underneath them, if you go where we went, the fragrant Mayflower with its blossoms almost white as snow. And then there are the mossy rocks and running over them merrily the limpid brooks, and further on the ponds. And over all the expanse of the heavens and the eternal sun, lighting them up all, the blades of grass and the buttercups, the trees, the rocks and the brooks, and diving deep down into the ponds and scooping them out into just such an azure vault as spreads above them. Yea, even to the may-flowers in the solemn darkness of the holy forest steal the sunbeams, running over from the gay, young leaves when they have drunk enough of the golden light, and here and there one will find a narrow space to creep through aslant, where there are no leaves, and kiss a tuft of moss awake that had lain slumbering there all through the winter under its coverlet of snow. Now such a kind mother is Nature, that everywhere she has strewn about these remedies for a mind afflicted with the effects of business-routine and regularity. You may try to drive her out with a pitchfork—yet will she return, as old Horace said a long time ago, and it was an old trick of her's then. Try it; even in our cities, where we shut her out by flag-stones from the streets. Leave off the daily routine of stepping over particular paving-stones and see how, quickly, back comes a little blade of grass to take the place again, that its ancestors held long ago, "ante urbem conditam," as the Romans used to say, or in a free translation: before the pilgrim fathers landed in the Mayflower. Yes Nature is everywhere, comely everywhere and kind withal, and she gives you without stint whatever she has. But then, there are places where she used to play in days of old, in those hoary times, when she herself was yet young and did not count so many years (we do not care to repeat them after the learned ones, who have counted them,—at least they think so.) In such places she allowed all her glorious playthings to remain lying about, just as she left them. And fondly she comes back to them every spring and lingers a little while by them, just to deck them with the freshness and glory of youth once more. There you see her mountains, here one and there another over it, just as she tumbled them out of her lap, when she was done playing with them. There you see the maiden-like birch with hanging locks and the melancholy fir just as she had planted them long, long ago. And there the very brooks that she made the clouds yield forth to clothe her mountains in her livery of green, are trickling down through the moss and then, gathering headway and strength they come tumbling with thundering noises over the bare sides of the mountains in mighty falls and rush forth in broad rivers. And there the voices of the woods sing over the old strains of whispered solitary longing, or of glorious, fresh life, or of wild and passionate storm, as in times of yore. And all seems good and pleasant, and all around you is health and strength; and you forget your regularity and routine and are a child again of your good mother Nature. But the best of all her gifts is this, that the images of these things, glorious and sublime, do not leave you, but go with you, if you really love her, and help you for awhile to bear up and keep your mind fresh under the monotony of regularity, which you have to undergo again, when you come home.

And so we went to one of the finest of Nature's playgrounds, the White Hills. We carried some music with us (and this, O kind and gentle reader, is my excuse for sending these lines to our old friend, Dwight's Journal, and the sole cause of your reading them,—unless you have turned over to the next article ere you got thus far)—one of us in his fingers, both of us in our heads. And yet we hardly need have had any; there was so much music in the rippling, murmuring brooks, in the waving sighing firs, in the sweeping gusts of wind and even in the twittering of the young birds. Still there was scarcely a way to leave it behind, we had both got so used to it. And we were glad too, that we had it.

There is a magnificent mirror stretched out and firmly set in the ground with a frame of gorgeous green mountains, which the red man used to call Winnipiseogee. And where the streaming, shrieking iron horse leaves you, there is an inn at a place called Alton Bay, which you doubtless know. But should you not, you could not do any better than go there this summer. Delightful rides both on the lake and around the hills with views of the indented lakeshore, beautiful beyond description; the house itself almost surrounded by woods—there you are with Nature at her own home. And besides an attentive and kind host there will be more attraction if you are musically inclined—a piano, as we were assured. We ourselves had to miss that luxury, it being so early in the season. And so my friend of the nimble fingers with his head and heart full of music and mirth and kindness had to curb their impetuous delight at their finding themselves on keys again, to slow measures, as there was nothing but—a melodeon. Do not be frightened, gentle reader, at the idea. Melodeons are instruments, poor and unsatisfactory; but my friend of the nimble fingers (now it is quite tedious to write those last six words so often and a roundabout arrangement, at best; so we will call him L—d in future, which—entre nous—is his real name all but the missing letters; the writer being sufficiently modest not to intrude his own critical I on the reader, will be designated by his signature †). To go on then, L—d knew how to call forth from the trembling reeds delights nevertheless, and slow grand chorals and canons and fugati interwoven with many hued harmonies floated through the twilight of the room, dimly lit up by the crackling open wood fire. Memories of olden times came thronging around, floating on the flood of solemn tones, and friends were assembling around the listener on the sofa († had got hold of the hotel register and found some very dear names of years past) when the holy sounds were interrupted by the words: "supper is ready," not unwelcome, though, after the ride in the afternoon.

Skimming across the lake the next day, after a pleasant ride, though it was somewhat blustering, we were landed at Centre Harbor. And here the second instrumental concert took place, after a pleasant walk in the woods. We had quite good company during it, Schumann, Schubert and Robert Franz accompanying us, they rather silently, only here and there some snatches of their music being heard, while we were discussing their works and merits. "Well," so L—d closed our talk, as we came back to the portico of the Senter House, "Schubert will after all carry off the palm for invention and inspiration, while Franz vastly surpasses him as far as sentiment and delicate feeling, and the musical rendering of the situation are concerned." But, oh how delightfully, after an early supper, those lovely runs from the Adagio of Chopin's E minor concerto chimed in with the mellow light, streaming slantingly down on the lake and lighting up the sparkling, rippling wavelets with the fresh green of the meadows in the foreground, each little blade of grass glistening in the evening sun. And the merry ballad in A flat by the same master with its superb working up towards the end! And then like reflections from our childhood, little "Kinderszenen" by Schumann, looked in upon us. Now the "Curiose Geschichte" (curious story) astonished and then the "Knight of the Hobby-horse" delighted the audience (to wit, *†). After the poet had closed the book (it was the closing piece entitled "Der Dichter spricht" (the poet speaks), but the book was merely in our heads and in L—d's fingers, came those beautiful songs of Franz, arranged by Liszt: Der Bote (the messenger) and Willkommen mein Wald (Welcome, O woods). And after some prelude the brilliant and delicate tone-waves of Chopin's A flat Etude, with the melody floating on the top of each ripple closed the concert, which *† assures the reader, was highly relished. There was a short matinée the next morning, graced by the presence of a beauty from the home of the commander at Fortress Monroe. But we cannot be expected to put in all the programmes. A short entertainment of vocal music followed the day; but between the two we had seen the White Hills, actually white with snow, all their grand summits splendidly frosted and glistening in the sun against the blue sky. We had seen them from the Red Hill, and on the other side the vast basin of the lake lay looking in the warm sunshine with its hundreds of green islands and its graceful, undulating shores. We had seen grim Chocorua and peaked Kearsarge in the distance. We had admired the Conway meadows, dotted with their elms and the White Horse ledge, with its grand overtopping background of the White Hills again. It was glorious. Beethoven consented to give us a good deal of symphonic music; but neither the birds of the woods, nor the kine in the meadows nor the humming bumble-bees heard any sound at all, though that "scene on the brook" in the Pastoral was all about them. Then followed the third and last instrumental concert at North Conway; which it must be confessed, was listened to by *† with attention rather divided between brushing his boots preparatory to the visit to the kind lady who had come up before us on the stage, and ordering and discussing the dinner with the obliging landlady of the North Conway House. Capital dinner by the way, and got up in an astonishing short time with all sorts of delicacies. And here the musical record closes for a while. Nature claimed all attention and when we were not climbing about on rocks, or snow-balling each other, or wading up streams to cataracts, we were riding; and riding it the bracing mountain air makes one drowsy. Well, the Silver Cascade in the North was splendid and walking across the stream on a bridge of snow on the 1st of June, something of a novelty.

There were no more entertainments of a musical character until we came in our migrations to the Echo Lake in the Franconia Mountains. There the rocks were obliging enough to repeat for us, besides a deal of arrant nonsense, full chords, including minor seventh and ninth, major and minor. We may add, that they were duly resolved. The fierce blasts of the Indian's horn not unaptly suggested the Eroica at least to us. I doubt if the Indian shared our reminiscences. And though the wind seemed to have taken umbrage at our burdening him with our vocal and instrumental performances—for the violent gusts almost swamped our boat—we yet got home safe to the delicacies of the dinner table at the Profile House, and had occasion to bless our good star that had led us to this vicinity. The Flume was magnificent, fuller of water than *† had ever seen it before, and the coolness of the Pool a delightful offset to the sultry, odorous air of the woods. Long will live in our memories the half aquatic, half gymnastics exercises at this rockbound basin of cool, foaming water; and if the woods and the rocks were astonished at the strange noises and the pool at the merry company we certainly could not help it. It was the opening of the season and right merrily we opened it. Little remains to be said about the homeward journey. A runaway horse, a capsized buggy, a drenching rain and bruised and aching limbs are not especially pleasant, much less do they present fit subjects for musical treatment except perhaps the rain, which found a musical translation in the Pastoral. But then—to be strictly true—we did not think of it just then, sprained wrists and fingers not being pleasant appendages to a musical body and bruises generally not inviting musical reveries.

So this journey through the country of the White Hills closed. But not the pleasant, health-giving refreshing and strengthening effects, which our visit to Mother Nature left us in spite of our bruises. And if any of our readers feel jaded and tired out as did the writer and his friend, let them go to Lake Winnepisseogee and to the mountain streams and dive down in them, then they "will be well again," as the watersprite said to Goethe's fisherman. For there is a beauty about the life of Nature, mysterious and lovely, joyous and sublime; and the woods and the mountains gladly impart of their own beauty and strength to the son of the Earth who comes among them with a love and reverence for good Mother Nature, such as she deserves at the hands of her children. *†

The Development of the Musical Faculties.

OF INSTRUCTION.

How often—we ask again—do we hear teachers complain of the want of disposition in their pupils, and how rarely is any serious exertion made to develop and strengthen this disposition? How seldom are the means anxiously and assiduously sought for, to strengthen the weak, and supply the deficient! Is, then, the object of musical instruction merely to enable the pupil to play a certain number of compositions,—to acquire an amount of mechanical cleverness, and a quick perception of visible signs? All this can be mastered by the understanding and corporeal aptitude alone, without any deeper participation in the soul; but it is also fruitless in the mind and disposition, and without life in artistic feeling. He, however, who is not satisfied with that empty and ineffective advantage, but thirsts for the really operative benefit of artistic cultivation, must seek it nowhere but in the fountain and domain of all art—in the artistic feeling—and in the natural disposition from or to which everything is developed or tends.

Here a fundamental principle presses forward, which might seem too evidently correct to require mentioning, if it were not so often violated in practice. We ought never to place anything before the scholar—no composition whatsoever, which he is not capable of completely understanding. Works of deep meaning, much combination, or even merely great extent, require a certain maturity and settled formation of the mind for their performance, if they are to be presented with feeling and judgment, and not simply with mechanical dexterity. It would be thought ridiculous to give the works of Dante or Shakespeare to children, or even the easy extravagant fictions of Ariosto, and yet we require them to play Bach's fugues, and Beethoven's deepest works, or richly figured concerted compositions; and we give grand opera scenes to beginners, who might delight both themselves and us in a simple natural song. Unfortunately, this process, with a little cleverness and mechanical diligence, cannot easily fail of producing an ostensible effect; and thus parents and scholars are deluded with the outward appearance of having made some progress—of a great step forward having been achieved; whereas, in reality, only one thing has been done, that is, nature has been paralyzed and placed out of the reach of sympathy.

OF THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE FEELING OF MEASURE.

It is in this matter that the complaints of want of perception chiefly originate. This defect is, indeed, often formally instilled into the scholar. The feeling of measure and sensation of rhythm—we repeat it,—are innate in every human being gifted with understanding, but, like every other faculty, in different gradations; and they are certainly not so far elaborated by nature, as to enable their possessors to distinguish and perform the manifold and artistically combined rhythms of our compositions. Let us examine one of the easiest sonatas of Mozart, Haydn, or Beethoven, or one of the airs of Spontini, Weber, or Rossini; what a number of digressing and artistically entangled rhythms! How the parts of bars are divided into quavers,—sometimes into seminquavers or triplets, with dots,—or joined together by binds or syncopations; what a variety of accentuations must occur in such a composition! Everyone who has but a proximate idea of this rhythmic multiplicity, must perceive at once, that without much care and education, the natural feeling of measure could not suffice for the performance of such productions. But this is just what the generality of teachers concern themselves the least about. If they pursue any regular plan in the instruction of the scholar, the compositions follow each other, almost exclusively in the ratio of the dexterity they require in their execution. The entangled rhythm remains uncomprehended; and it is considered sufficient, if the measure, that is, the equableness of motion, be forcibly preserved by the perpetual counting of the master, accompanied by the pupil, and by incessant beating time in extraordinary and ridiculous attitudes. By these means, however, the feeling of measure, the finer rhythmic sense, and the insight into the nature of rhythm, cannot assuredly be inspired and developed. With every new composition, this misery of counting, beating, and stamping begins afresh, until a mechanical habit of equality is formed, instead of a living feeling for equal and uniform measure and its expression. It is unfortunately too true, that most musicians are content with the sense and capacity for mechanical equality of measure,—for the cold inanimate beat; and consider the rich and living rhythmic feeling as superfluous.

How easy is it, on the other hand, to an enlightened teacher, particularly in the beginning, to elucidate the various forms of rhythm by a methodical arrangement in respect of simplicity and increasing complicity or mixture! Marches for the boys, dances for the girls—four-hand playing upon the pianoforte, or playing with other instruments, making the accentuation perceptible from the beginning—repetition of purposely accented playing—in case of necessity, marching or exercising arranged motions by the pupil, to the playing of the master; all these expedients,—preceded, of course, by a perfectly clear explanation and analysis of the rhythm, and many small helps and incidents arising from the instruction itself, and which cannot now be named—are the most appropriate means of cultivating the feeling of measure.*

DEVELOPMENT OF THE FEELING OF TONE.

Students of the pianoforte are in a still worse position with regard to the development of the sense of tone. Here elementary teachers imagine they have accomplished everything, if the scholar can play correctly the note before him. Whether he have a living perception of what he plays, or whether this excite any emotion or consciousness in him, is not thought worthy of consideration.

With better intentions, however, many teachers fail in their means. We will not again mention, that in respect of this faculty also, the choice of a profession must depend upon the capacity of the scholar; but proceed at once to the first means of awakening the perception of tone; to those means indeed, which, on false fundamental principles, are generally avoided or thrown aside.

The first practice is the exertion of our own faculties diligently, in seeking and inventing successions of tones.

In beginning the pianoforte (or any other instruments admitting similar exercises), the first lessons generally consist of a string of finger exercises, which are repeated in all the scales. On this occasion, we advise that no exercise be written for some time, but that the scholar imitate them from the teacher, and thus immediately imprint them on his memory. Only when the exercises become so numerous, that we might apprehend they would be forgotten, would we allow them to be written, and then in brief, the major in the scale of C major, and the minor in the scale of A minor. Then the scholar must seek out the same exercises in all the other scales by the aid of his ear alone. In like manner, when an exercise has been given to the pupil in chords, he must seek it out also on every degree and semitone; during which performance, the utmost assistance we could allow from the teacher, would be, the exclamation of "False!" whenever an error were committed. Only when the scholar has attained a certain proficiency, may he be told how the scales and tones are to be named, and he may then be allowed to write them out. It is very desirable, also, to induce the pupil to perform the scales and chords with his voice.

A second means of producing a lively impression of tone, is to play and sing from the memory. The dread expressed by most parents and teachers, of playing by heart or from ear, must appear ridiculous to all persons who are well informed in matters of teaching and education in general; since, in all other objects of mental cultivation, the employment and strengthening of the memory is so seriously and authoritatively insisted on. The only ground of objection is, that the beginner, not looking at the notes, is liable to play incorrectly, that he will gradually forget his exercises, and never be able to play with certainty from notes. Against these evils, there are very sure remedies close at hand. Should this incorrectness be apprehended, only give the scholar such long and so many compositions at once, that it will be impossible for him to learn them by rote. Occupy him early with four-hand or accompanied compositions, which are difficult to learn by heart, since no single part contains them entirely. In fine, do not allow everything to be so learned; and in what is permitted, insist upon the most rigid fidelity to the notes, and on the slightest deviation in this respect, let the notes be resumed. In an extreme case, an unfinished composition can be given to a scholar who seizes by heart with extraordinary rapidity; and different parts of the composition can be filled up, altered, and corrected continually, so that the attention of the scholar must be constantly engaged in detecting the changes. There is no doubt, indeed, that an intelligent and attentive teacher will always find means to prevent the abuse of a faculty so agreeable and pregnant with such innumerable advantages to the player, and so manifestly precious to a composer. The highest freedom, power, and feeling in performance, or in conducting, are not to be attained while we are chained to the notes: and how composition and improvisation are to be carried to any perfection without a sure memory, is not easy to be imagined.

Learning to play and sing by heart, not only strengthens the feeling of tone, inasmuch as it necessitates the imprinting of single relations of tones, and the recalling of them according to such impression,—but it enables us, also, to imagine whole compositions, with all their combinations present to our minds. Here we may add a third means, which is peculiarly adapted to quicken the attention, to excite the watchfulness of the scholar, to accustom him every moment to instant and enlarged apprehension and decision, without which no deep penetration can be effected in art or in artistic works. This means is, frequent playing and singing at sight, especially four-handed or with accompaniment, and, indeed at once, in the absolute time (tempo), or nearly so, required in the composition. The teacher in this case must make the pupil understand, that it is absolutely necessary for the success of this procedure, that the composition should be played throughout without omission, interruption, or remission in time, to the end; that no reflection, no repetition, no looking back for errors, is permitted; but on the contrary, that the eye must constantly press forwards, and the performance must instantly and inevitably follow the eye. This alone must be required of the scholar, and must unrelentingly be insisted on by the teacher, and be more particularly and unfailingly observed in practice, if the latter should play with his scholar. On the other hand, the scholar must be comforted with the reflection that under such circumstances, he is not answerable for single failures, omissions, &c. The first attempts at this practice are often, indeed, wretched performances—quite laughable even, to those who do not consider how many qualifications must work herein together for the best possible effect to be produced. Usually, however, a vast improvement is manifested with unexpected rapidity, if the teacher begins and proceeds with judgment.

Of course, together with the above exercises, other compositions are most carefully studied, and are considered the chief materials of instruction. For the playing at sight, easier compositions are selected; and when they have been used for this object, they may be carefully studied. Then the disadvantages arising possibly from sight playing, that is, over rapidity and inexactness, &c., may be corrected.

In fine, may we never, indeed, willingly suppress that most fruitful means of animating and exalting the musical sense, invention; but with joy and hope, on all occasions, most tenderly foster and encourage it, whether it be exerted in writing or at the instrument. How often is the young pupil reproved by teachers and parents, if he allows himself to try and try, and seek out his fancies on the piano! How often—we have already deplored it—is he told that that is useless dreaming, and that a finger exercise is much more improving! How often are his first attempts at writing thrown away with contempt, and his want of talent, or the widely different profession for which he is destined, urged upon him, in order to withdraw him from such nonsensical fancies and vain exertions. To a highly-gifted individual, such insults are simply discouraging. To a less gifted person, they are too often destructive. Let no man be enticed into the profession of a composer. He who does not feel interiorly an irresistible calling to that course of life, has no security for its success. But let not the highest and most prolific form in which musical sense and power can be worked out and perfected, be disturbed. We are all exercised from childhood upwards, in classical employment, even in versification. Are we, therefore, all educated to be authors or, perhaps, poets? By no means. But there is no more powerful means of developing the mind, and making it master of its organ—speech, than the elaboration of its own thoughts and imaginings. How much more important, then, must such a means be in music, for which we have no such enormous preparatory formation, than in thinking and writing, for which our whole life has been a school, by our incessant thought and speech, from the earliest age.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

* I: is only against excess in counting—against incessant and deafening counting aloud, and that insufferable beating time—that we wish to inveigh. There cannot be altogether dispensed with, particularly in the beginning. When their employment becomes necessary, the word used must be uttered sharply, whereby the feeling of measure is kept lively and attentive. A drawing utterance occasions indecision and uncertainty; impatient loudness deafens; and stamping the time disturbs the holding-on. A short loudly whispered "One! two!" of the teacher at the proper time, a gentle and punctual tap with the finger on the reading desk or on the arm of the pupil, governs the measure more surely, and excites the feeling of measure more intimately, than the unseemly grimaces by which many a leader endeavors to display his zeal. In distributions or divisions not easy to apprehend, and two-part order (for example, in the solution of crotchets into quavers, semiquavers, &c.) instead of "One! two!" we may count "Firstly! second!" in which the word may indicate the part of a bar, and each syllable a part thereof. If the phrase should change at once into three-part distribution, the Firstly! second! must be changed again into One! two! three! &c. In quick movements, half or even whole bars only are counted. The playing of difficult passages an octave higher by the master with the pupil, is very inspiring; and also counting parts only of bars in quick passages, and smaller members in slow passages. When the scholar has acquired some certainty, it is particularly desirable that he be led to omit the counting in easy passages, and resume it on the recurrence of passages of importance. In general, the scholar should be induced to relinquish external aid so soon as his apprehension and practice will allow it.

Märsel's Metronome is a useful assistant to enable the pianoforte student to preserve equable measure in his exercises. It ought not, however, to be placed upon the instrument on which he is playing, because its regularity might be disturbed by the nervous energy of his execution, as differently going clocks will assimilate in their movements if placed upon the same board.

National Anthems AND PATRIOTIC WAR-SONGS.

THE MARSEILLES HYMN.

There is generally a great deal of confusion and contradiction prevalent in the accounts given of the origin and history of popular airs and songs, especially those of a loyal, patriotic or military description. This is the case with several of quite modern character, and of less than a century's date, and which have been read or listened to by many persons now living, within the first year of their production. Without referring now to instances of this in our own country, a remarkable and interesting case of the kind is presented in the various stories which have been circulated and believed as to the alleged facts and circumstances of the composition and first performance of the grand anthem of the French people—a song which has been actually productive of more positive effects, of greater events, than any other words or tune ever known.

The first form of this romance which I heard was given to me in New Haven, in the year 1840, by a gentleman (now deceased) of considerable literary pretensions, who had then been in the editorial business about twenty years. It was at that time only a floating tradition, with no more definite form than this:

"THE MARSEILLES HYMN—music and all—was composed by De Lisle (a young officer in the French army during the first Revolution) while he was staggering through the streets to his quarters, after a midnight carouse. Any person can perceive at once that the tune is merely bacchanalian in its character and origin, intensely so. It has the measure of a drunkard's reel, and the whirl of a drinking chorus about it."

This remark was made to me on the occasion of the public singing of a serious parody which I had made upon the current English paraphrase of the original, and which had passed, without censure, under the critical revision of James G. Percival and James A. Hillhouse.

This story, coming to me from a respectable source, I received without question, and supposed it to be true history, until within the last ten years, or thereabouts, when a characteristically Frenchy nouvellette appeared in the feuilleton of some Parisian journal, to this purport:

"There is a young man of genius—a genius both in poetry and music—yet a youth to fortune and to fame unknown. He is poor, very poor, and writes poetry to save himself from starvation. Being an ardent French republican, on occasion of the approach of the invading German army, under command of the Duke of Brunswick, in 1792, inspired by patriotism, he writes the words and composes the music of the song now known as 'The Marseilles Hymn.' He tries to sell it to the music sellers and publishers. None of them will touch it. He offers it to theatre-managers, with no better success. Accidentally, his composition falls into the hands of an eminent actress, who is a great singer and a public favorite. She appreciates it—admires it—and learns it, with the purpose of astonishing her audience with it on the first proper occasion. Accordingly, after due preparation, she comes out with it, in full burst, before an entranced and almost breathless throng in the theatre. It is encored repeatedly, amid thunders of applause and the most rapturous enthusiasm. At length, the name of the author is demanded, with a unanimous shout. The cantatrice pronounces it, and describes him. He is not in the house. Ascertaining the place of his residence, the whole assembly, in a perfect furor of grateful admiration, rush into the streets, in the direction of his lodgings, to hail and glorify the hitherto unknown patriot-poet.

"Meanwhile, the poor youth, unconscious of the success of his composition, not knowing even the intention to produce it on the stage, has sunk to the lowest depths of want and distress; and, in his utter hopelessness, has resorted to the usual expedient of a despairing Frenchman—inhalation of carbonic acid gas. He has closed windows and door—has lighted the charcoal; but, before becoming quite insensible, he hears a strange tremendous uproar in the street. He listens. What—can it be? Is it?—yes—yes, it is, indeed, the grand chorus of his own war-song and battle-hymn pealing on the midnight air, from thousands of voices. His apartment is taken by storm—door battered down—he is saved—he revives to hope, to glory, and to comfort—is cheered, welcomed, fêted, idolized, &c."

This is as pretty a specimen of Parisian newspaper romance as could be offered. I do not know that the author intended that it should be believed; but very probably it has been taken as sober truth by many plain, matter-of-fact people, such as largely inhabit this country and the English-speaking world generally. The French have a peculiar taste for inventions of this style—a peculiar faculty of getting them up, and of appreciating them. Of this, we have another instance in connection with the same theme. It has been made the subject of a very striking historical picture, which was exhibited and sold in this city not many years ago. I give this (as I have the preceding) from memory, having no book at hand to which I can refer:

Rouget de Lisle was a subaltern officer in the garrison of Strasburg, in 1692. The city was endangered and in distress, in consequence of the invasion of France by the legions of the German Empire advancing to overthrow the democratic republic, and restore the Bourbon to monarchical power. Strasburg, though originally a German city, was faithful to the cause of French liberty and independence. De Lisle, like other republican soldiers of that time (Latour d'Auvergne, for instance), was a young man, of high literary endowments. His qualities gave him admission into the best families of the place, among others, into that of the burgomaster, or chief civic magistrate, who, with his wife and two daughters, encouraged and enjoyed the exercise of their favorite guest's poetical and musical gifts.

The troubles of that revolutionary epoch, the perils of the republic, the commercial ruin caused by the war, and the general distress of the community, were naturally frequent topics of their conversation. In view of the general despondency, the magistrate suggested to his gallant and gifted young friend the production of a song, adapted to the exigency—a war-hymn—a battle-cry—that should re-animate the hopes and arouse the courage of the almost despairing children of the new republic. The wife and fair daughters seconded the call. The youthful poet ardently desired to comply with the request, but long essayed in vain. The lyric muse was reluctant, and, for a time, refused her inspiration. At length, during one gloomy evening's conversation the burgomaster draws forth the last bottle of wine left in the house. The means of replenishing it or supplying its place were distant, or wholly deficient, in fact, might be regarded as neither in esse nor in posse. (Character of the wine not recollected—most probably Hochheimer—but, possibly, Johannisberg). It is placed on the cover of the pianoforte; the cork is drawn; the lid is raised; the poet and composer (esimio lirico) is seated; he takes a drink; he touches the keys with trembling hand; he takes another drink; his touch is bolder—his ideas clearer—his imagination more brilliant—and so forth and so on, till the last drop in the bottle has gone down the throat of the bard: and then bursts forth the song—the tune. The burgomaster and burgomistress—likewise the two burgomisses—stand listening, spell-bound, enchanted, while the anthem rolls forth in the first of its now innumerable vocal and instrumental utterances. "The child is born," and its name is not "The Marseilles Hymn," but "THE SONG OF THE ARMY OF THE RHINE."

All this is very pretty—but, at the same time, not only absurdly improbable, but positively and demonstrably untrue.

Rouget De Lisle may have been an unconscious plagiarist—an innocent thief—believing, perhaps, that he was composing a tune, when, in fact, he was but recalling strains which he had long previously heard in some forgotten locality. He declared, in a publication of his own, some years after, that he "composed the melody and the words of this song during the night which followed the declaration of war, toward the end of April, 1792." And out of those few words of his all these fine stories have been spun.

Now—"Mark how a plain tale shall put them down"—all of them, including the poet himself. I give the whole of the ascertained and ascertainable facts, on the highest authority.

Mr. John C. Scherpf, a learned musical teacher and performer, well known in this city (and learned in many other things besides music), has done me the great favor to investigate this curious piece of history and mystery, and has at my request kindly furnished the following critical report on the subject, which has been, within a few days past, also published by him in the German:

THE MARSEILLAISE.—The same obscurity in which the authorship of the English National Hymn was for a long time enveloped, seems also to have attended the favorite song of the French Revolution. It was but natural that the French should name a Frenchman as the composer of this national air, which even at the present day fills every French heart with transport—until more and more voices loudly claimed the Marseillaise as the copy of a German religious song, in fact, as has been proved lately by the organist, Hamma, in Meersburg, the exact copy of a melody from the Credo in a Mass (No. 4) by Holtzmann, Kapellmeister (director of the musical chapel) to the Prince Elector of the Palatinate at Meersburg.

Already in 1792, when the enthusiasm for this song was at its height, when, in the true sense of the word, it reëchoed throughout the whole of France, and inspired every heart—a rumor was spreading that the melody was a German one, and even the poem itself was ascribed to a German, George Forster. (a) This rumor disappeared during those troublous times, when the solution of more important questions was needed, until it was again called forth in 1830, by the discovery that the melody of the liberty-song of that time, the Parisienne (b) was taken from a German popular air, which had been sung by the English-German Legion and the Hanoverian troops in 1814 and 1815. Benches and Roux have also introduced the notice in their "Histoire parlementaire de la Révolution," that the Marseillaise was originally composed by a German for the army of Biron (c). Rouget de l'Isle (d) himself claims the Marseillaise as his own work, as he says in a collection of French songs: "I composed the melody and words of this song during the night which followed the declaration of war toward the end of April, 1792." If, on the one hand, it would be a matter of surprise that a mere amateur should have succeeded in writing such an exciting poem and such a splendid melody during the few hours of one night we find on the other hand, in a work of Castil Blaze (e) a statement, that at the private theatre of Madame de Montesson, who was secretly married to the Duke of Orleans, in 1782, there was heard, for the first time, a German song, with chorus and refrain, a melody of several stanzas, which ten years later, filled all France with the greatest enthusiasm. With this text of Rouget's the German melody was adopted as a "Chant de l'armée du Rhin," which the regiments in Strasburg and Alsace sang and played as a march. Thence the song was carried to the South of France, and finally by the battalions of Marseilles to Paris, where the composition of the melody was at that time attributed partly to Julien (?), partly to Gossec (f), Pleyel (g), and more particularly to Mehul (h) who, however, arranged it only more fully for the bands.

a George Forster—probably John George Forster—who, with his father, accompanied Capt. Cook on his voyage around the world. He was a zealous republican, born near Dantzic, in November, 1754—died, 1794.

b Parisienne, poetry by Casimir Delavigne, was written 1830, for the Revolution.

c Biron—Armand Louis de Gostaut, Duc de Biron, born in 1747. Fought in command of French troops in America during the Revolution; was executed 1794.

d Joseph Rouget de Lisle, born at Lens le Saulnier, May 10th, 1760—died in 1836. Is said to have composed "la Marseillaise" in Strasburg. Klopstock, the German poet, once said to him in Hamburg "Your hymn has cost Germany more than 50,000 brave soldiers." Under Robespierre he was incarcerated, and only that tyrant's death saved him from the scaffold. In 1830 the Chambers offered him, who had then been almost forgotten, a pension of 6000 francs which, however, he did not accept. He also wrote "Chants de vengeances" and "Chant de guerre."

e François Henri Joseph Castil Blaze, born at Caillon, 1784. Excellent musicians, critic, translator of various German operas for the French stage.

f François Joseph Gossec, born 1733, died 1829. Composed the memorable hymn, "à la Divinité," which was sung on the festival, when the Parisian again acknowledged the existence of a Supreme Being. He also composed an apotheosis of Voltaire, and a hymn for Mirabeau's funeral.

g Ignaz Pleyel, born in Austria, 1757; died in Paris, 1831. Well-known composer and piano-manufacturer. Composed a hymn to Liberty.

h E. H. Mehul, born 1762, died 1817. Celebrated composer; took a great interest in the French Revolution, and created much enthusiasm by his popular songs: "Chant du départ"—"De Victoire"—"De Retour."

Now, as to the occasion of the change of the name of De Lisle's song, by which it lost its original and justly descriptive title, by the casual acquisition of a new one wholly unmeaning and incongruous with its words—I give the following statement, which was recalled to my mind by the renowned poet, Fitz Greene Halleck, in a recent conversation on the analogies and contrasts between the present Southern revolt and the first French Revolution.

In 1793, the "Committee of Public Safety" at Paris (Robespierre, Danton, Marat, St. Just & Co.) summoned the people from all parts of France to assemble in overwhelming force at the capital to put down the scheme of the Girondins for the division of the country into several parts, under independent governments. These Girondins (so named from the great river Gironde, which traverses the section which they represented) attempted to effect the "secession" of their portion of the South of France, under the ancient name of Guienne, with an anti-democratic government, expecting aid and protection from the British.

To crush this disunion conspiracy, the people marched to the metropolis in legions from all quarters. When the vast delegation from Marseilles entered the gates, they happened to be singing Rouget de Lisle's "Song of the Army of the Rhine," with grand choral effect. It was new in Paris, and it was caught up at once spontaneously and simultaneously and simultaneously by the great Pan-Gallic congregation. Thus, without purpose or pre-meditation, and by mere accident, it became the French National Anthem, the Hymn of National Union and indivisible unity, through its words contain not the slightest allusion or reference to that point. It was sung and roared by the Revolutionary mobs through the dreadful scenes that followed, until its sound became a terror to all the foes of the democratic "French Republic, one and indivisible!" It rang its death-notes in the ears of the unhappy Girondin Secessionists as their heads in swift succession came under the keen knife of the guillotine. To this music the armies of the republic thenceforward marched over Europe in an unbroken and unparalleled career of victory and conquest. It became not only the Song of the Nation, but "the Song of the Age"—emphatically and veritably a true Carmen Seculare. It is, indeed, the music of the ages and of nations. The bands of the Ottoman Sultan harshly peal it on the shores of the Bosphorus and Euxine. It is heard as a sound of courageous and triumphant hope over the waves of the three unfrozen oceans, and along the coasts of mighty continents and innumerable islands. There is a magic in its tone that charms the ear of savage and civilized alike, wholly uninfluenced by climate and race. No musical composition yet known has ever animated so many hearts at once, or aroused such mighty multitudes to patriotic ecstasy. No tune in existence is likely to outlive it; and I am confident that I did not misname it when, in a previous publication, I styled it "The Immortal Song."

I did not err in so denominating it—employing words in their correct unprofessing sense—although, in exact technical language, the “Marselles Hymn” is not a song—not really a hymn—not, rigidly speaking, even an anthem. It is simply a chant, as Rouget de Lisle denominating the tune when he adapted it, and imperfectly adapted his verses to the ponderous melody and harmony of the Credo in Holtzmann’s old Missa Solennis. This fact betrays the difficulties of those who have attempted to reproduce the tune in combination with English words in rhyme and shows the causes of the failure of British and Anglo-American translators or paraphrasts. The tune cannot actually be sung with the French words. It is not a chanson, but a metrical declamation in music—in fact, a chant. The words must be distinctly articulated, with every syllable and letter precisely pronounced. De Lisle’s words are Gallic and Romanesque; the tune is wholly Germanic.

Rachel, who was no singer, but a mere disclaimer of French tragedy, has given on the stage the best delivery of the French words to the tune—in hearing of some of us, and of some who heard them when first sounded in the streets of Paris. The French style (as also the Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese style) of singing is wholly incompatible with the proper intonation of this chant or psalm of war, and with the full enunciation of even the French words, with entire expression of the meaning.

“The Star Spangled Banner” is a song to the old English bacchanalian tune of “Anacreon in Heaven,” which was first employed in this country as a patriotic national air, by Robert Treat Paine, of Boston. The original words were those of the once popular song of “Adams and Liberty.” For many years I knew the tune only in that connection.

“Hail Columbia” is a hymn, to a tune first known as the “President’s March,” composed by a French musician, then here, in honor of George Washington. The words are by Joseph Hopkinson, of Philadelphia (first Judge of the United States Court in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania), on the occasion of a Fourth of July celebration in his city.

“Yankee Doodle” is an old English jig. I have been very recently assured that the tune is Slovenic—Polish, I think.

“God Save the King,” or “Queen” (as the case may be) is a hymn, and, by a slight stretch of language may be called an anthem.

“Rule Britannia” is a dirge, or lament.

Haydn’s Austrian National Hymn (known in our books of religious music as the “German Hymn”) was composed by him “to order,” as a National Anthem. If it be not such, it is Haydn’s fault.—Sunday Mercury.

Don Giovanni.

No more hopeless task presents itself to managers of Italian Opera than that of discovering an adequate representative of Mozart’s Don Giovanni, and yet no character is more frequently essayed by artists incompetent to sustain it. The performance of Don Giovanni has resolved itself into an annual necessity, and the opera must be presented whether the singer who undertakes the part of the libertine be good, bad, or indifferent. The manager is satisfied, and imagines the public will be satisfied, if the other personages are more or less efficiently supported, and trusts to the popularity of the music for the rest. But, it may be asked, wherein consists the difficulty of Don Giovanni? Does it tax alike the highest powers of the tragedian or the comedian? Is the music so written that none but an exceptional voice can sing it? The music, on the contrary, is simple enough, so far as the notes are concerned, and any average baritone may master it with tolerable ease. It is the variety of expression that defies the capacity of singers. No part in the whole range of the drama necessitates the embodiment of so many passions as Don Giovanni. No half dozen parts, indeed. To perform it aright, the artist must be as gentle as the dove and bold as the lion; at once condescending and baughty, humble and scornful, flattering and defiant; with a tongue of oil and a heart of iron. He must don the semblance of one who cares for nothing and feels for nobody, a sensualist, a voluptuary, who, through the most winning accents, the most captivating glances, the most seductive demeanor, must declare himself in every word, look and motion. Surely an artist may rank high in the scale of excellence without being in the least adapted for the part. And so indeed it has proved; the most consummate singers and actors in other characters having entirely failed to reach Mozart’s hero. The difficulty will be acknowledged much greater when the personal graces and refinement of manner required are taken into consideration. Indeed, it is no wonder that, from the first production of the opera in this country, only two artists have been found who could be said to portray the character of Don Giovanni with anything like an approach to the ideal truth. These were Ambrogetti and Tamburini. Let us see in what they excelled, and what were their special gifts. We may thus obtain an insight into the difficulties that present themselves, and be able to find excuses for many admirable vocalists who have so signally fallen short of the reality.

Ambrogetti and Tamburini were serious actors of the highest order. They were also first-rate buffoons. Their repertory, in short, embraced the highest tragedy and the lowest comedy. Either could throw the audience into hysterics one night, as the father in Paer’s Agnes, and the next night provoke their utmost risibility as Figaro or Bartolo in the Barbiere. But Signor Ronconi could do both one and the other with at least equal power and equal effect. We must, therefore, look for some other quality, or qualities, in the artists who thus specially distinguished themselves. We never saw Ambrogetti, and can only speak from what we have heard and read. Report describes him as having been a perfect gentleman in appearance; graceful and easy in every attitude and movement; courtly in manner; gay, hilarious, buoyant, and overflowing with animal spirits. In his acting he displayed that entire self-possession which betokens the consciousness of inward power. His instinct was unfailing, and enabled him to seize on the salient points of any character he was representing, and verify them to the life. He was, moreover, remarkably handsome, and had that variety of expression in his features which is of such vital consequence in a part like Don Giovanni; in short, was a positive rara avis. All we have said of Ambrogetti, may, to a great extent, be affirmed of Tamburini. But personal appearance and refinement of manners would not of themselves necessarily befit an artist for the personification of Don Giovanni without the additional gift of genius. Let us give an illustration. In the scene where Don Giovanni fights and kills the Commendatore, Tamburini, by a few simple gestures, was wont to afford a key to the character of the libertine, clearer and more powerful than a whole host of commentaries. The Commendatore having fallen, pierced by Don Giovanni’s sword, Tamburini used to feel his way in the dark to the body, lay his hand upon the heart, lift up the arm and let it fall, and finding life extinct, kiss his fingers to the corpse in the way of adieu. Genius alone could could have hit upon this. So, too, in the tremendous last scene, Tamburini made points that betokened the most subtle and profound conception, or at least an instinct supplying its place. When the statue enters and announces that he has come to avail himself of Don Giovanni’s invitation, Tamburini used to walk round him, a candle-stick in hand, as though endeavoring to pierce through the trick which man or devil was playing him; but, finding that the object before him was veritably of stone, seemed awed into belief, and throwing aside the candle confronted his supernatural visitant with undaunted heart and eye that never quailed.

The admirable performance of M. Faure, in his new part at the Royal Italian Opera, has led to the above remarks. The French baritone, in our estimation, has succeeded in giving a more finished and complete version of the character of Don Giovanni than any artist since Tamburini, and it is something to be so far satisfied. If a great deal is wanting, much more has been effected than was anticipated. For years we have been compelled to put up either with mediocrity or absolute unfitness; and now that we have got a thoroughly intelligent artist, who acts becomingly, and sings right well, we should be thankful, and not grumble because neither Ambrogetti nor Tambourini is at hand. A good Don Giovanni is better than no Don Giovanni; and so here is “long life and prosperity to M. Faure.”

Grisi.

The retirement into private life of an artist like Giulia Grisi, who, for more than a quarter of a century, exercised so powerful a sway over the destinies of Italian Opera in this country, cannot take place without all but universal regret; and which could not fail to have proved universal, but that she has been so long before the public that many of the present frequenters of the Opera have known her only since her vocal powers began to exhibit symptoms of decline. A more perfect singer than Grisi in her zenith—say twenty years ago—never trod the operatic boards. Let us remember the epoch at which she appeared, and the artists with whom she was tested. At the very period when Giulia Grisi made her debut at Her Majesty’s Theatre—1831 or 1832—Malibran was astonishing Europe—had recently astonished America—by the brilliancy of her genius and by a combination of artistic and natural qualities never previously found in any singer. Pasta had just declined, leaving a golden track behind her in her setting which still sheds a lustre over the history of the vocal art. Sontag, too, had recently withdrawn into private life; nor yet were the triumphs of Catalani, Fodor, Camporese, Colbran, and other songstresses of the legitimate Italian school, entirely forgotten. It was a perilous essay, indeed, at such a time, for a young untried artist to dare the judgment of an audience whose ears had been thoroughly accustomed to the finest performances of perhaps the greatest singers the world had known. It may well be imagined that but little was expected from the new prima donna, although the French critics vaunted loudly of her powers and her beauty. But Gallican opinion had not much weight with the English people in those days; and when Mlle. Giulia Grisi was announced to make her first appearance as Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra, the public was not moved, the subscribers smiled, and the habitués shrugged their shoulders. It was a memorable night, that of Grisi’s first appearance at the Opera. There was a poor attendance and no excitement—no anticipation, indeed. The first appearance, however, of the new Ninetta created universal interest. At that time Grisi was about two or three and twenty. She was eminently beautiful—need we say how beautiful to those who behold her now, after a period of thirty years?—with features as regular as if hewn out of marble by Phidias or Praxiteles, an expression as various and mutable as that of an April sky, and a figure just budding into the most voluptuous era of womanhood. As she advanced to the footlights she seized on every eye, on every heart. Her triumph was to a considerable extent secured. But when she sang that transcendent burst of love and joy, “Di piacer mi halza il cor,” and revealed a voice that for purity, beauty and tender grace has never been surpassed, displaying, moreover, such infinite charm in her singing and acting, the effect may be imagined. The audience was intoxicated, and Giulia Grisi became the prevailing topic of conversation in circles musical and unmusical—became, in short, the operatic idol of the day.

Nor did idolatry lose its worshippers when the first glow and tempest of excitement had past away. On the contrary, the fame of Giulia Grisi increased hourly; and the artist, except in one instance, did not suffer by comparison even with Malibran, who at the time was creating such unparalleled enthusiasm at Drury Lane, and making mad her audiences by her performances in the Sonnambula. Ah! these were glorious days for the Opera! Malibran, a host in herself, at Drury Lane; and, at Her Majesty’s Theatre, Giulia Grisi, Rubini, Tamburini, Lablache, and very good etceteras. And now—heu quantum mutati ab illis!—Let us not pursue the subject. We have no Malibran now; no Grisi, no Rubini, no Tamburini, no Lablache. Of course when Malibran died Grisi absorbed the entire world of favor. It was some time, however, before she even attempted to step into her predecessor’s shoes. She had, indeed, essayed the Sonnambula with her renowned rival, but the comparison was not favorable, and Malibran maintained her undoubted supremacy in that character.

At first Grisi adhered almost exclusively to Rossini's operas, making her greatest effects in the Gazza Lutra and Otello. Her first effort in the tragic line was Donna Anna in Don Giovanni—it is strange she never appeared in London as Zerlina, although always assuming the equivalent character of Susanna in the Nozze di Figaro—and afterwards Semiramide and Anna Bolena. The first grand opera produced especially for her at Her Majesty's Theatre, if we mistake not, was Rossini's L'Assedio di Corinto. Her reputation as a serious was by no means of rapid progress. As her years increased, however, and her voice acquired strength and weight, her genius for the highest order of acting was acknowledged, until at last she was quietly invested with the mantle bequeathed by Pasta to Malibran (which, however, perfidious time did not suffer Malibran to wear), and was crowned with the greenest laurels of tragic song. "She won them well;" would we could add—

"And may she wear them long!"

The leaves are now yellow and sere that once were green and bright, and Norma, victim of the Proconsul Time, ceding her rule to some younger High-Priestess, must fling aside her wreath, and ascend the pile from whose insatiate flames there is no returning.

We are not about to write the biography of Giulia Grisi. We merely desire to draw attention to the fact that an artist who, perhaps more than any other of her time, has won for herself a place in the roll of Fame, is about to quit for ever the scene of her triumphs. What Italian Opera would have been for the last twenty-five years but for Grisi it is difficult to say. The great dramatic singer is now about to withdraw into private life. It behoves everybody to hear and see her ere she quits the scene. So, when she has passed away, vivid recollection may be linked with one of the brightest glories that ever adorned the Opera.—London Musical World.

Piano Thrumming.

Drowsiest of sounds, reminding the distant hearer ever of the Spanish guitar murmuring under the orange trees, and of the Oriental lute, is the incipient piano practice that bubbles out upon him, when summer opens the windows of the better class of houses. Infinitely suggestive is it; suggesting different thoughts, recalling different emotions to the various kinds of people who have been accustomed to it.

On many a man, whose life from boyhood has been spent on our business streets—at least during business hours—it has a most peculiar effect, when, of a summer day, its soft, monotonous lullaby greets him, from behind the green blinds of parlors, when, as is not his wont, he visits an elegant west end, in the middle of the day. Not considered a music wholly delightful, by even the performers, this incipient "practicing" is generally done up, with the rest of the prosaic housework, in the morning, or early afternoon; therefore business fathers and brothers often hear little of it for years; only having some of the more pleasing portions administered, occasionally, in small doses, of an evening, to gratify the paternal feelings, and prove that the paying of the music teacher's heavy bill need not be considered a gratuity.

The aforesaid business men, when encountering these dreamy sounds thus in the quiet streets, of a summer noon-day, are apt to find it full very dearly upon their ears. It sounds as the humming of the locust does in the country, whither they have fled a week ago. Though on the first day of the week the novelty pleased, on the last it has become horribly suggestive of all dreariest memories, and they pant for the excitement of business streets again. But the little damsels are used to their retired life, and the parental admonitions and golden promises keep them steadily and determinedly up to the work. In after times, it will be a solace at least, if it does not render them useful and ornamental. Many of them will find the ivory keys a safety valve. On them they can fight their souls' battles with all adversaries, including the Fates, even as so many composers of the music they play have done in composing it.

To some of the "occasional hearers," these street sounds bring thronging memories of younger days. To those who have spent the years of their minority in or about the rural family home, it brings up visions of little sisters watched from piazzas through the open blinds, as they diligently tapped the ivory, while all else was still, save the sloops and schooners lazily sauntered down the river.

Much of the thrumming, now-a-days, turns, involuntarily, from the odious practice of the scale to the manipulation of the "Star Spangled Banner;" the imperfect playing of which piece thus, by children, in the sunny noon-time, with all the significance of it, is very affecting. Questions arise: How is the flag faring that the child is so interested in? Where, in this peaceful moment, is it being borne on victoriously midst clouds of dust and smoke, against those who loved it when children, and have now learned to hate it so fiercely? Where, too, is it recreating before rebellious onsets? In what misguided community is it being to-day trailed in the dust, torn and spit upon, for the first time? In what Baltimore, after a long interval of suppression, is it being again flung gaily to the breeze? Into what Virginia or Kentucky or Missouri hamlet is it being borne by gallant men, amid the plaudits of a rescued people? Who still holds it up in Eastern Tennessee, and who now lowers it all reluctant there?

Let the little ones take fresh courage, when they see what mighty effects their music produces on passers-by.—Phil. Evening Bulletin.

Charlatanism in Music.

IV.

THE FAVORITE PRIMA DONNA.—SKETCHED BY BENDA.

I could never quite understand why a prima donna is always called the favorite. Thus, for instance, we read that Madame A., the favorite prima donna, will make her first appearance in this city to-night; or that Signora B., the favorite prima donna, arrived in the steamer Europa. This epithet has probably the same meaning as that which is invariably attached to the proprietors of hotels, every one of whom is called a popular landlord; it is perhaps only meant to mean nothing. For, as respects the popularity of hotel keepers, I am sure Mr C., the popular landlord of the D. house, was not at all popular with his guests; at least with the discriminating portion of us, who had seen the world and knew how a boarder should be treated. It had very much the appearance as if mine host supposed boarders were created that landlords might live well; as if we were to contribute each of us his humble share of money to mine host's welfare. His own comfort was three times attended to before our wishes were once taken notice of. His private table was loaded with delicacies that were never allowed to touch our palates. The gente man, nevertheless, seemed to labor under the pleasing delusion that his was the only good hotel in the country, and they must consider it a great luck who lived under its roof.

It may seem paradoxical to couple a prima donna with a hotel-keeper (though, for aught I know, Hy-men, the popular god of matrimony, has before this ventured the same thing) yet there exists much affinity between the landlord alluded to and Madame A., the favorite prima donna.

Madame A. is by no means a favorite with the musically cultivated part of the public, who know how a song should be treated; who know how a dramatic character should be sustained and faithfully carried through. Madame starts with the perverted notion that, whether at the opera or at the concert, all she has to aim at is applause. Now, who would envy her applause well merited? Who would not gladly set his two hands in motion to help its proportions swell when it is honestly gained, knowing that, as the dew unto the flower, even so is applause unto the soul of a prima donna? Madame, however, is too greedy for public praise; she is not satisfied to drink it in temperate draughts; she must bathe her whole body in it, cost what it may. Everything must be sacrificed to appease her hunger for this clapping of hands. The poetry, the music, in short, the whole piece must be altered, mutilated, that the prima donna may show off to best advantage. The manager, the conductor, the musicians, in the eyes of Madame, exist merely to help her to reap applause; they are accounted dead heads, not worth respecting, if they fail in this. Madame A., in her own estimation, is the head, the soul, the centre, the support, the pillar of the establishment; the whole fabric would tumble over, if she withdrew from it. They must all go a begging, from the manager down to the call boy, if she left them. Why, she is such a favorite with the public; they won't go any more to the opera without Madame A.

The other day our favorite prima donna received the music of Beethoven's Fidelio from the manager with the information that the opera was to be performed some time this season, when she would have to sustain the character of Leonora; she must make herself acquainted with the rôle. Madame indignantly sent the part back whence it had come, saying she would never sing music which produced soreness of the throat and which, moreover, offered no opportunity for displaying vocal skill. The manager reminded her of the heavy fine which she would incur, according to her contract with him, should she persist in refusing to comply with his just demand. Madame then tried to effect a compromise; she consented to sing the part on condition that she should be permitted to substitute for the great aria of Leonora, as composed by Beethoven, a favorite cavatina by Rossini, which afforded her more opportunity for exhibiting her voice and vocal readiness. The director answered that the cavatina was entirely out of place; nor would it accord with dramatic truth and the respect due to a composer like Beethoven to attempt such alterations. Dramatic truth—respect—Beethoven? Pshaw! Who was Beethoven? It surpassed her understanding; she could not comprehend that anything was entitled to respect when her applause was at stake. But the manager, finally, hinted again at the heavy fine; which she understood better. Seeing that there was no escape, Madame lowered the strings of her high-toned ambition and only asked liberty to introduce some trills, roulades and capers of her own into said aria. Mr. Director, to cut the matter short, referred her to the musical conductor, and so the affair rests.

To-night the prima donna is to appear in her famous part of Fatima or the warrior's bride, a grand blood and dagger opera by Clamorette. This maestro is a great favorite with all charlatan singers. His motto is: Effect! Dramatic truth! Nonsense! Let the situation be what it may, quiet or exciting, sad or gay, tears or smiles, there must be, above all, thunder and roar in the orchestra, rage and fury on the stage; there must be warbling and trilling; but more particularly there should be high, very high notes, splendid screams, an ut de poitrine, that will set the whole house a cheering.

But the curtain has risen in the mean time. We find Fatima in the midst of her aria di bravura, which she rattles off with a facility that is truly astonishing. As she shouts out that inevitable high note at the close she raises both her arms, with a peculiar motion of her own, as if to strike at the sky. This is a favorite manner with our cantatrice; while it is to describe visibly the giddy height of that note, it is more particularly intended to draw down a storm of applause from the spectators. Hence, it is a trap to catch clapping, a clap-trap. And, indeed, the thing looks so irresistible, is performed with such cleverness, that the most averse, that we ourselves, to join in the general uproar. In addition several bouquets are thrown upon the stage which Madame picks up with much modesty and grace. "I wonder," said Caroline, "from whom those flowers come?" "I wonder too," most of the audience seemed to say. It is true flowers in January are an expensive affair; a half-a-dozen such bouquets cost a great deal. Perhaps Mr. E., the smart business agent of Madame, may be able to explain the wonder.

The opera reaches its climax in the third act. Fatima sings a plaintive air expressive of her bottomless grief for her parting lover who is at the point of going to battle. After she has finished Ingomar appears to bid her farewell. But before he proceeds to this he has to perform an elaborate aria in which both his love for Fatima and his hatred for the enemy, whom he is going to fight, are depicted. While thus he melts away in tenderness and again rises to fearful rage, Fatima is to continue silently to play the unhappy bride by such gesticulations, pantomimes, and so forth, as are at the command of every cultivated dramatic singer. But what does our heroine do? She recedes to the background of the stage where the chorus is playing wall flower, and titters and laughs at the picaresqueries with which these living statues, in the face of the public, entertain each other. To be sure, the public ought to be delighted at seeing Madame laugh privately; so long as the prima donna is privately in good spirits we need have no fear that the world will go out of joint.

In the closing scene we find Fatima gone raving mad. The body of Ingomar, who was slain in battle, is lying by her side. Pale, with disheveled hair, her garments torn to pieces, she runs from one end of the corpse to the other, now stroking the face, now pulling at the feet, then throwing herself over it, screaming and wringing her hands. The action is accompanied by various instruments of the orchestra of course in such truthful strains as may be expected from a composer of Signor Clamoretto's calibre. Suddenly the instruments pause and the distracted Fatima, rising from the body of her beloved, intones a recitative on which follows that famous aria known under the name of the mad air. It is full of break-neck passages and of all sorts of vocal artifices, well calculated to make a singer mad whose throat is not sufficiently pliant. Our prima donna, however, is in her true element. She gorges and spouts forth those runs and roulades like a cascade. As she reaches the first fermata or hold, the public, availing themselves of the occasion, give vent to their admiration in loud applause. Now, one should suppose the singer would take no notice of this demonstration, she being for the moment raving mad, But no! Madame deems it her first duty to acknowledge the applause. So, dropping the insane Fatima for a moment she assumes a lady-like demeanor, as becomes the real Madame A., bows and smiles with the utmost grace and then relapses into madness. Three times in the course of the aria is she applauded and three times does she recover from her insanity and immediately after, in the twinkling of an eye, falls a prey to it again.

Ah, Johanna W., Anna M., Tichatscheck, Wolf, and ye others whose names are not known in all lands, yet who were of the true fire—could I but see ye once more to refresh my musical spirit made sore by the mockery on our operatic stages! What a beautiful sight is such a faithful, conscientious, painstaking artist! one that strives to please the god within him instead of the promiscuous crowd, called the public.

But the curtain is already down. We are in the midst of a fearful uproar extending all over the house. They cry for Fatima to come out; they wish once more to pay homage to the prima donna. The noise is growing intolerable. Come, Caroline, sweetest! let's go home.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

The Singing of the Army Hymn.

The Music Hall, dedicated to Art and to Peace, was on Thursday devoted to the reception of the Second N. H. Regiment by the sons of New Hampshire resident here. The decorations of the Platform were beautiful and the short addresses stirring and patriotic. The feature of the occasion, however, which touches us was the singing of the Army Hymn of Dr. O. W. HOLMES, to the tune of Old Hundred, in unison, by the immense audience composed of the Regiment and the Sons of New Hampshire. The grand melody rolled nobly out through the Hall and the patriotic hymn found a response in the hearts of all. A bountiful and plentiful repast sent the wearied soldiers refreshed upon their way and cheered by the cordial welcome they had received. Dr. UPHAM was the Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements, a sufficient guarantee for successful arrangements.

ARMY HYMN. BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

O Lord of Hosts! Almighty King:
Behold the sacrifice we bring!
To every arm Thy strength impart,
Thy Spirit shed through every heart!

Wake in our breasts the living fires,
The holy faith that warmed our sires;
Thy hand has made our nation free;
To die for her is serving Thee.

Be Thou a pillared flame to show
The midnight snare, the silent foe;
And when the battle thunders loud,
Still guide us in its moving cloud.

God of all Nations! Sovereign Lord!
In Thy dread name we draw the sword,
We lift the starry flag on high
That fills with light our stormy sky.

From treason's rent, from murder's stain,
Guard Thou its folds till Peace shall reign—
Till fort and field, till shore and sea
Join our loud anthem, PRAISE TO THEE!

The BOSTON MUSICAL TIMES in its last issue gives the following special notice:

The war excitement has so completely taken hold of all classes of society, and war news being the only news now sought for, we have concluded to suspend the fortnightly publication of the Boston Musical Times for a few months, or until a more settled state of affairs shall have been arrived at. We shall meanwhile issue our paper monthly, so that really not more than three or four papers will be suspended. We think this course will meet the approbation of our subscribers, the majority of whom now, however musically inclined, feel comparatively little interest in the "Divine Art," and who consider the "shrill trump, the spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife," and the voices of "the mortal engines whose rude throats the immortal Jove's dread clamor counterfeit," the only sounds worthy their attention.

When we are once again a peaceful and harmonious nation, (and God speed the day,) or even before that happy time, if a musical revival will warrant it, we shall be glad to resume our fortnightly communications with our readers. Meantime we shall condense the musical essence of the month into one paper.

We are sorry that the pleasant visits of our neighbors are to be so few and far between in this dry time. Indeed we had depended not a little upon "enjoying and appropriating" many choice things from its columns in this time when exchanges are so much diminished. We join with the Times in its wishes that things may soon return to their normal state and peace and harmony again prevail, and shall be glad to receive any copy from our neighbors that in their judgment will not keep a month.

AMERICAN MUSICAL DIRECTORY: 1861. 280 pp. New York. Thomas Hutchinson, 119 Nassau Street.

Of course the first issue of a directory of the Music Trade of the United States, must be, in very many respects, imperfect, for such a work can gain entire accuracy and completeness, only after several years. The labor of compiling the little items which make up such a work is very great and so is the difficulty of getting the information, for the first time. The volume under notice is very convenient and useful for all who are in any way concerned in Music, giving as it does the names and residences of all who are engaged in it, either as teachers, manufacturers, dealers, publishers or in any other way connected with it throughout the country. The editors ask for "facts to aid in carrying out their designs of making the Musical Directory both complete and accurate" in the future. The present volume is, of course, fuller and more correct in its details of New York matters than in those in other cities. For example, the Handel and Haydn Society is the only musical organization mentioned in this city. It is for the interest of all concerned to aid the compilers of such a work, by forwarding corrections and additional information to the publisher, before the end of another year.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE FOR JUNE. Published by Leonard, Scott & Co., New York. (Crosby, Nichols, Lee & Co., Boston.) Contents: The Book Hunter; The Monks of the West; Miss Bremer in Switzerland and Italy; A Cruise up the Yangtze in 1859; Several; Hades; From the Fatherland; Norman Stclair, Part 19; I'm Very Fond of Water, a new temperance song; Memoirs of a Tory Gentlewoman; Index.

The last article is a notice of the memoir of "Miss Cornelia Knight, Lady companion to the Princess Charlotte." After being discharged from this post by the Regent, Miss Knight went to Naples where she became acquainted with the great Nelson.

In April 1800, Miss Knight embarked, with the Hamiltons, on board Nelson's ship, the Foudroyant, bound for Malta, touching at Syracuse. They returned to Palermo, and thence sailed to Leghorn. From that place they proceeded by land to England. The account of this homeward journey is interesting, as an episode in Nelson's life whereof his biographers have not taken much account. One of the passages, at least, is worthy of quotation:—

"At Vienna, whenever Lord Nelson appeared in public, a crowd was collected, and his portrait was hung up as a sign over many shops—even the milliners giving his name to particular dresses; but it did not appear to me that the English nation was at all popular. The people generally were opposed to the war with France, which had proved so unfavorable to them; for although the troops were brave and loyal, they were not well commanded. We had often music, as the best composers and performers were happy to be introduced to Sir William and Lady Hamilton. I was much pleased with Haydn. He dined with us, and his conversation was modest and sensible. He set to music some English verses, and, amongst others, part of the battle of the Nile, and which was descriptive of the blowing up of L'Orient:—

'Britannia's leader gives the dread command;
Obedient to his summons flames arise;
The fierce explosion rends the skies,
And high in air the ponderous mass is thrown.
The dire concussion shakes the land:
Earth, air and sea, united grow;
The solid pyramids confess the shock,
And their firm bases to their centre rock.'

"Haydn accompanied Lady Hamilton on the piano when she sang this piece, and the effect was grand. He was staying at that time with Prince Esterhazy, and presided over the famous concert given by that nobleman at his magnificent palace in Hungary. At one time the prince had an intention of giving up these concerts, and told Haydn that this would be the last. It was a very fine one. Towards the conclusion, Haydn composed a finale so melancholy—so touching, that it drew tears from many of the audience; and he gave orders that while it was playing the lights should be gradually extinguished; all of which made such an impression upon the mind of the prince, that he abandoned his intention of discontinuing these concerts."

Miss Knight, who lived to be eighty years old, seems to have been well acquainted with various royal personages, and to have loved the Bourbons of France better than the Orleans family, as the following anecdote shows.

"A stranger happening to be in Paris soon after the Revolution of July, 1830, was stopped by a young chimney-sweeper, who asked him if he had seen the King of the French. The other replied in the negative. 'Would you like to see him?' continued the chimney-sweeper. 'Only give me a piece of five francs and you shall see him.' The stranger agreed to do so, and they went away together to the Palais Royal. As soon as they were in sight of the balcony the boy began to call out, 'Louis Philippe! Louis Philippe!' in which cry he was joined by the rabble near him. The King of the French came out to make his obeisance, and the gentleman gave a five franc piece to the sweeper. 'Now,' said the boy, 'if you have a mind to hear him sing, only promise me five more, and you shall be satisfied.' The stranger assented, and his majesty, at the command of the mob, joined in the Marseillaise Hymn, with all the appropriate grimaces."

During the parade on Monday, Major Stevenson's battalion band played several concert pieces. One air, which was peculiarly mellifluous, excited the curiosity of a spectator to such a degree that he marched past the guard, and asked a bngler "the name of the piece you have just played." "That piece," drawled the exhausted musician, as he wiped his moistened brow, "is number s-i-x-t-e-e-n." "Thank you, sir," said the enquirer, "I owe you one.—Courier."

Churches and Church Music.

No. II.

TRINITY CHURCH.

St. Louis, June, 1861.—I will head my letter St. Louis, as it is concerning that city. I have to write, although I am still on the shore of Kenka Lake.

Trinity Church (Episcopal), St. Louis, is built after the style so prevalent in these provincial towns and almost seems out of place in a bustling city. It is Gothic, built of rough limestone, and is one of the neatest churches I ever saw. It has such a home-like air. It cost $30,000, and is paid for. The Pastor, Rev. E. C. Hutchinson, is much loved and respected by his congregation. In all respects this church is a success. It stands on the corner of Eleventh street and Washington Avenue and was dedicated on June 2d. The organ was built by H. & W. Pitcher of St. Louis and is one of the finest here. It contains 28 stops, 2 manuals, 2 octaves pedal bass. The open diapasons are of tremendous power and the voicing of the stops generally beautifully done. It cost $3,000.

The choir have always enjoyed the reputation of being the best in the West, and one of the best in the whole country. The soprano is Miss Annie Dean, so well known through the Philharmonic Society. Her voice is one of the most expressive we ever heard. In figure and style she more closely resembles Adelina Patti than any one else we ever heard. In compositions requiring great pathos she is unequalled. The Contralto, Mrs. E. Barnett, is blessed with one of the richest organs in the whole West, reaching with great power and volume E flat below the staff. Mr. S. Crowell, Tenor, has a sweet voice and is an excellent reader of Oratorio and concerted music. E. C. Catherwood is the Basso "Mosto" Profundissimo, his voice reaching with great effect down to C, B, A. Why Mr. Catherwood never made music a profession we cannot imagine. Organist, Mr. H. D. Hewitt. He is an amateur, though of great experience. He plays in the Philharmonic Society and has been unwearied in his efforts to promote the interest of that society, giving freely time and money. It would be proper then to say a word concerning the taste and expense Mr. Hewitt has been to in fitting up his piano store, believing as we do that every such thing should be encouraged. He has one of the stores in the new marble block on Fifth and Olive, consisting of three rooms the whole depth of that immense building, the finest building we have yet seen out of New York, one displaying exquisite taste in the architect. The basement is a shop for repairing, &c. The main floor is devoted to sheet music, and small instruments. The third room is the finest piano room we ever saw. Mr. H. has had the walls and ceiling painted at a great expense and furnished the room with luxurious carpets and furniture where the visitors can recline at ease while examining the pianos. May his business reward his taste and liberality. BROWN.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Mr. Millard, the tenor, who is favorably known as a concert singer and clever composer, is with his regiment, the Seventy-First, and becoming quite popular from his successful efforts to add to the musical resources of his comrades-in-arms.

Madame Grisi is really making her last appearances in London, and consequently in England. The announcement has often been made before, and in order to enhance the eclat of the present engagement Mr. Gye has wisely bound the prima donna under heavy penalties not to sing in London for six years—which is tantamount to a definite prohibition. The operas selected for these farewell performances are as follows:—Norma, Lucretia Borgia, Otello, Don Giovanni, Il Trovatore, Les Huguenots.

At the Royal Italian Opera, London, on Saturday, May 18. The London Herald thus speaks of her first appearance:—

An audience as numerous as the theatre could possibly contain were assembled to do honor to the occasion of Mad. Grisi's re-appearance, and the applause that burst forth when the Norma of the evening entered was such as is seldom heard on any occasion. The sickle once in hand, Grisi was the Grisi of old. There was the same energy, the same grace, and the same fine, slow action so especially characteristic of this artist. The public listened for the familiar "sustained note" which precedes the "Casta Diva," and applauded it as they had done for so many years, and they took every possible opportunity of displaying their good feeling towards their old favorite throughout the opera. The expression of deep feeling with which the story of Adalgisa is listened to—the start at the entrance of Pollio—the indignant attack on him with the grand burst, "Ah, non tremare," and the share in the trio which follows, carried on the first act as a series of triumphs. And if Norma's share of the "Deh, con te" in the second act, was not what is used to be in vocal execution, the deficiency was quite atoned for by the pathos and beauty of the final duet with Pollio—"Qual cor tradisti"—and the appeals to Orovoso. The poetry, the passion and the intensity, with that requisite combination of dramatic with musical expression, bore the audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm, and woke the reminiscences of the glories of bygone years. The cast of the other parts, with the exception that Madame Tiberini undertook that of Adalgisa, was the same as last year; the Pollio of Signor Tamberlik, and the Orovoso of M. Zelger, are too familiar to be commented on. Madame Grisi was enthusiastically called for at the end of the first act, and twice on the fall of the curtain; indeed the effect produced by her appearance indicated in every way the deep interest felt by the public in these which are now believed to be without doubt her final performances. The arrangements at the Royal Italian Opera for the week are, we believe, unprecedented. There is probably no record of any lyric theatre witnessing in one week the representation, under any circumstances, of five leading operas, certainly not produced in the effective manner which characterizes their production here.

The American prima donna, Virginia Whiting Lorini, seems to be reaping the reward of the arduous study she has devoted to her art. We have recently recorded her success in Berlin and Brussels, and have now to record a new and brilliant triumph in Paris. The journals are loud in her praise. We copy the following from the Revue Critique:

The Theatre Italien counts one more star. The debut of Madame Virginia Whiting Lorini has created the liveliest enthusiasm. This artist possesses a voice of the rarest timbre, great compass and marvellous flexibility; add to this an imposing figure, a radiant beauty (rare distinctions), and one can understand the interest excited by her appearance. Her triumph in "Ernani" was complete. She made the role of Elvira a veritable creation; 'twere impossible to more perfectly render all the beauties of this part. She was not less remarkable in "Semiramide," in whose inspired melodies she exhibited all the power and magic of her voice and her superb dramatic action. She has proved that she can render as felicitously the music of Rossini as of Verdi. In Madame Lorini the Parisian public have gained one of the most perfect illustrators of the modern Italian school.

A CHORUS BY THREE THOUSAND SOLDIERS.—It is said that when the signal was given for the advance of the soldiers from Washington, when they reached the "Long Bridge" and were passing over, the three thousand patriots struck up "The Star Spangled Banner." The effect was grand beyond description.

A French Society called the "Cercle de L'Union Artistique," gave a musical festival at the Theatre Italien, Paris, May 14th. The great tenor Roger came expressly from Germany to support the principal character in Fingal, a new opera by Membree, for this occasion, and the orchestra was conducted by Felicien David.

The Trovatore of Milan announces that Verdi, yielding to the solicitations of Count Cavour and the expressed desire of the Emperor of Russia, is about to compose a new opera for the Italian theatre at St. Petersburg, and was consulting, in regard to the subject, with F. M. Piave, the poet.

The Musard concerts at the Champs Elysees were being well patronized.

Madame Laborde had concluded a brilliant engagement at the Royal Italian theatre at Berlin.

The celebrated Maestro Mercadante has been decorated, by the government of King Victor Emanuel, with the order of Saints Maurice and Lazare.

The Morelli Italian Opera troupe were at Leipzig, and were to go from thence to Breslau, and then to Dresden.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Hurrah for the Banner of Red, White and Blue.

T. M. Brown. 25

A song for the Irish volunteers for the Union, adapted to a well-known Irish air. Dedicated by the author of the words to the Massachusetts' 12th (Col. Cass') Regiment.

I guess you'll be there.

J. Harroway. 25

Quite a pleasing trifle with a slight touch of the humorous about it.

Instrumental Music.

La Prière exaucée. (The Prayer granted.) Answer to the Maiden's Prayer. T. Badarzewska. 30

This new piece from the pen of the authoress of the charming piano piece, known by the name of the "Maiden's Prayer," will soon begin its pilgrimage over this continent, and finally be found on every piano, as it is not an attempt to make capital out of the unbounded popularity of the latter, as some might suppose, but really a bright, sparkling, captivating nocturne, such as the press brings forth but very few.

Grand Parade March.

S. Glover. 50

A spirited march, in six-eight time, easy. The title-page is adorned with a brilliant illustrated sketch representing a body of soldiers trooping the colors before the commanding officer.

Band Music.

DITSON'S SELECT BRASS BAND MUSIC; (on Cards). BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1861.

VOL. XIX. No. 13.

June.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

I gaze upon the glorious sky
And the green mountains round,
And thought when I came to lie
Within the silent ground,
'Twere pleasant that in flowery June,
When brooks send up a cheerful tune,
And groves a joyous sound,
The sexton's hand—my grave to make—
The rich, green mountain turf should break.

A cell within the frozen mould,
A coffin borne through sleet,
And icy clouds above it rolled,
While fierce the tempests beat—Away! I will not think of these—
Blue the sky and soft the breeze,
Earth green beneath the feet,
And be the damp mould gently pressed
Into my narrow place of rest.

There, through the long, long summer hours,
The golden light should lie,
And thick young herbs and groups of flowers
Stand in their beauty by.
The oriole should build and tell
His love-tale close beside my cell,
The idle butterfly
Should rest him there, and there be heard
The housewife bee and humming bird.

And what if cheerful shouts at noon
Come, from the village sent,
Or songs of maids, beneath the moon,
With fairy laughter blent?
And what in the evening light,
Betrothed lovers walk in sight
Of my low monument?
I would the lovely scene around
Might know no sadder sight or sound?

I know, I know I should not see,
The season's glorious show,
Nor would its brightness shine for me,
Nor its wild music flow;
But if around my place of sleep
The friends I love should come to weep,
They might not haste to go;
Soft airs, and song, and light and bloom
Should keep them lingering by my tomb

These to their softened heart should bear
The thought of what has been,
And speak of one who cannot share
The gladness of the scene;
Whose part in all the pomp that fills
The circuit of the summer hills,
Is—that his grave is green;
And deeply would their hearts rejoice
To hear again his living voice.

Objects of Musical Education and their Time.

What is to be learned, and which is the proper time for each kind of instruction? These questions, of the utmost importance in their minutest particulars, demand the gravest and most searching consideration from parents and teachers when they have determined to dedicate a child to musical education. To professors of music, these questions must always be the highest interest. In order to point out, at least, the most important periods, we will take a cursory view of all the relationships and circumstances of musical employment, whether as a profession or otherwise.

We must, in the first place clear away a deep and widely diffused prejudice. On the question being asked, What ought to be learned in music? it is usual, particularly among teachers, to make a distinction between those persons who make music a profession, and those who cultivate it merely for pleasure and general humanizing education; between future professional men and mere amateurs. The former, according to the judgment of the teachers, ought to be fundamentally—the latter, however, only superficially, or less fundamentally instructed. This distinction is one of the most erroneous and destructive that ever crept into discipline. That education alone is beneficially fruitful which is most perfectly grounded; and, what is more, it is the easiest, and consumes the least time. In order to be convinced of the truth of these assertions, it is only necessary to have a right understanding of the nature of this fundamental knowledge; not of the false pedantry which assumes its name (and is as useless to the professional man as to the amateur), but of the study absolutely necessary for the comprehension of the real nature of the science, of the close connection of all that is essential, and of the constant and rational development of one form or figure from another, so that the preceding form necessarily leads on the succeeding, and the succeeding form is always prepared and facilitated by the preceding.

Between the instruction of the artist and of the amateur there is only this difference—that the latter may discontinue his pursuit of the science earlier than the former, at any point or position of artistic power he may choose to fix; whereas the artist is necessarily obliged to dedicate himself entirely, once and forever, to the art of his election.

Now to return to our own proper question—What is to be learned, and which is the right time for each study?

SONG.

We have already said that if possible every one should learn music: we now pronounce our opinion more especially, that every one, if possible, should learn singing. Song is man's own true peculiar music. The voice is our own peculiar connate instrument—it is much more—it is the living sympathetic organ of our souls. Whatever moves within us, whatever sensation or emotion we feel, becomes immediately embodied and perceptible in our voice; and so, indeed, the voice and song, as we may observe in the earliest infancy, are our first poetry and the most faithful companions of our feelings, until the "shrill pipe of tremulous age." If, as in song, properly so called, music and speech be lovingly united, and the words be those of a true poet, then is consummated the most intimate union of mind and soul, of understanding and feeling—that combined unity, in which the whole power of the human being is exhibited, and exerts upon the singer and the hearer that wonderful might of song, which by infant nations was considered not quite untruly as supernatural; and whose softened, and therefore, perhaps, more beneficent influence, now contributes to social elevation and moral improvement.

Song is the most appropriate treasure of the solitary, and it is at the same time the most stringent and forcible bond of companionship, even from the jovial or the sentimental popular catch of the booth to the sublime creations of genius resounding from congregated artistic thousands assembled by one common impulse in the solemn cathedral. Devotion in our churches becomes more edifying; our popular festivals and days of enjoyment become more mannerly and animated; our social meetings more lively and intellectually joyful; our whole life, in short, becomes more elevated and cheerful by the spread of the love of song and of the power of singing among the greatest possible number of individuals. And these individuals will feel themselves more intimately connected with society, more largely participating in its benefits, of more worth in it and gaining more by it, when they unite their voices in the social harmony of their friends.

To the musician, but more especially to the composer, song is an almost irreplaceable and indispensable means of calling forth and seizing the most delicate, tender, and deepest strains of feeling from our inmost sensations. No instrument can be a substitute for song, the immediate creation of our own soul in our own breast; we can have no deeper impression of the relation of sound, of the power of melody; we cannot work more effectively upon our own souls and upon those of our hearers than by heartfelt song.

Every friend of music, therefore, should sing; and every musician who has a tolerable voice, should be a master of song in every branch. Song should, also, in the order of time, be our first musical exercise. This should begin in the earliest childhood, in the third to the fifth year, if it be not possible earlier, but not in the form of instruction. The song of the mother which allures imitation, the joyful circle of children playing together, is the first natural singing school, where, without notes or masters, simply according to hearing and fancy, the fibres of the soul are first freely excited and set in vibration. Instruction in music, properly so called, should not in general begin until the second step of life's ladder, between the seventh and fourteenth years.

By far the greatest number of individuals have sufficient qualifications of voice for singing, and to justify their pursuit of the art with reasonable hope of success. Indeed, very considerable and valuable vocal faculties are much more common than is generally imagined. There is certainly less deficiency of natural gifts than of persons observant and talented enough to discover, to foster and to cultivate them. In the meantime, if indeed every one have not disposition and means (and good fortune) to become of some consequence as a singer, let us consider that even with an inconsiderable voice, much of the most touching and joy-inspiring capabilities may be attained, if feeling, artistic cultivation, and a vivid conception speak through a medium but slenderly endowed. Why should any one be dissatisfied if small means and trouble have made him capable of touching our hearts with a joyful or tender song; or have enabled him to participate skillfully in the choral assemblies of his fellow citizens. Whether it may be advisable to proceed farther in singing and the cultivation of the voice, must be decided by the circumstances and inclinations of each individual. From composers, conductors, and higher masters, a complete knowledge of everything belonging to singing is to be absolutely demanded, and also practical execution thereof; unless, indeed, organic defect should render it to them impossible. A composer who does not expressly study singing, and practice it as far as possible, will scarcely be able to write for the voice; he will with difficulty acquire the more delicate musical declamation; he will never become entire master of the life-like conducting of the voice, which is something far different from mere correctness.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

An Opera Rehearsal and Performance.

Castil-Blaze gives a detailed account of an opera rehearsal in Paris, which we translate for the benefit of those who are curious about the movements of actors behind the scenes.

"When a new opera is to be studied, the singers meet at the study-room to rehearse their parts around the pianoforte, at which Henri Potier, an excellent accompanist, officiates. The author presides, and the leader of the orchestra, who wishes to make himself familiar with the score, is present. Not less able than his confrère, M. Dietsch, the other leader, has the chorus under his direction, and exercises them in the great hall on the second floor, procul negotiis. The dancers prepare themselves with the ballet master, in their foyer, and two violinists, rehearsers of the dance, regulate their movements.

When the singers almost know their parts, they meet at the theatre, where the obscure light does not often allow them to see their score, and they must accustom themselves to perform from memory. Besides this, the prompter is at his post. After some rehearsals as they sit or stand around the stage, the manager, M. Leroy, admirable instructor and erudite comedian, calls the actors up, and, in concert with the author, causes them to act at the same time that they sing their parts. Then everything is arranged in such a way that each personage takes or quits his position, goes to the right or left, or retires, always following the movement and sentiment which the orchestra requires. The instrumental portions which should animate and support the stage action, are modified at the different rehearsals, so that the actor may achieve the desired effect without trouble and with ease. An entrance, an exit or a meeting is twenty or thirty times repeated. In times past these trials were supported by a quintette of violins. Now a piano suffices until the rehearsal becomes general.

The choristers then unite with the principals. The leader of the orchestra takes his place, and leads a double quintette to accompany them. The same ceremony is renewed for the dancers and the corps de ballet. The orchestra has one general rehearsal. The manner in which the overture in "William Tell" was performed at first sight, to Rossini's great surprise, proves that this is not absolutely necessary; but this rehearsal is useful for the collation of the parts. As they are forced to stop every moment or two to correct errors in the manuscript, it is not thought necessary to retain the singers for the rehearsal, which would be useless to them. The decorations are fixed and changed for the mise en scène. The scenery, which must move in harmony with the music, the moon, the sun, the thunder, cannon, would be blamed if they worked out of place. A general rehearsal is given, and the stage is occupied only by the performers. Madame displays her whole toilette; every one is at his post, and the authors remove to the auditorium. Sometimes a last trial is made in full costume.

The leader of the orchestra has an epitome of the score only before him, arranged in five parts: the first violin; the commencement of the music of the wooden wind instruments; the brass instruments; the vocal part which leads off, and the orchestral bass. The whole score is a useless embarrassment, as the leader has no other occupation than that of turning over the leaves without having the time to read them.

"We must have a representation to-morrow." "Impossible! the opera is not ready, they don't know it well enough." "No matter, it must be done!" "You don't come to the rehearsals; come and judge if—." "I shall be careful not to come, for I shall think as you do, and I absolutely require that it shall be performed to-morrow. It must be done."

This concise but pointed dialogue echoes but too often in our provincial theatres. It is there in particular that an opera is pushed forward before the public, and the fruit is gathered, before it shows signs of maturity. Still I have seen miserable, frightful rehearsals, followed by a very satisfactory performance. When the curtain is up each one redoubles his care and attention, for the moment is serious and decisive.

They call comparses (supernumeraries) those persons who appear on the stage to swell the singing and dancing crowd, without taking part with them. Soldiers are frequently employed for this purpose. They know how to march in time to the music. Four hundred soldiers of Biron's regiment manœuvred on the stage at Versailles in Ernelinde. Eight hundred people were seen at the same time in La Tour Enchantée. We have seen seven hundred at the Opera in the hell of La Tentation.

When the curtain falls on the first act, the talk turns on the triumph or the recall of the actors; very different things. A triumph is the result of an enthusiastic success, when a favorite actor, already recalled during the performance, returns at the piece to carry away his harvest of bouquets and crowns. When these prepared projectiles are thrown upon the stage in a transport of admiration; when the ladies throw the masses of rich, brilliant flowers which they have held all the evening, this unpremeditated act doubles the excitement of the audience. But if the crowns fall from the balconies and fourth row boxes, we may readily conclude that the laurels and dahlias, two cents a bunch, were purchased beforehand, betraying a foreordained, organized, success, sustained by claqueurs prompt to recall the actor by furious acclamations. These crowns, at three francs a dozen, can be made cheaper yet; for they are picked up, carried back through the lobbies, and thrown again, when the triumphal farce ends in a general furor.

I am astonished that in these days of extravagant hyperbole, people are mistaken enough to call the triumph of an actor or actresses an ovation. A hundred oxen were immolated for the triumph of a hero; a single sheep, ovis, figured at the sacrifice offered to the least of triumphers. It is because of this sheep, of which the claqueurs distribute cutlets (côtelettes), that these nice etymologists keep the derisive word ovation. Perhaps you know that, in the claqueur slang, a salvo of applause is called a côtelette.

It was at Marseilles that I saw dramatic bouquets of the most elegant and sumptuous character and colossal form, a yard wide and proportionately tall, where camelias figured of every color on a white base. Only the machinist would have been able to manage the descent of these bouquets, and that by the name of pulleys. Mme. Laborde sang once an inconceivable rhapsody called Le Rossignol, in the grand theatres at Bourdeaux. She had hardly finished her cavatina, when a monstrous bouquet, awkwardly thrown from the back of a box, struck her directly in the face, overthrew her with its force, and prevented the continuation of the piece.

The performance being over, the principals assume their ordinary dress, and go home in carriages. All that is related of the manners of the Academy is much exaggerated; besides, in other society, the great world presents irregularities equally deserving of blame. Self-love, pride, the rivalry of the talent and success, separate hearts that love should unite. Artists have little sympathy for artists. If they sail on the same waters, follow the same career, they detest each other like brothers.

Would you like to follow these two joyous—or at least, singing and dancing crowds? Place yourself in a dark passage, almost subterranean, opening on the rue Drouot, with a damp, dirty pavement. There, at midnight, three or four times a week, a wooden door turns on its hinges, and the young enthusiast for the seductions of the opera, and the ballet in particular, does not dream of its use. From this ignoble egress come forth wrapped in mantles, cloaks, shawls, capes of every age and color, with feet coarsely shod, and tippeted necks, these Olympian deities, these wood nymphs, willis, naiads, peris, just before the object of your passionate admiration. You will find around this door but rare instances of French gallantry, awaiting the joy of offering to some solitary sylph their arms and umbrellas at the moment when are about to sink into a sea of mud to escape the cars, not drawn by doves.

"Poor girls!" you will say, in seeing them thus thread the damp pavement. But I should not say, "Poor fellows!" on seeing conscripts in a trench, with water to their knees, affronting an enemy's fire in a chilling and penetrating frost. Is one poor, with two treasures in his possession? two treasures which shine, sparkle to our eyes with all imaginable marvels, whose seductions animate our courage and make us brave famine and plague? two treasures such a youth and hope? These conscripts follow the career of marshal of the empire. These ballet-girls see their shoulders covered with cashmeres, bosoms resplendent in diamonds, ravishing crinolines, destined to press the cushions of sumptuous carriages. These debutant warriors, these naive damsels, are sounding the first notes of the gamut; if they do not reach the culminating point, they may attain, midway, a comfortable mediocrity.—Boston Musical Times.

Nigger Minstrelsy in England.

About a quarter of a century since, a large proportion of the people of London gave themselves up to one of those fits of idolatry which seems so strangely at variance with the generally phlegmatic character of our race. For the first time they were made familiar with the sort of negro who forms an element of modern American life; and the hideous laugh, the wild gestures, and strange dialect with which they regaled by the celebrated "Jim Crow Rice," produced in them such a novel mixture of wonder and delight that they could not do less than fall down and worship their eccentric instructor. So "Jim Crow" became a fixed idea with the Cockneys, referred to in countless ways and manifested in countless shapes. To the chimney-pieces of the middle classes, where Tom, Jerry, and Logic, Madame Vestris as Giovanna, and Liston as Paul Pry, had previously been placed as household "gods," the effigy of the shabby negro was elevated with all honor, and aspiring youths who were famed for "a good song" regarded a successful imitation of Mr. Rice's vocal performances as an object worthy of the most soaring ambition. Then the burden of Jim Crow's song, "Turn about, wheel about," illustrated by a rotatory movement on the part of the singer, was caught with avidity by the small satirists of the day, who, when they wished to stigmatize statesmen or journals with an habitual readiness to change their political principles, found an apt and universally intelligible illustration of their meaning in the revolving figure of Jim Crow.

There is no doubt that Mr. Rice's performances was of a kind entirely novel to Europe, and that his representation of the negro of modern life must be set down as an important item in that course of ethnological instruction which, at long intervals is given to the body of the people at places of public amusement. The comic black, who had become a familiar figure to the Londoners prior to the arrival of Mr. Rice, was a fanciful personage, whose neatly striped dress, red slippers, bare legs, and huge ear-rings separated him completely from the actual world, and he was accepted as a convention, like the ordinary figures of pantomimes. The learned, we believe, have decided that the old stage black borrowed his dress from the negroes of the Spanish colonies; but that was a point which the playgoers never thought to investigate thirty years ago, when they were perfectly content to behold a citizen of their own day attired after the fashion immortalized by Hogarth, and found nothing exceptional in a Falstaff who appeared as a sort of military Punchinello, with obvious leanings towards the costume of William III. The black man with the blue and white stripes was the black whom everybody went to see, without asking any questions as to his origin; and a very funny fellow he was. From the stage he has now passed away, but his literary monument may be found in the old musical comedy, the "Padlock," to the perusal of which those of our readers who care about the stage may not unprofitably devote a spare hour. Mungo in the "Padlock" in the best specimen of the old conventional black.

No contrast could be more complete than that between the exceedingly neat negro to whom we have just referred and the ragged, uncouth vagabond who was introduced to the Londoners by "Jim Crow Rice." But in his very shabbiness there was an attraction. "Le laid, coïlé le beau," is said to have been the æsthetical maxim adopted by Victor Hugo when he composed the story of Quasimodo, and there is no doubt that the shabby—not in character, but in costume—is greatly relished by the play-goers of every grade. The charm of the "Wandering Minstrel," represented by Mr. Robson to the delight of the most aristocratic audience, lies not only in his song and in his dialect, but in his tatters; and an Irishman who fastens his coat with a skewer, and substitutes a hayband for a stocking, is welcomed not only as a man and a brother, but as a peculiarly interesting member of the species. In song, dance, rags, dialect, and gesticulation, Mr. Rice was alike acceptable, and the world was surprised to find that a black face could be associated with attributes once monopolized by the inhabitants of St. Giles's and Whitechapel. Billy Waters, the one-legged black fiddler, copied (if not literally taken) from the streets to embellish "Tom and Jerry," and Agamemnon, the attendant negro of the elder Mr. Charles Matthews's "Jonathan in England," had indeed preceded Jim Crow, and had learned their share of notoriety, but they were too much in the background to become the leading idols of a period; and although the respect paid to Billy Waters amounted to a sort of hero-worship, heightened by the circumstance that he was a fact as well as a figure, he had a formidable rival in Dusty Bob, who still lives in memory as the type of the old London Dustman.

The worship of Jim Crow was short-lived as it was ardent; for though his performance was novel, it could be very easily imitated and an English actor named Dunn, who simply copied Mr. Rice, was soon considered his successful rival by the lower class of playgoers, whose opinion with respect to certain branches of art is by no means to be despised. What with the original, and his imitators, and the repetitions of the "Turn about" song in every nook and corner, people began to think the comic negro a bore, just as about eight years since a decided distaste for the pious negro succeeded the rage for Uncle Tom. Jim Crow had been forgotten for something less than ten years when negro humor appeared before the public in an entirely new shape. Instead of donning the tattered coat and hat which Mr. Rice had made popular, or bringing into fashion the discarded blue and white suit of his predecessors, the new artistic negroes accoutred themselves in evening suits of black—perfect English gentlemen in every particular save the face. Mr. Rice has displayed his talent in broad Adelphi farces; but Messrs. Pell and Co. eschewed stage-plays, and got up an entertainment which even the Evangelical classes might patronize without inward misgiving. Their maxim was Odi profanum vulgus et arceo, and instead of inviting a roar from the assemblage of an ordinary gallery, they settled themselves in the most western theatre, and courted the smiles and the tears of the aristocratic. They sang about the joys and sorrows incident to negro life; and though some of their comic ditties were absurdities compared to which "Hot Codlins" is a work of high literary art, there was a freshness in their tone that gratified the most fastidious ears, while the more pathetic melodies were not only pleasing in themselves, but frequently accompanied words that, rather in sorrow than in anger, hinted at the miseries of slavery, and therefore accorded with the serious convictions of many of the audience. The form of the entertainment, too, was entirely novel. The minstrels sat in a row of which the two extremities were respectively occupied by the artists on the "bones" and the tambourine. These, who were somewhat more in the foreground than the players on the banjo and violin, were the humorists of the party, throwing themselves into a grotesque attitude during the performance of the music, and filling up the interval of song with verbal jokes of the kind in which the clowns of equestrian ring are wont to indulge. Mr. Pell, who himself was "bones"—for the word at last came to denote the player as well as the instrument—had really favored London with a new sensation. With the castanet, as the accompaniment to the elegant Spanish dances of Taglioni and Duvernay, everybody had become familiar; but this primitive rattle played with the most frantic contortions, was something entirely without precedent.

At first a few unreasonable grumblers endeavored to stem the popularity of Mr. Pell's company by declaring that the artists were not real blacks, but only white musicians with black faces. This pretended discovery was no discovery at all. Far from wishing to pass themselves off for veritable niggers, Pell and Co., as free-born American citizens, would have bitterly resented the suspicion that they had the least drop of black blood in their veins; so they lost no time in publishing portraits of themselves, with the white faces bestowed upon them by nature, in addition to others in which they wore the sable hue of their profession. Moreover, they styled themselves "Ethiopian Serenaders," thus selecting the name of the African country totally disconnected with negro slavery.

The popularity of "Jim Crow" was a rage among the middle and lower classes; but the "Ethiopians" set a fashion in the strictest sense of the word. The highest personages in the land patronised their performances. An ingenious young gentleman who could play on the banjo and sing "Lucy Neal" or "Buffalo Gals" was a welcome guest in the most aristocratic drawing-rooms; and if four amateurs clubbed together and imitated the entire performance of the professors, they were regarded as benefactors to their species. Let the music-books of the year 1846 and thereabouts be turned over, and it will be found what an enormous influence the Pell company had over the social pianoforte performances of their day. But though the Ethiopians started under aristocratic patronage, there was nothing in the nature of their entertainment to favor a continuance of exclusiveness. Italian operas and French plays will always repel the masses, from the simple circumstance that the words employed are in a foreign language, but there was nothing either in the humor or in the music of Pell's company that could not be as readily appreciated in St. Giles's as in St. James's. Consequently the people rushed into the participation of an enjoyment so keenly relished by the upper classes, and not only did imitators of the Ethiopians spring up in the cheapest concert rooms, but a band of itinerant black musicians became as necessary as an appurtenance of the London streets as Punch's show or a barrel-organ, much to the discomfiture of lovers of quiet in general, and of Dr. Bab-bage in particular.

Among the higher classes, the predilection for Ethiopian minstrelsy apparently died out, but in the lower stratum of society the tradition of Pell was faithfully preserved; and recent events show that even in the fashionable world the love of banjos and black faces was rather in abeyance than utterly extinct. Though negro melody and negro wit had been so done to death in every shape and every quarter, that they seemed on the point of descending into a mere street nuisance, important only to the police, the arrival of the "Christy's Minstrels," about four years since, revived the dormant flame. A host of well-dressed folks were again heard to declare that Ethiopian minstrelsy was the most amusing thing in London, and the pianoforte books were once more filled with songs testifying to the popularity of the new favorites among the select classes of the metropolis.

And the Christy's Minstrels have kept their ground. Pell and Co. founded the taste, which long survived its originators; but the Christy's have secured a permanent existence to their own corporate body. Their principal comic artist died, their manager retired with a fortune in his pocket; but they appointed a new humorist and subjected themselves to a new chief, and their corporate existence has been no more affected by the ordinary casualties of life than that of the Merchant Tailor's Company. They have likewise established a regular form of entertainment which is universally recognized; and to this form their competitors, the "Buckley's" and the "Campbell's," generally adhere. The first part of the exhibition consists of a concert in which the performers appear in black evening suits, and play, sing, and joke after the model set by Pell and his associates. There is, however, this difference, that the sentimental songs are commonly without reference to the peculiarities of negro life, and are not unfrequently composed by leading musicians, such as Balfe and Wallace. The second part is miscellaneous, and contains a great deal of grotesque dancing, together with a comic scene or two, in which the shabby vagabond negro of "Jim Crow Rice" once more makes his appearance. A burlesque of some well known Italian Opera concludes the whole. If we consider that all this is done, and exceedingly well done, by a company not above twelve strong, we shall have just cause to wonder at the concentration of talent, musical, histrionic, and gymnastic, that has been accomplished in the formation of the troop, and still more, to a marvel at its vitality. When the Arlecchino of an old Italian company died, his loss was regarded as a terrible calamity, the extemporaneous character of the "Commedie dell arte" requiring accomplishments of no ordinary kind; and it would seem that only a rare combination of muscular, vocal, and mimetic powers would enable a man to be chief comedian of the Christy's. So firmly is nigger minstrelsy now established as one of the leading amusements of the metropolis, that London without its regular black band would seem shorn of a necessary appurtenance. The banjo is thrummed all the year round; for when the "Christy's" retire to swallow a mouthful of fresh air and to pick up a pocketful of money in the provinces, the Buckley's or the Campbell's are quick to relieve guard, and make a very respectable figure.

Those who look on everything with a serious face will find in the popularity of nigger minstrelsy among the educated classes a singular illustration of the close connexion that exists between Puritanism and extreme frivolity. Scores of persons who would think it wicked to see the highest work of dramatic art performed by the finest company in the world, will, with the utmost complacency, spend a long evening in listening to trivial jokes, provided they cannot be convicted of "going to the play." It is not that these persons object to the theatre as an edifice, for they will unscrupulously enter any playhouse in London to witness the tricks of a conjurer; neither are they particularly averse to the dramatic form of entertainment, for this is constantly employed in their presence by the artists they delight to patronize. But they must not "go to the play on any consideration, and the distinction they draw is sufficiently practical to prevent the patronage of all that is elevating in the drama and to promote the encouragement of all that is trivial.

There is something melancholy in the fact that a form of religion has widely spread, which manifestly tends to lower the civilization of the educated classes; but those who are content to take things as they find them may agreeably spend an evening with the "Christy's Minstrels," and respect them as a clever sort of artists, who have thoroughly understood how to make the best of the circumstances in which they are placed, and deport themselves ably and conscientiously in their singular vocation.—London paper.

Sunday Music on the Common.

Some time since I delivered a lecture on amusements, in which I took a position deemed heretical by the Boston Recorder, and other "evangelical journals." It seemed to me at the time, that the suggestion I made was a legitimate one, and certain facts which have since come to my knowledge serve to strengthen that impression. With your permission, sir, I will make my statement over again, and leave the remedy for the evils, which it is full time we should grapple with, to others, if that which I advocate is not satisfactory. My desire is to see some force brought to bear on the class of which I spoke.

There is in Boston church-accommodation for about one-half its inhabitants. Were every seat in every church occupied on the Sabbath, there would be from seventy-five to a hundred thousand people who do not hear the Gospel preached. I do not mean by this statement to cut the city in halves, and say this half always attends church, and that half never does. Many of the seventy-five thousand who last Sunday were in the street, will on the next Sunday be in church; and many of the seventy-five thousand who last Sunday were at church, will next Sunday be in the street. I am very glad to correct the wrong impression which most men have when a statement is made that there is church accommodation for only half the people of the city, and to say that as many as two-thirds of our population are, to a greater or lesser extent, under the influence of the Christian pulpit.

But there is a class of men and women, and a large one it is, who, from one year's end to another, never enter a church. They can hardly remember the time when the preacher's voice was heard by them, so far as they are concerned, the pulpit is wholly useless. A part only of this class are reached by the various missions of the city. The ministry to the poor, which is doing more good than all the other religious organizations of the city put together, does in some way touch the hearts of the very many, and help them towards a higher life. But every city missionary will tell you sadly, that the most promising efforts which he makes are very uncertain. If he makes a conversion to-day, he feels that it is necessary to keep a sharp look-out for the converted one, and see that every possible incentive to right living is offered, since the temptations are so many and so strong, that the lapse from good resolutions are things of daily experience.

Now, besides the number of those who are most effectively acted upon by the missionary, there is a last class, from twenty to thirty thousand strong, who never have any good influence brought to bear on them. They never enter our churches, and are as ignorant of the value of Sunday worship as the Chinese. They are not influenced by the missionary, for he finds it impossible to get at them. This large class is composed of our dangerous men and women. They are often found in our jails and houses of correction. They live certainly not by honest labor, rather by begging and stealing. And Sunday is their gala-day. They find more dupes and victims than at any other time. The spread their snares, make their worst appointments and accomplish more on that day than on any other.

Now, sir, the question arises, How can this be remedied? Will you flood the streets with missionaries, who at every corner shall preach the Gospel to all who are willing to hear? I will join in that plan most heartily, and I will see that my Society bears its full portion of the expense of such an enterprise. But since this might be voted a Utopian rather than a practical scheme, what remedy do you offer that shall have immediate effect? What can you do to get those people out of their haunts, and give them a good impression? My plan, and it is not a novel one, was this. Station one or more bands of music on the Common; and on the most dangerous day of the week, the Sabbath, let those people whom you cannot coax into a church, be gathered together, to breathe the fresh air, and listen to music, rather than to the oaths which alone they are accustomed to hear. The influence could not be bad. The experiment could not fail of accomplishing good. Religious impression is what you want to give them; and will the Boston Recorder say that this cannot be done by music? If you cannot reach them by any other way, will you leave them to their doom, simply because this seems a somewhat novel, though, many chances to one, a very efficient missionary force?

For one, I am willing to urge the movement with all my might. I have no doubt that every Sabbath would produce its good results. The haunts of vice and the homes of poverty would be penetrated, if not pervaded by an influence that would soon produce good fruit. I have taken pains to notice how such a suggestion strikes the poorer classes. I have talked with intelligent men, members of these classes, who know only too well how many are the needs of those they represent. And one put his hand on my shoulder, and said sadly: "Yes, we should all go to the Common, though God knows we don't go to church; you church people don't know anything about us, you will never give us so good a thing as that. You don't care for us; you only say you do." He turned away sadly, and I felt that we didn't understand his caste of men and women.

The above-mentioned paper says the apostles would have been surprised if one had mentioned a brass band as an evangelizing power; but certainly the surprise would not have been greater than that with which, if they were present with us, they would peruse the columns of the Boston Recorder.

Some time ago, when there was music on the Common twice a week, it was noticed that the police reports contained only about half the number of arrests for drunkenness on those nights. It only shows that the right kind of people were on the Common; that a brass band was an evangelized power of no slight importance. And if such results could be attained again, the sooner we make music a religious fixture the better. I hope some of our Boston philanthropists will undertake the work as soon as the weather permits.—G. H. H., in Christian Register.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music from La France Musicale.

Un Fanatico per la Musica.

The scene we are about to describe, took place not long ago, at St. Petersburg. The journal, le Nord published the account originally and we reproduce it. It concerns one Alessandro Lazarev, a genuine fanatico per la musica, a soi disant unappreciated genius who felt himself called upon to bring about a revolution in the art of music and who, for some eight or ten years, has persisted in obliging the public to hear his symphonies, oratorios, overtures, hymns, &c. His productions indeed, are not entirely wanting in ideas, or in melodies, sometimes sufficiently new; but this unfortunate composer does not possess even the most elementary notions about counterpoint, or of figured bass and consequently he writes scores utterly impossible to be executed by instruments; in a word, perfect charivari music. Criticism has told him so several times, but he will not listen to reason and answers by abuse with which he fills great posters three metres long, for lack of any journal that will publish his prose. As you see, he is a maniac, a sort of Russian Wagner.

About a month ago, appeared a pamphlet: "Lazarev and Beethoven," with portraits of the two personages on the cover. The purpose of this document, without signature, was to prove to the public of St. Petersburg that it was a fool and an ignoramus that it did not understand that the Signore Alessandro Lazarev, amico de Rossini (so he styles himself in his notices and posters) was by far the superior of the author of Fidelio and the Pastoral Symphony.

The anonymous writer, styling himself "Counselor of State and Chevalier of several orders," proposed to appear before the public at the first concert of Lazarev, ready to maintain against all comers the right of his protégé to the title of a composer of genius. It was supposed at first that there was some humbug about this, but in about ten days appeared a placard announcing for the 29th of March a grand concert of Slavic music of our Wagner, "for the benefit of the Christians in Syria, and d'apropos of the Lazarev and Beethoven pamphlet," at which would be also performed music by Beethoven, so that the public might compare and judge.

An announcement so absurd attracted the crowd. The scandal was smelt afar off, but the result entirely surpassed their expectations. Never was anything so great seen in any concert hall of the old or new world.

The hall of the Club des Bourgeois (maison Iakountchikov) was full an hour before the time for the concert, and for a wonder, the doors were found thrown wide open, and no ticket taker before them. Those poor Christians of Syria will have no chance at all. All our musical celebrities, artists and critics came to see how l'amico di Rossini would make that scamp of a Beethoven come down from his pedestal. The orchestra was composed of the first artists of the capital. At half-past two comes the hero of the occasion; he distributes the parts to the musicians with his own hands and ascends his place with a triumphant air.

In Russia they love courage and intrepidity. The maestro bows with dignity and gives the signal to the orchestra. The first morceau is executed amid profound silence; however, by degrees they begin to make interruptions and quite boisterous laughs are heard among the audience and even among the musicians. When the piece is ended, for better or for worse, the public calls vociferously for the author of the pamphlet to present his argument. Alessandro Lazarev appears again to announce that the "Counselor of State and chevalier of several orders, Markov is indisposed; but that he is not an imaginary personage. He exists, and those who have any doubt about it can clear up their doubts at his lodgings at the Bridge Alartchine." General laughter in the audience.

The second piece was about to begin when suddenly an individual with long curly hair, a musical critic well known and highly esteemed, mounts a chair and asks to be heard. Leave was immediately given and he proceeds, "Gentlemen," said the improvised orator, "you have heard the first piece of this illustrious composer, and it has given you a complete idea of the calibre of his talent. Shall the author of such a cacophony be permitted to couple his name with that of the greatest of composers? Is it not an unworthy speculation, and shall not we be right in throwing rotten potatoes at him who has dared to humbug us in this fashion?"

This sally was received with unanimous bravos. Lazarev, not admitting himself to be conquered, rushes to the tribune, (that is, his desk) and asks for silence and the attention of the audience. "Listen, gentlemen, listen I pray you to my overture; you shall then hear one of Beethoven's; then you can make the comparison. As to this gentleman who has just spoken, I despise him and laugh at his opinion." So saying, he gave the signal again to the orchestra, and the overture began.

This bravado lent fire to the powder. The audience rose noisily, and cried; "Stop, stop your charivari! You are splitting our ears! This is too bad! The fanatical maestro throws himself into all sorts of attitudes, continuing to direct the orchestra. The patience of the public is exhausted. They make missiles of the handbills, and of every thing they can lay hands upon, and throw them from all sides at the head of the rival of Beethoven. He still holds his ground, although part of the musicians have taken flight; the tumult in the audience rises with the row in the orchestra. At last some individuals rush to the platform and intimate to Lazarev a hint to beat a retreat. He tries to resist, but the numbers of the besiegers being always crescendo, the unhappy maestro is soon dragged off by a crowd that insults, pushes, crowds and finally hustles him out of the hall.

This is the way that with us, they encourage innovators, pioneers of musical reform and people who wish to create music such as no one ever heard! In this respect St. Petersburg is as barbarous as Paris. There they hiss the Tannhäuser, and do not wish to listen to the music of the future. We must suppose that the music of Lazarev is of a still more distant future, since it draws down upon him kicks instead of hisses.

Music Gardens of Berlin.

Out of the well known street, unter den Linden, passing through the magnificent Brandenburg gate, the suburb seeker finds himself in the Thier-Garten, a vast park through which runs a wide avenue lined with poplars and lindens, and leading to Charlottenburg. This park, though just outside the wall of a populous city, is as wild and as densely overgrown with trees as a primeval forest. Here and there are little lakes, which, it must be confessed, are generally stagnant and suggestive of miniature dismal swamps, indeed, the Thier Garten is rather damp than otherwise, but this is the only drawback to one of the noblest parks in existence. In one part of it is Kroll's, a sort of theatre and open-air garden, one of the characteristic features of Berlin amusements. It is a really splendid building, the principal apartment being an immense and elegant hall, profusely decorated, lighted up with huge chandeliers, and provided with a stage and the usual accessories.

Here, every night at six o'clock, an opera is performed in German; Flotow, Weber, and Lortzing being the most popular composers. The band is excellent, and the singers above mediocrity. You never hear an old, worn-out, feeble singer. Voice, voice, voice, seems to be the first requisite, and the German operatic artists of Kroll's always possess this essential element of success. Between the acts everybody, male and female, Herr and Frau, and Fraulein, and Kinder, go out to the adjoining rooms to revel in beer. Were I to send to you a statistical report of the immense size of the glasses from which the Teutonic nectar is imbibed, I should be scouted as another Baron Munchausen. Having drank as much beer as would fill an ordinary bathing tub, the Kroll visitor is summoned by a bell to listen to the next act; which over, off he, she or they rush for more beer. So after the second act. Ditto after the third act. Then after the last act all go into the garden to drink beer indefinitely.

These gardens are very pretty, and are illuminated with revolving cones of gas jets, and furnished with seats and tables. While the people drink and smoke the orchestra takes its place on a platform and plays divinely. Now it is the weird overture to Oberon—now the grand Coronation March of Meyerbeer's Prophets—now one of the witching waltzes of Labitzky or Lanner, or the still more enchanting strains of Strauss. So for an hour or two more the festivities are kept up till about half-past ten o'clock, when it is all over. The entrance to the garden, entitling you only to hear the orchestral music before and after the opera, is seven cents—inclusive of the opera, from 20 to 25 cents, according to the place. There are other cheaper music gardens in and about Berlin, open every night.—Corr. of N. Y. Evening Post.

MUSIC IN PRIMARY SCHOOLS.—Another exercise which should enter into every scheme of primary instruction, is vocal music. Its claims to public recognition as a regular school exercise, rest upon its value as a means of cultivating the ear to a nice discrimination of sounds, and of the vocal organs to an accurate utterance of the notes of the gamut—upon the rich and pure fountain of enjoyment which it opens to its possessors—but especially upon its blessed and tranquilizing influence upon the minds and hearts of the children in the school-room. As an auxiliary in government, its aid is invaluable. When some excitement has ruffled the temper, or perturbed the spirits of the little school community, it comes like a messenger of peace, and the swelling breast is calm. When the mind is weary with application, it yields to the power of song, and returns to its labor refreshed and strengthened. We all know the strange power of music upon our own feelings, and can readily see that upon the susceptible natures of children this influence is greatly enhanced. Unlike almost everything else, music would seem to be an unmixed good.—N. Y. Teacher.

THE NATIONAL HYMN.—The committee on the national hymn announce that the time for the reception of manuscripts by them has expired, and that no more will be admitted to competition. The number already in their hands is over eleven hundred and fifty. The public will see at once that the examination and comparison of such a mass of manuscript matter must be a work of some time. The committee therefore ask the indulgence of those who are interested in this subject; and they take this opportunity of saying to contributors that the first announcement of their decision will be made publicly, and that personal inquiry upon that subject will be entirely in vain.

Musical Correspondence.

TOWNSEND, MASS., JUNE 22.—During a recent tour through the West, we chanced to tarry for a short period in Shelbyville, a small town in the interior of Kentucky, famed in the regions thereabout for its educational institutions of which there are five,—two for males and three for females—all of them in quite a flourishing condition. It was the anniversary occasion in some of the schools, and public exhibitions were being held for the benefit of numerous friends and patrons of the various institutions. On the morning of the 12th inst., we were privileged with listening to the silvery eloquence of a few zealous sons of the South, as they held forth to a very respectable audience seated in a delightful grove, in front of one of the principal buildings to the Episcopal College. The orations were, on the whole, creditable to the young gentlemen, who delivered them—if we except two or three, who seemed anxious to exhibit their independence by advocating the claims of the South—urging the chivalric sons of Kentucky to unite their fortunes with those of the rebel Confederacy. We were gratified to learn, however, that Shelbyville is eminently a Union place—her most distinguished and respectable citizens declaring unconditionally in favor of the Constitution and the Law. Secession is below par, and few can be found bold enough to declare their treasonable sentiments even if entertained. Would it were so throughout the whole length and breadth of the State.

On the evening of the same day our attention was arrested by the appearance of a programme for a concert, to be given in the Presbyterian Church by the young ladies of Shelbyville Female College. Of course, there was no resisting such an attraction, and, accordingly—we soon found ourselves closely wedged in among an immense and brilliant audience, all seemingly intent on being pleased, judging by the indiscriminate clamor of applause, which succeeded each and every performance. In both instrumental and vocal pieces, the efforts of the young ladies were most admirably seconded by the magic tones of the Professor's violin—so skillfully superadded as effectually to cover all defects and finish up the whole with remarkable eclat. But the crowning attraction of the evening was Iliawatha Schottisch, quite ostentatiously set forth as a composition of Talexty (but in reality one of Bellak's easy Duets), for six Pianos, twenty-four performers."

Being simply an amateur in the fine arts, we could scarcely comprehend the manner in which the terms of the programme could be fulfilled—forty fingers on one piano! That must necessarily put nearly all the keys in motion, especially on a "six octave"—but, in due time, the enigma was solved—twenty-four young ladies made their appearance—seated at their pianos, each using but one hand! Truly the people out West are munificent in the bestowal of commendation; and the ingenious little German Professor, to whom the credit of the arrangement belongs, seems to understand very well how to call forth the applause of the multitude.

We would venture to suggest, that all instructors of music, in our female seminaries might learn from this and adopt a similar plan, as one well calculated to produce the impression of rare musical skill, on part of both teachers and pupils, and this without so great an expenditure of time and labor as is usually employed for a similar purpose. Why spend weeks and months of unnecessary drill to render pupils exact and independent in the presentation of their pieces, before an audience, who never look beyond the surface, but who so good-naturedly bestow their approbation on what is only seemingly meritorious. No matter if the uninitiated be slightly deceived—if they do wonder and admire without cause—the great object of a musical education seems to have been gained, when public applause is secured, and he, who has tact and ingenuity enough to cause an illusion of two senses at once, and make a grand display, will be sure to share most largely in popular renown. We offer them a plea in behalf of the large class of young ladies, who are now so grievously burdened by a system of never-ending practising and recommend most earnestly that the Professors take a much larger share of the performance upon their own shoulders, and lead off, either by means of a violin, or otherwise, to relieve their pupils from embarrassing mistakes. Moreover, we would have them learn to exercise a little more ingenuity, in devising some plan by which those unfortunates, who possess neither musical ability nor industry may receive the coveted applause—of being "splendid performers."

A PLAY AT THE TUILERIES.

One evening last week one of the earlier plays of Dumas was performed at the Tuileries. Eighty ladies were present. At the close of the performance the Empress approached the leading actor, Montrose, and having complimented him on his performance, inquired of him, with a smile, how long it was since the play had been performed at the French theatre? The actor replied that it had not been performed there for forty years. "In that case," replied the Empress, laughing, "I beg that you will say nothing about it; for there are several ladies here who never admit that they are thirty years of age, and who have just assured me that they have seen this played at the French theatre."

AN ARTISTIC CONCERT.

The Society of the Union Artistique has given at the Italian theatre, hired for the occasion, a magnificent concert. The andante and finale of Beethoven's Symphony in A, and the Benedictus of the Mass in D, by the same author; the Piano Concerto, in D minor, by Bach; and the overture of Mendelssohn's "Quiet Sea," were given, in their most perfect style, by the unrivalled artists of the Conservatoire. Living composers were represented by an Ave verum of Gounod; a song from Membree's opera, Fingal; and the sublime, descriptive composition of Félicien David, "The Last Judgment," which formed the leading feature of the evening's programme.

DAVID THE COMPOSER.

The author of the "Desert," the "Pearl of Brazil" and the "Last Judgment," though he has now fully conquered the reluctant suffrages of Paris, was long the object of the bitterest and most persistent hostility. The boldness of his conceptions and the originality of the means which he employs in working them out, though now lauded to the skies, were formerly denounced as monstrous, heretical and absurd. Gentle, refined and exceedingly sensitive, the feelings of the man suffered intensely under the persecution to which the artist was subjected; and it would be difficult to imagine a more touching protest against the cruel virulence of party passion than the expression of patient, weary suffering worn into the features of the man of genius, whom long persecution has rendered prematurely old.

Tall, slightly bent, thin as a shadow; a high forehead, already bald; black elf locks, streaked with silver, falling backwards from a pale, long face; large, lustrous black eyes, deep, earnest and sorrowful; a mouth placid, but as sad in expression as the eyes; and an air of almost feminine gentleness and timidity, make up a personality equally striking and pathetic. There is no sign of weakness about the man. He is evidently one to hold on his way, as he has done, gently but firmly; never flinching under opposition, but feeling it so acutely that no amount of success can ever obliterate the traces of the suffering through which he has won his way to his present eminence.—Paris Corr. of N. Y. Eve. Post, May 24, 1861.

CHEVE'S SYSTEM.

NEW YORK, JUNE 22, 1861.—We observe that the article on the new French method of musical instruction published in your Journal of May 18, has elicited considerable comment, and called out a desire for further facts and details concerning it—more particularly for some comprehensive statement of the general principles which it embodies.

The object of the above-mentioned article was simply to point out some of the advantages to be derived from a study of this simple and beautiful system, and to show the high esteem in which it is held in France, in spite of the prejudice and opposition which—in common with all other important discoveries—it was, at first, obliged to encounter.

Numerous letters of inquiry from different parts of the country have been addressed to us to which we cannot specially reply, but, as soon as time and the pressure of other duties will permit, we design to furnish a series of articles which shall give "more light" upon the merits and prominent features of this favorite system, of which so little is known here, and convey a clear idea of "what precisely this system is and how it differs from the plan of musical instruction in vogue in this country."

We are satisfied, from personal observation of its workings in Paris, that its introduction and application upon a large scale in this country, would not only render the study and science of music general among our people, but would most likely lead to an entire revolution in the prevailing ideas of its uses. It only wants to be known to be appreciated. Meantime, we are pleased to see so much interest manifested in the subject, and trust that it will be thoroughly tested after the present contest between Barbarism and Civilization is ended, and the inhabitants of this Continent shall have entered upon that glorious destiny which is in store for them as a consequence of the powerful blow which our great republic is about to strike for its free institutions.

AMATEUR.

Concert Programmes.

In an article, written in the early part of the year, on "Popular Concerts" (vol. xviii., No 19) we made the statement, that the mass of the people remain children, and that, therefore, any instruction in music ought to proceed from the rudiments of musical Art, and practically, from simple national airs to "classical" or scientific music. There is another class of persons, not over-numerous, who have heard a good deal of good music and learned to like it. Anything by Beethoven, or Haydn or Mozart is received by them with pleasure and reverence. But to many of them Bach or Schumann are incomprehensible; the music before Haydn generally is not as pleasant to them as that of the later masters, and even the later works of Beethoven sound strange to their ears. This is not surprising, when we consider the psychological fact, that it is habit which makes things pleasant and dear, and that such persons are not in the habit of hearing older music or music of Beethoven's later period, or of Schumann. In our concerts intended for the larger public, such as the "Philharmonic" were, it would be unwise, we think, to introduce some of the older music at present. In Leipzig, to be sure, they have been performing one of C. Ph. Emanuel Bach's symphonies lately, with great applause. But at Leipzig the public is accustomed to the music of J. Sebastian Bach and the older masters generally. We have heard the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven here, and it was received with general enthusiasm; that is a very good sign; but we have seen the beautiful music by Beethoven to Goethe's Egmont fall dead upon the same audience that was enraptured with the Ninth. This shows that there is still room for improvement in that direction.

Progress in taste proceeds from a few chosen minds, around whom cluster those lovers of the Ideal who are most susceptible to beauty in whatever art it be represented. In music composers and artists of the true stamp constitute such nuclei. By playing to the sympathizing few the best of their own or of other great master's works, they increase the taste and appreciation of the best in music in their homes. As there is no rest in the mental progress of man, these select few, educated to love the best and constantly improved and elevated to higher levels by the influence of composers and artists, cannot help diffusing such healthful influence in wider circles. In larger audiences they form the centre from which appreciation and applause of the best passages proceed, sympathetically moving the less educated and sensitive.

It is with these select audiences that progress in a new, unknown direction is to begin. And it rests with the chosen artists whose performances they attend, to give a start to such progress. When audiences have become familiar with a good number of Beethoven's earlier works for the Piano, with his earlier chamber-music, with the easier chamber-music of Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn, then it is time for them to be introduced to Beethoven's later Sonatas, to his later chamber-music, to Schumann's larger works and to the wonderful music left as a rich legacy by Joh. Seb. Bach. The works of this master are almost unknown, only here and there some few of his compositions have been produced in select circles. They contain in a severe form, full of intricate harmonies, alive with contrasted melodies, such a wealth of beauty, of intensest feeling, of lyric vividness, of dramatic force, that he who has come to penetrate through the outer barrier of confusing harmonies and rhythm, stands enchanted, and longs for nothing else but Bach. So it is with the later compositions of Beethoven and so with many of Schumann's larger works.

We have the right kind of music-lovers in our city to begin such a course of progressive and extensive musical studies, as far as they can be pursued in the concert-room. We well remember the thrill of pleasure that ran through the audience when the Quartette, op. 74, in E flat by Beethoven was performed for the first time. That Quartette is not very easy to understand, yet it took its hearers the first time by storm. Of the later Quartettes by these masters nothing has yet been heard here. Nor did we hear any of the Sonatas by Beethoven, which, belonging to the latest period, embody all the manly, ripe strength and experience of the master, the only piece of that period having been the Ninth Symphony which was received in an appreciative manner. It seems now to rest with the few gifted artists to continue on this rising road to progress, and to give the lovers of good music an opportunity to acquaint themselves with older as well as later music. The middle period being tolerably well known and comprehended, musical knowledge ought to expand and musical appreciation to embrace less known works that are harder to understand.

We have been led to this train of remark by a concert programme sent us from Wurzburg, in the southern part of Germany. For some time past three men in Germany have made the study of the last Piano Sonatas by Beethoven their especial business; Hans von Bülow, the son-in-law of Liszt, Bronsard and Mortier de Fontaine. The name of the first of the three is familiar to the readers of our Journal, having been frequently mentioned in former years in concert-notice from Berlin and Paris. They have done a great deal in making German audiences familiar with those works that are so little known, though they deserve to be so widely known. The last named artist, Mortier de Fontaine, in April last, came to Wurzburg on a concert-tour, intending to give but one concert. So great, however, was the enthusiasm he created, that he had to yield to the entreaties of the Wurzburgers and give four concerts. The programme of the second concert is the one sent to us, and we here print it, as it presents some novelties, aside from the intrinsic merit of the pieces. We translate the bill literally.

Now such an historical concert is really quite interesting in presenting to the audience different styles of music and thus enabling them intelligently to judge of the characteristic marks of each. There is another feature which seems very commendable. The artist is not above Father HAYDN. There is a certain anobblishness among younger artists with reference to the older masters that is sometimes really amusing. "We have got beyond Haydn: he is too uninteresting to play him now," is a remark not seldom heard. We remember to have seen concert-programmes of Frau Clara Schumann, on several of which a Sonata by Haydn was to be found. We should like to see the keys of some of the pieces for this programme stated; otherwise we think it unexceptionable. When shall we in Boston hear such concerts, combining instruction with elevated enjoyment? Will none of our resident artists undertake to let us hear pieces by the older masters and the better works of Beethoven? It would certainly be a very praiseworthy and we hope a very successful enterprise. Let Horace's maxim be remembered and acted upon:

Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci,
or in a free translation:
He is most successful who unites the useful with the pleasant.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

Notwithstanding the departure of the court and the absence even of Prince Jerome and Princess Clotilde, two very gay entertainments of rather a novel description were given last week at the Ministère d'Etat and the hotel of M. de Morny, President of the Corps Legislatif. Instead of the operetta of one act, which it has been so much the fashion of late to introduce at the receptions, one or two acts of the Misanthrope of Moliere, played by Samson and Regnier, (those veterans of the Theatre Française) M'm Plessy, and others, were performed at M. Walewski's with the greatest success that the piece is one better calculated to be appreciated in a salon than on the stage, where many of its more delicate shades are of necessity lost. The bill of fare for the evening's entertainment was still further varied by the re-appearance of Liszt and his performance of two wonderful pieces on the piano, as well as his masterly accompaniment of Pauline Viardot, in the German ballad of the "Erl King." At M. de Morny's two slight pieces of comic character were given, the first one of those witty, brilliant effusions in which the French peculiarly excel, called a "proverbe," and in which that charming actress, M'le Madeline Brohair and Brasseur delighted all the audience; the second an operetta bouffe, "M. Choufleury Migline," of which the lively music and the droll incidents were admirably given and thoroughly enjoyed. When it is recalled that the lounging room from such a spectacle was the gallery of magnificent pictures of the Count de Morny, from which all but the choicest gems are carefully excluded, it is scarcely possible to imagine a greater treat to the senses and the intellect than the one thus offered to his guests. Lighted up by a thousand wax candles might be seen, in the intervals of the performance, such Rembrandts, Van de Velde and Hobbemas as are rarely to be met with singly in any one collection; whilst he is well known to be the possessor of the masterpieces of Greuze, Boucher, Fragonard, Prudhon, Meissonier, and other eminent masters of the French school. The entertainment was most successful, and all the better appreciated from the rarity of such receptions at this period of the year.—Corr. of the North American.

Cologne.

It having occurred to me that the Niederrheinisches Musik-Fest may not be an uninteresting topic to some of your readers, I beg to forward you a short account of the present year's celebration.

This festival, which consists of three concerts given on three consecutive evenings, and which is held yearly in Whitsuntide at Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, or Dusseldorf, was celebrated this year at Aix-la-Chapelle, under the able direction of Franz Lachner, of Munich. The first concert opened on Sunday, the 19th inst., with Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica. Nothing could surpass the precision and delicacy with which this noble work was executed. The orchestra, composed of first-class artists from far and near, responded heartily to Herr Lachner's efforts; and the result was what might have been expected. The perfect silence observed during the performance, and the deafening applause which followed the conclusion of each movement, showed how thoroughly the audience appreciated what they heard.

The symphony was followed, after a short pause, by the same composer's Missa Solemnis, in D. major (Op. 123). This colossal work, which took its author more than three years to compose, and was regarded by himself as his most complete composition, is, however, very seldom attempted in Germany, on account of its magnitude and difficulty—obstacles only to be overcome on occasions like the present, when so large a number of practised musicians concentrate their energies towards the same point. The performance of the mass reflected the same credit on the chorus as the symphony had done on the orchestra. The solos were well executed; the obblato for the violin, one of the principal features of the "Benedictus," being played by Herr Joseph Joachim, with that exquisite taste and finish for which he stands alone. With the Mass in D terminated the first concert. The success of the second was equally brilliant. The programme was composed of Mozart's orchestral symphony in C major, and Handel's oratorio of Joshua. The oratorio which formed the second part of the concert was a perfect triumph for all concerned. The choruses, from first to last, were sung with a vigor and accuracy that left it difficult to decide to which the palm was due. Two were unanimously encored—viz., the first chorus in the second part, "Glorreich ist Gott," and the last but one in the 3rd part, "See the conquering Hero comes." Frau Rübsamen-Veith, who had ably sustained the soprano music in the Missa Solemnis on the previous evening, acquitted herself most brilliantly in that of Achsah. Her rendering of the airs, "Horch auf den Vögel Jubelchor!" and "O hüt' ich Jubal's Harf," was irreproachable. The part of Joshua was undertaken by Herr Carl Schneider of Wiesbaden; Othniel and Caleb by Frau Potthoff-Diehl, of Aix-la-Chapelle, and Herr Julius Krause, of Berlin, singers of well-attested capabilities. The theatre, crowded to excess, resounded with applause whenever a halt in the music allowed of it; and every one present seemed to participate heartily in the feeling of enthusiasm with which Handel's splendid composition (if justice be done to it) all who listen to it must be inspired.

The programme for the third concert was as follows:—

- PART I.
1. Overture, "Oberon" (Weber).
2. Aria "Mitrane" (composed in 1680), Frau Potthoff-Diehl. (Rossi).
3. Concerto, Pianoforte, and Orchestra, Frau Clara Schumann (Schumann).
4. Aria "Figaro's Hochzeit," by Herr Krause (Mozart).
5. "Sanctus" and "Benedictus" from the Missa Solemnis (Beethoven).

- PART II.
1. Prelude and Fugue for Orchestra (F. Lachner).
2. "Hallelujah," cantata for Soprano, "Esther," Frau Rübsamen-Veith (Handel).
3. Concerto, Violin and Orchestra, Herr Joachim (Beethoven).
4. Aria "Euryanthe" Herr Schneider (Weber).
5. Grand chorus: "The Heavens are telling" (Haydn).

The appearance of such artists as Mad. Schumann and Herr Joachim together in this programme was alone sufficient to stamp the character of this final concert. The solos were well chosen and well executed, especially the "Hallelujah" and air from Euryanthe, in which Frau Rübsamen-Veith and Herr Schneider confirmed the good opinion already formed of their abilities. The prelude and fugue, a new composition of Franz Lachner's, was vigorously played, and received with unbounded applause. The concert found a worthy finale in the chorus which closes the first part of Haydn's Creation; orchestra and singers vied with each other in obtaining a perfect performance, and succeeded to the satisfaction of everybody.

Thus ended the 38th Niederrheinisches Musik Fest; the theatre was filled each night to the ceiling with lovers of the art, gathered together from all parts of Germany. Great credit is due to Franz Wüllner, music director of Aix-la-Chapelle, for the pains he must have taken to bring the chorus up to the mark at which Herr Lachner found them. There were 426 singers and 135 players—561 performers in all.—Corr. of Musical World June 8.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Signor Mario made his first appearance on Monday night with one of those parts in which he stands unrivalled. So brilliant a Count Almaviva as his has not been witnessed by the present generation of opera-goers. Incomparable as an exhibition of vocal skill, it is also a pattern of high-class comedy—natural and refined in an equal measure, easy, elegant, and in every sense attractive. Such a performance is the more to be valued at a time when scarcely a contemporary singer, Italian or non-Italian, can execute the music of Rossini's most dashing hero with the requisite grace and fluency. To these qualities, moreover, rare as they are just now, Signor Mario joins unflinching spirit and a kind of gentlemanly humor as agreeable as it is peculiarly his own. On Monday night—as though, for reasons unnecessary to state, resolved to do his best—he fairly eclipsed his previous achievements. In his very best days he has seldom played Almaviva so unexceptionally well—never, on any occasion with more uniform and sustained excellence. He was received with the old heartiness, and at once—in the beautiful cavatina, "Ecco ridente il Cielo"—rewarded his patrons with a specimen of legitimate Italian art, combining the utmost purity of expression with a style and method altogether faultless. The duet with Figaro—"All' idea di quel metallo"—was, if possible, even better, the florid passages at the end of the quick movement ("A che d'amore") being delivered, "mezza voce," with an evenness, fluency, rapidity and perfect truth of intonation not to be surpassed. To avoid details, we may add that the rest was of the same stamp; that not one moment of apathy weakened the effect of the performance; and that Almaviva's last solo (in the trio with Rosina and Figaro) was marked by the same careful refinement as his first, the well known "Zitti zitti, piano piano!" which forms the last movement of the trio, eliciting a loud and general encore. As Signor Mario never sang or acted better, so was he never more liberally applauded. In short, he was to employ the conventional expression, "in his finest voice," and did thorough justice to his admirable talent. Our crowded space will not allow more than a word or two for the other performers. Mad. Miolan Carvalho's Rosina showed all that extraordinary vocal facility for which it was so much admired last season; Signor Ciampi's Bartolo, though overstrained and turbulent, was original and painstaking; Signor Tagliafico's Bartolo was an extremely diverting caricature, and Signor Ronconi's Figaro more than racy and inimicable—a modern Figaro, indeed, upon which a volume might be written.

On Saturday La Sonnambula was given for the first time. On Tuesday the Prophète was repeated. On Thursday, Guillaume Tell, and last night La Sonnambula, again to be repeated on Monday. Thus, we need hardly say, the star of Adelina Patti seems to be greatly in the ascendant. Il Barbiere to-night.—Musical World, June 8.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The fourth and last concert, which took place on Wednesday, was not only in every way worthy of its predecessors, but might be looked upon as the triumphant climax to its third season. Never has Mr. Alfred Mellon's band more brilliantly distinguished itself than upon this occasion, and the warm and hearty recognition of its merits at the conclusion of each piece was never more fully deserved. The instrumental selection was particularly rich, comprising three overtures, the least known of Spohr's Der Berggeist, bringing with it almost the charm of novelty, the best known of Mendelssohn's, the exquisitely poetical Midsommer Night's Dream, of which the execution was perhaps the finest ever heard in London, and Weber's familiar Euryanthe. But beyond these there were other, and still more interesting features in the programme; the most remarkable being Professor Sterndale Bennett's concert in C minor, for pianoforte, No. 3 of the four published. That such a work should have been so long overlooked by our pianists is indeed unaccountable; and now that Miss Arabella Goddard has set the example by playing two of the series within little more than a week, we may possibly have an opportunity of more frequently hearing one or other of the concertos which are in every way worthy of being placed in the same category as the acknowledged masterpieces of the great composers. True, there are but few before the public so thoroughly competent as Miss Arabella Goddard, to whom it is not too high praise to say that anything more refined, expressive, and intellectual than her reading of this concerto was never heard, and the long-continued applause and universal recall, were only compliments due to the merit of so wonderful a performance, to which the delicately subdued and skillfully managed accompaniment of the orchestra lent an additional charm. Of Beethoven's symphonies the "Pastoral" is perhaps the most familiar and best understood, being melodious throughout, and completely suited to the appreciation of all who have any taste of feeling for music. To say that the execution was worthy the composition will not appear too high an eulogium for those who know the materials of which Mr. Alfred Mellon's band is composed, and how thoroughly they are under the control of the accomplished conductor.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—At the last concert on Monday, the feature was the Antigone of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's music. The performance was got up with infinite care and pains and reflected the utmost credit on Dr. Wylde, the band, chorus, principal singers and reciters. The poem was read by Miss Heraud and Mr. Ryder, and the principal singers were Mr. George Perren, Mr. Richard Seymour, Mr. C. Henr and Herr Formes. Miss Heraud has hardly power enough for such an area as that of St. James's Hall, but her voice is sweet, and its inflections are managed very skillfully. The poem was abridged here and there, but still the verses seemed interminable, and the splendor and beauty of the music could hardly redeem their tediousness. The introduction into a concert-room of these long poems, tragedies, in fact, with music however attractive is, we are convinced, a mistake. No performance could be more complete and admirable than that of Monday evening at St. James's Hall, but still the audience was very much inclined to devote themselves to sleep during the recitations. Should Dr. Wylde contemplate repeating Antigone on any future occasion, we strongly counsel him to reduce the poem at least two-thirds, whereby he will increase the attraction of the music ten-fold. The programme, among other things, included Beethoven's symphony in D, and the overture to Euryanthe, both of which were played magnificently. Herr Formes sang the air "La Calunnia," from the Barbiere with immense effect. A new disposition was made of the orchestra. The chorus was so large as nearly to occupy the whole of platform, and the band were placed on the ground in front. There was an immense attendance.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Mlle. Adelina Patti's second impersonation was looked forward to with the greatest interest and curiosity, and a fuller attendance we do not remember at the Royal Italian Opera on any former occasion than on Saturday, when the young artist was announced for the heroine in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor. Her two previous performances in the Sonnambula had literally worked up the Opera public to the highest pitch of expectation. We cannot say, however, that these exorbitant expectations were entirely realized. Indeed, with an artist who has such great instincts, and, as far as we permitted to judge at present, possesses such an intuitive knowledge of character, this was impossible. The character of Amina is far more difficult to embody than Lucia, and requires far greater histrionic powers, as may be easily conceived, when it is remembered that the former was written for Pasta, the empress of lyric tragedy, and the latter for Persiani, the queen of bravura singing. As a test of the capabilities of the actress, it was consequently instituting an anticlimax, to put Mlle. Patti into Lucia after the Sonnambula. Donizetti's music is charming, and Sir Walter Scott's heroine, somewhat paled indeed in the ineffectual fire of the Italian poet, is sufficient interesting; but, excepting in the mad scene, the artist has really no self-dependent great situation, since in the finale to the second act the roving brother and the "cursing tenor" do all in their power by vociferation and gesture to "pluck" all hearing and seeing that away. Mlle. Patti looked the character of Lucy to the life, recalling more, perhaps, than any singer we have seen the exquisite description of the novelist: "Something there was of feminine softness, perhaps the result of delicate health, or residence in a family where the dispositions of the inmates were fiercer, more active and energetic than her own." That her emotion seemed to have been toned down to this delineation is not at all unlikely, seeing that the fire and energy exhibited by all modern impersonators of Lucia, in the scene where Ashton shows her the forged letter announcing Edgardo's death, and in the great scene where her lover returns suddenly returns as it were from the grave to denounce her at the moment she has plighted troth to another, are made to yield to overwhelming anguish and despair, which knows no outbreak. Mlle. Patti in Lucia certainly betokened none of the passion and impulsive feeling so remarkable in her Amina. That the latter may be more agreeable to her instincts is not unlikely; but still both parts having been played so differently, may have proceeded from nice and subtle discrimination of character.

For the above reasons, and for these only, we cannot affirm that Mlle. Patti achieved the same triumphant success in Lucia as in La Sonnambula—which may demonstrate to many of her admirers that she belongs more to the Malibran than the Persiani school, which indeed is our own conviction. In reality the two first scenes of Lucy, the one in which the cavatina is introduced, and that with her brother, necessitate all the address, perfect finish, and dazzling brilliancy of fioriture, such as adorned the singing of Persiani and Jenny Lind—and perhaps of them alone—and require the very smallest amount of impulse or passion. Mlle. Patti sang the cavatina—the original one written for Persiani—with much brilliancy, and accomplished in the duet some surprising tours de force, singing an ascending and descending chromatic passage with astonishing ease and completeness, and making several dazzling flights in the highest part of her voice with great effect. So also in the duet with Ashton and in the Malediction scene, the young artist made frequent points, but did not endow the acting or singing with that sustained force to which the public had been accustomed, and which her powerful impersonation of Amina led them to expect. In the mad scene, however, Mlle. Patti came up to the very highest anticipations, and carried the whole house with her by her natural and earnest acting and her really admirable singing. The whole performance thus terminated most satisfactorily, and Mlle. Patti achieved a second triumphant success in her second part. Signor Tiberini was Edgardo, and Signor Graziani, Enrico.

On Tuesday Mad. Grisi gave the second of her Farewell Performances, when she chose Lucrezia Borgia, in which she was assisted by Signor Tiberini (Gennaro), Signor Ronconi (Duke Alfonso), and Mad. Nantier-Didé (Maffeo Orsini).

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The sixth concert (on Monday May 27) was one of the best ever given by the society. The feature of most interest in the concert, however, first because the least familiar, secondly, because the work of an English composer, thirdly, because performed by an English pianist, fourthly and lastly, because of its intrinsic worth as a production of the highest genius and skill, was Sterndale Bennett's second pianoforte concerto (in E flat), played by Miss Arabella Goddard. Of this work The Times says:—

"The novelty—for that which has not been heard for more than twenty years may fairly be regarded as a novelty—was the pianoforte concerto in E flat, the second of the four which Professor Bennett has published, and of the six he is known to have composed and played in public. This masterpiece—and it is nothing less, though more than a quarter of a century old—sounded as fresh, and spontaneous as if it had been written yesterday, a proof, if proof were wanting, that it is a work of genius, and that nothing but its uncommon difficulty could have prevented it (long ere this) from becoming a stock piece in the pianist's repertory, and as generally popular as it is eminently beautiful. The audience on Monday night listened to movement after movement with marked attention, charmed in a like measure with the force and energy of the allegro, the expressive grace of the adagio, and the fire and vivacity of the finale, a sort of mouvement de chasse, less strikingly original than brilliant and animated. Their satisfaction at the end was exhibited in a loud and unanimous applause, which did not cease until the performer (Miss Arabella Goddard, whose predilection for the music of Sterndale Bennett—whose champion before the English public she has long felt proud to be—began with her earliest public career, and who played as if her whole soul was in the difficult task she has undertaken) reappeared in the orchestra. We have long regarded the pianoforte concertos of Professor Bennett as the nearest thing of their class to the unsurpassable examples bequeathed us by the greatest masters, and were never more fully confirmed in this belief than on the present occasion, when one of the best of them was revived with such signal success."

Berlin.

Mozart's Zauberflöte, and Don Juan, Weber's Der Freischütz, Meyerbeer's Prophet, and Bellini's Norma, were the operas performed last week at the Royal Opera House.

There was a large and highly appreciative audience to hear the Zauberflöte, that great work of a great master. The part of Pamina was performed, for the first time, I believe, by Mlle. Lucca, the usual representative of the character being Mad. Harriers-Wippert. Comparisons, I am perfectly aware, are "odorous," especially between two ladies, and yet every one draws comparisons on every possible occasion. I shall, therefore, do so in the present instance, if only for the sake of being in the fashion. Of Mad. Harriers-Wippert and Mlle. Lucca, I certainly prefer the former lady. There is more unity or consistency, so to speak, in her performance. Her acting and singing blend so artistically together, that they produce, as it were, one homogeneous whole, which, as I take it, is the greatest triumph an artist can possibly achieve. There is no straining after effect. Everything is so easily accomplished, that the hearer fancies the task is one which is attended with no difficulty, and might be entrusted to anybody. Similar notions sometimes prevail with regard to writing a style like that of Jean Jacques Rousseau, or Lord Macaulay, commanding the Channel fleet and driving a one-horse chaise. Yet we know that it requires considerable skill to do any one of these things, and that it is not every person who possesses that skill—"Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum." Mlle. Lucca is assuredly not equal to her fair colleague. Yet she is good—exceedingly good—in the part, which, in fact, offers so many opportunities for producing a favorable impression, that, to use a rather vulgar term, any artist who altogether fails to do so must be a "muff." Mad. Küster was admirable as the Queen of Night, and all the other parts were creditably filled.

Le Prophète was as attractive as ever, the house being crammed to the ceiling. The cast was partially new. In the first place Herr Taubert conducted the work for the first time, and considering that he undertook to do so at only a day's notice, is fairly entitled to high praise. Herr Theodore Formes was the misguided hero of the piece, and both sang and acted with uncommon talent. Mlle. Lucca appeared as Bertha, one of the most successful impersonations. She was enthusiastically applauded in the duet of the fourth act. As I informed you in my last letter, Mad. Jachmann is away on leave of absence. Mlle. de Ahna was her substitute as Fides, and a very worthy substitute she proved. Her fresh beautiful voice was heard to excellent effect in the arioso of the second act.

Mlle. Emmy Lagrue concluded her "starring" engagement as Norma, having previously won all kinds of golden opinions from all sorts of people—including even some of the disciples of the Future—as Agatha in Der Freischütz. Her rendering of this genuinely German part was a complete triumph. The audience were fairly carried away by her execution of the grand scene "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and of the Cantilena, "Und ob die Wolke," in both of which she was vociferously applauded. Her Norma is a fine performance, considered both in a vocal and dramatic light. Her purity of intonation and facility of execution are perfectly charming and might well serve as a model for younger artists and teach them what is to be effected by a thorough and conscientious study of the rules of classic style. Mlle. Lagrue sings without the slightest effort. And why? Simply because she has learnt to sing—a process too much neglected. I am sorry to say, by many fair artists of the present day, who fancy that all they require is to possess a voice. A man might almost as well imagine himself a Landseer or a Millais, because he had a box of colors and a set of brushes. Mlle. Lagrue was especially happy in the "Casta Diva" and the touching scene with Adalgisa, when the latter confessed her love for the false Roman, as well as in the portrayal of the struggle which agitates the breast of the deceived mother at the sight of her innocent children, calmly sleeping on the couch, and altogether unconscious of the danger to which they are exposed.

An exceedingly interesting performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater was given on Ascension Day, by the Meissner Gesangzirkel. I was particularly struck by the rendering of the introduction, the chorus a capella, and the Inflammatus. The soloists were well selected, and acquitted themselves most creditably, the whole entertainment producing a highly favorable impression on a fashionable and discriminating audience.

From the various musical papers I have picked up the following scraps of intelligence. Mad. Jachmann-Wagner commenced her starring engagement at Dresden as Elizabeth, in Tannhäuser, and Mlle Georgine Schubert, who has been playing a round of characters with great satisfaction to the public, closed hers, a short time since, as Marie in La Fille du Régiment. A fund has been established at Leipzig, for the family of the late Carl Zöllner. Concerts in aid of it have been already given in Dresden, Magdeburg, Chemnitz, Vienna, Dantzig, Strasburg, Liverpool, Ancona, Riga, Bucharest, Hanover, Revel, &c. The following contributions have also been received:—100 thalers from a concert given by the Orpheus Society in Boston, 100 thalers from the German Männergesang-Verein, in Cincinnati; 25 thalers collected by the Germans in the Labati prairie, Texas; 25 thalers from the German residents at Porto Alegre, Brazil; 122 thalers from Lübeck; and 500 thalers from the Liedertafel, in St. Petersburg. At Stuttgart the opera has suffered severely by the loss—for a time at least; let us hope not permanently—of Herr Pischek and Herr Sontheim, the tenor. The former gentleman has had an apoplectic stroke, and the latter became deranged, so as to render it necessary for him to be placed in a lunatic asylum. From Wiesbaden, I learn that the grand festival of the Rhein-Main-Sängerband is fixed for the 15th and 16th of June.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Our Country's Flag forever. G. J. Webb. 25

A spirited patriotic Song, words by Harry Helme, Esq. The composer of the music being well known in this vicinity as a musician of sterling qualities, this song will secure more than passing attention.

Instrumental Music.

Music of the Union. Medley. Charles Grobe. 50

The second edition of this stirring medley which is having a large sale. It contains the melodies of Star Spangled Banner, and Hall Columbia, Red, White and Blue, Washington's March and Yankee Doodle. The arrangement is easy. This new edition is made quite attractive by a splendid allegorical design on the title-page printed in colors, among which those of our flag are duly prominent. Young players could not receive a handsomer present nor one which would be more acceptable.

Fantasia "La Favorite." J. Ascher. 60

Of medium difficulty, being within reach of most players of two years' diligent practice. It is a good teaching piece. No pupil will find it tedious.

St. Petersburg Quadrille. (Illustrated.) D'Albert. 50

A capital Quadrille, introducing some of the most striking original airs of Russia. The title-page is illustrated with the view of a part of St. Petersburg at moonlight, printed in colors.

O it is not while riches. Variations. H. Pond. 35

A pleasing piece for scholars.

Haute Volée Quadrille. J. Strauss. 35

This is not a bogus Strauss of modern make, such Paris harbors some, but the real, original old Strauss. A fine German critic lately said of this "Upper ten" Quadrille, "It sparkles and shines, as it were, with diamonds, pearls, orders, and the eyes of fair duchesses and countesses." It is needless to say that it still reigns supreme in the German ball-rooms.

GUIDE TO MUSICAL COMPOSITION. By Heinrich Wohlfahrt. Transcribed by John S. Dwight. Bound. 75

This little book is intended for those amateurs who have a penchant for composing, without being able to devote their time to a course of instruction in harmony. The author gives the laws of phrasing, or musical construction, lays out the web of modulation, and, in a manner, even teaches to form melodies. A musical person of some practical experience, who has a little of the inventive faculty, will, by the aid of this book, be able to shape his ideas into a satisfactory, finished form. There are many such to whom pretty ideas come plentifully, but who, when trying to put them together and make a musical whole of them, find that they will not connect, or that there is too little or too much of them, in short, that there is something wrong which they are not able to remedy. After studying Wohlfahrt's book they will see clearly where the defect lies, and whence the remedy must come.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

A Woodland Reverie.

Here, on soft leaves where the tall pines have made
A fragrant shade, here let me sit and muse!
The gentle summer breeze bends the tall tops
Of the deep grove; sighing, it wanders by,
Breathes on the leaves, that bow their shining heads
As if in sad reply. Oh, might I hear
Their converse sweet, for sure they speak of heaven!
The loving winds are newly come from thence,
And, to the nymphs prisoned in forest trees,
They're telling of the Heaven they have left;
Then, on they fly, parting with kisses sweet,
Bearing the fragrance of the forest breath
To distant vallies and to heated towns,
And bring to many a hot and fevered brow,
The sweetest memories of bygone days
In the faint perfume of the shady groves
That, from their balmy wings they silent shed.
Sweet memories they stir of golden youth,
When bright in hope and rich in priceless love,
The halcyon days to happiness were given.
And as the breezes fan his throbbing brow,
The sleeper dreams of days, when by the side
Of murmuring brook in such a sylvan shade
He wandered, hand in hand, with her he loved;
He sees again the babbling stream that flowed
And bathed their feet; he sees the mossy rocks
Green with the tribute of a hundred years—
The shining pebbles glancing in the sun
That ever and anon, with blazing ray,
Pierced through the rippling waters and revealed
The glittering treasures of the mountain stream
Deep glimmering in their sandy bed, like gold;
He hears again the murmuring of the breeze
That stirred the trembling branches o'er their heads;
High on the stately birch he hears the tap
Of laboring woodpecker. Again, he plucks
The crimson berries growing on the bank
Bedded in shining leaves of deepest green,
And twines, with loving hand a glowing wreath
And binds it on the brow of her he loves;—
Again he gazes in her heaven-blue eyes—
Again he fondly clasps her to his breast
Again he feels her loving, glowing kiss
Pressed on his lips as in those happy days!
Oh! blessed dreams of days forever gone
Oh, blessed winds of heaven! that bring such joy,
To the poor broken heart that for long years,
Steeped to the lips in grief and fierce despair
No more believes the faith of happy youth
Nor trusts in human love, nor long has known
By day or night, one single happy hour.
Blow on fair winds, and on such bleeding souls
Pour the soft balm that on your wings ye bear!
Flow on, sweet brook, till in the mighty sea,
Far from their mountain source your waters pour
Their sparkling tribute!

The winds are hushed; the birds have sought their rest;

The woods are silent, save the whip-poor-will,
Who ever chants, with mournful plaintive tone,
Her dismal cry, waking the forest lone;
The cricket's chirp is heard and feeble voice
Of dying insect that has lived its day;
The darkening hills return the lowing soft
Of sweet breathed kine that seek their distant homes,
And faintly now the tinkling bells are heard,
As slow they wind along the mountain slope,
Oft stopping in the flowing brook to drink

And lingering stand amid the cooling stream.
The day is dead! Night, like a widowed Queen
With sombre veil and diadem of stars,
Comes slowly on, shading the woods in gloom:
The evening dews are moist upon the leaves,
I will begone, and o'er the crackling boughs
That strew the forest path will take my way
And seek the village slumbering in the vale,
Bearing this birchen scroll, whereon is writ
My Woodland Reverie.

Opera and Theatre in Venice.

IN THE TIME OF LOUIS XIV.

PARIS. June 10, 1861.

A friend picked up lately on the quays, a venerable looking volume, entitled "La Ville et Republique de Venise, par Alexandre Touissant de Limojon, Sieur de Saint Disdier." Printed at Paris, by Royal privilege, A.D., 1680. It is very interesting as giving an account of the origin of the Republic, the form of government and the manners, habits and costume of the Venetians, in the magnificent and corrupt age of Louis XIV. I have translated two chapters thereof, upon the Opera and Theatre, which I think will interest the readers of the Journal—particularly as coming from an eye-witness of all that was passing in that splendid old sea-shell of a city. Somehow, the description seems to let us right into the heart of those old times—when Venice still held the name of Republic. Yours truly, C. P. C.

OF THE OPERA.

It is to Venice that we owe the invention of the Opera. But though formerly there have been some operas of singular beauty, we may say nevertheless, that Paris at this present time surpasses all that has been seen at Venice. One has difficulty in believing at first, that the French language can accommodate itself to the recitatives in music, which seem so natural in Italian. In a word, if a man as skillful as he who has given himself to this branch, (Lully) and as profound in all the beauties of Italian music, as he is in the delicacies of the French, had not applied himself with all necessary care, to make an agreeable compound of two manners of singing so different, we may believe, that this noble and magnificent amusement would not have met with all the success it has had at the Court, and in the city.

At Venice they play several operas at once. The theatres are large and magnificent, the decorations superb and well diversified, but very badly lighted; the machinery is sometimes tolerable and sometimes ridiculous. The number of actors there is always very large, and they are richly dressed; but their acting is for the most part disagreeable. The pieces are long, and yet they would not fail to divert during the four hours that they last, if they were composed by better poets, who should know the rules of the theatre better than their compositions testify; the which do not often merit the expense of representing them. One sees these entrées of Ballets, between the acts, so miserable, that it would be better to have none at all. One would say, to see these folks dance, that they were shod with lead, and yet they receive the applause of the whole assembly, because they have never seen anything better.

The beauty of the voices atones for the defects of which I have spoken. Those men without beards have argentine voices, which fill admirably the large theatre. They choose besides the best female singers in all Italy, and do not grudge 400 pistoles, and the expenses of the journey, to bring from Rome and elsewhere, a girl of reputation, although the opera lasts only during the carnival. The airs are languishing and touching, and through the whole compositions are mingled several very agreeable chansonnettes, which awake the attention. The Symphony is not much, inspiring melancholy rather than gaiety. It is composed of Lutes, Theorboes and Clavecons, which accompany the voices with an admirable precision.

If the French have difficulty in understanding well the words, the Italians and all the strangers have still more difficulty in France, where they sing more softly and pronounce less distinctly. The grand chorus of music, which fills so often the whole French theatre, and of which one can scarce distinguish the words, shocks the Italians, who say that this suits better the church than the opera. The great number of violins, which efface, when they play, all the other instruments of the Symphony, can only please the French, they say, except when they play all alone on other occasions. And although in France they succeed perfectly in the dance, yet, (say they), they put so much of it into the opera, that it often forms the greater part of it. The matter of the composition is too short for the taste of the Italians, who do not find, moreover, enough intrigue in our opera pieces. The intrigue of their pieces is always conducted by the character of an old woman, who gives good advice to the young ones, and who becoming amorous herself, generally says very pleasant things.

Those who compose the music of the opera, endeavor to end the scenes of the principal actors, with airs which charm and elevate, in order to draw the applause of the whole theatre. This succeeds so well, that one hears the benissimo from a thousand voices at once. But nothing is more singular than the pleasant benedictions and ridiculous requests, which the Gondoliers, who are in the parterre, address to clever female singers. At the end of all their scenes they cry as loud as they can Sias tu benedetta! benedetta il padre che te generò! But these exclamations are not always clothed in modest terms. These low fellows say with impunity whatever they please—sure of making the whole assembly laugh, rather than displeasing it.

There are seen gentlemen so transported, so beside themselves by the vocal charms of the girls, that they cry aloud from their boxes, lean-out of them, ah cara! mi butto—mi butto! meaning that they are ready to throw themselves over, in the transports of pleasure caused by these divine voices. For the rest, I ought to say, that the priests do not scruple to appear on the stage, taking all sorts of characters, since that is practised at Rome. On the contrary the quality of good actors lends them a sort of virtue. One day one of the spectators recognizing a priest under the dress of an old woman, cried aloud, Ecco Pre Piero, chi fa la vecchia! Yet all things pass at the opera with much more harmony than at the theatre, because one naturally loves the music, and more respectable people go there. Also they pay at the door four livres, and two livres in the parterre for the chair, which makes 46 sols of France, without counting the opera book, and the little pain de bougie (a roll or book) which all the spectators buy, for without that, even the native would have difficulty in knowing the story and following the piece.

The gentlewomen frequent the opera more than the theatre, because the former amusement is much more respectable than the latter. One sees a great number of them towards the end of the carnival; and as it is permitted them at that time to adorn themselves with their precious stones, they appear all brilliant in the light of the candles, which they have in their boxes, and by this means their lovers gaze at them at their ease, and they on their side cause them to know by signs that they will know the assiduity of their services.

As soon as there appears at Venice a new girl to sing in opera, the principal nobles make it a point of honor, to possess themselves of her, if she sings well; and they spare nothing to accomplish their end. A Cornaro disputes for her with a Duke of Mantua, and at last she is carried off by the one who makes the richest presents, even though the charms of her voice should not be accompanied by those of beauty.

The partisans of those admirable singers cause to be printed quantities of sonnets in their praise, and amidst the acclamation their singing draws forth, they scatter them by thousands from the upper gallery; and fill the boxes and parterre with them.

OF THE THEATRE.

The Play (Comedie) is only acted at Venice during the Carnival. But it begins sometimes towards the end of October or of November, and one often sees three different troupes of players, some worse than the others. The theatres where they perform, belong, as well as those of the opera, to the noble Venetians, who derive a great revenue from the boxes, which they let, some for the whole carnival, others by the day. The players have no other profit, than what they take at the door, which does not amount to more than five sols a head.

Most of the people go in masks to the play as to the opera, in order to enjoy greater freedom. They ordinarily wear only a country cloak and a bahute upon the head, which is a little domino of black silk, leaving only the eyes and nose uncovered, over which they wear, if they choose, a half mask, very neatly made of a small white waxed cloth. Those who with this disguise, put on the Venetian vest, are considered real nobles. But the nobles do not wear masks at the opera, nor at the theatre, unless it be some who cannot otherwise approach near to their mistresses, nor enjoy tranquilly a view of them, without causing trouble.

The young nobles go less to the theatre to laugh at the buffoonery of the players, than to play a part themselves. They often take courtesans into the boxes, where they make such a noise, and do acts so surprising, and so in violation of the decorum which should be at least observed in public, that one must have seen such things, to believe them. One of their most ordinary pastimes is not only to spit into the parterre, but to hurl down candle-wicks; and if they see any one neatly dressed, or a hat with a bouquet of feathers, it is there they take their aim, for they may do it with impunity. The nobles, who are protectors of the theatre, having Bravi at the door, masked and armed and devoted to them—and besides, the theatre and opera being privileged places, where the least violence is a crime of state.

The license which those in the parterre allow themselves, in imitation of the nobility, complete the disorder. The gondoliers chiefly, give impertinent applause to certain actions of the buffoons, which would not be tolerated elsewhere. And the whole theatre raises so often such a terrible hallooing at the actors who don't please them, that they are obliged to withdraw, to give place to those who will cause laughter—amid the incessant cries of fuora buffoni. The gentlemen find that so good, that they make themselves of the party; and if it is asked why they are so well behaved in the grand Ridotti (gaming house kept by the nobles) where they go to gamble, and are so foolish at the theatre, it is replied that there the only business is the gaining or losing of money, and that they come here only to divert themselves, where being masters, they do just as they please.

Nothing can equal the noise made, when after a piece which has pleased the assembly, or to speak more properly, the gondoliers, they announce the piece for the next day. For without wishing to hear anything, these low fellows cry so loudly questa, questa!—the piece just played, that they are obliged to obey them. So that one oftenest carries away from these wretched comedies, only the dissatisfaction of having put off one's supper till 9 or 10 o'clock. Yet there are given sometimes serious pieces, all in verse, and which they call opera, and which succeeded very well. And sometimes they play some pieces which the Inquisition would not suffer outside the Venetian state, as that of Dom Gilles, who in the dress of a monk, preaches against the debauchery to which he abandons himself. But it is not surprising that no fault is found with it, since even the nobles allow themselves to play on the stage, in the character of Pantalon; which is a true copy, in dress, action and words, of what they do every day.

The Organ.*

FOURTEENTH STUDY.—OF THE FOUNDATION STOPS OR REGISTERS.

The foundation stops or fundamental open-flue pipes were the first stops, and will be the last, used in the construction of the organ. They are all tuned to the pitch of one of their own class, which is an open four-feet pipe of metal called the principal. The pitch to which their scale is tuned determines the pitch of the rest of the organ, and hitherto this pitch has been on an average as much as a tone below the pitch of the orchestra and pianoforte. These open-flue pipes might with propriety be called also flageolets, were it not that this word conveys to the mind idea of an instrument of a very limited size only. For, in a matter of fact, these open pipes are nothing more than flageolets of various sizes turned upside down on the sound-board of the organ, and there supplied with wind from the capacious lungs of the bellows. Of these open pipes, however, all are not for the reason only foundation stops, but only such of them as have their lowest note tuned in unison or in octave with the foundation note of the organ. Then, the lowest note of which is tuned a third, a fifth, a fifteenth and the like, are therefore not foundation stops, though they are open pipes.

Although all the open-flue pipes may be called soft stops as regards the quality of their tone, yet it must not be supposed that they are all alike as regards the quality of their tone, yet it must not be supposed that they are all alike as regards the degree of their softness. On the contrary, they may be very distinctly divided according to their scale, into soft stops of a round and full quality, and soft stops of a thin and delicate quality. When the soft foundation stops of a thin quality are used alone, the organ may be said to have lost its half of the power at least, and may be compared to a garment which has been stripped of a thick inner-lining; but when those of both qualities are used together, the organ speaks at its full foundation tone. The thinness of the finer or delicate quality disappears in the roundness of the fuller quality, and the latter, which would be especially wan by itself, at least in a great number of the registers, gains by being united with the finer quality a richness and brilliancy of tone, which is quite equal to that of the most vigorous instruments.

The great advantage of the foundation stops is that they can be combined with all the other stops of the organ without doing more than sweeten their tone by giving them that velvety quality, which is just what they want in addition to their own. Substitute for them, no matter which of the other two divisions, either of the loud or mutation stops, that is, and the organ tone becomes harsh and brazen, of a quality which grates painfully on the ear and nerves of the hearer without reaching his heart. In this way a complete rupture would certainly be made between the organ and the traditions of the first builders. They could, undoubtedly, have made the instrument to consist wholly of noisy and metallic qualities of sound, had they so pleased, but they very wisely preferred, as it seems to us, to lay its foundation in a quality of tone, which is both rich and profound at the same time.

There is also this marked difference between the foundation stops of the organ, that they alone can be used independently, and do not require help from the other stops, while all the rest would undoubtedly commit an act of imprudence, if they attempted to launch forth their mighty voice, and make our churches re-echo with their sounds, without supporting themselves on the broad and outspread wings of the foundation stops.

All these advantages together have, no doubt, been the reason why the open-flue pipes have been called the foundation stops of the organ. There is no organ which can possibly do without them, and there is no church, of the largest or smallest dimensions, to which they are not suited. In a vast temple their noble harmonies sail around its spacious aisles with a freedom, and elasticity, and a tenderness which are truly admirable; in a small sanctuary they make up by their sweetness and mellowness for a certain amount of hardness of quality and want of roundness, which the more noisy stops of an organ always have in a place which from its limited dimensions has but little resonance.

The foundation stops of the organ are moreover never out of place in any part of the divine office. The author resides far away from Paris on the eastern frontiers of France, not far from the banks of the Rhine, and he can assure his readers in Paris that, on these harmonious banks, he has been in the habit of hearing the organ speak with wonderful effect by its foundation stops alone; and that, in the hands of players who are not by any means the best specimens of German organists, he has heard it so speak even and more especially at those solemn moments when the generality of organists, both French and Spanish, believe that a flourish of trumpets and a noisy uproar are absolutely necessary for the sake of variety. But noise is not so necessary, as some seem to think, to express the holy joy of the divine offices. There is, moreover, in the foundation stops a certain keen and soul-stirring note, which takes as near as possible the same place in the music of the church that a solo on the violoncello, or even on the violin, takes in that of the orchestra. In such cases, neither the violin nor the violoncello can for one moment be accused of want of energy; and yet how far are they, for all that from the power and vigor of even the smallest trumpet stops. But it is, above all, the tender and I would even dare to say the loving, expression of the two principal parts of the holy sacrifice that is more especially got from the foundation stops. At almost whatever degree of power we seek for their effects, and however refined or feeble, owing to its extreme softness, this degree may be, we still find a something in it, when borrowed from the foundation stops, which is pre-eminently suited both to the time and to the place. The Germans are more thoroughly convinced of this than the French, but they push their conviction perhaps a little too far when they make use only of sounds of the most extreme thinness at these more solemn moments. They do this with the view of gaining for them the greatest possible expressions of respect and reverence, and these extremely thin sounds do certainly have the effect of a very distant and mysterious music, but at the same time they attempt too much and so defeat their object, because the sounds they make use of to produce this effect, inasmuch as they act too powerfully on the imagination of the worshippers, are found rather to be a cause of distraction, than an aid to devotion.

* From L'Orgue, sa Connaissance, son Administration, et son Jeu, by Joseph Regnier.

The Origin of Yankee Doodle.

MR. LOSSING'S HISTORICAL ACCOUNT.

Mr. Benson J. Lossing writes to the Poughkeepsie (N. Y.) Eagle:

Permit me to correct an error in your paper of this morning. You quote a verse of a poem commencing—

"Once on a time old Johnny Bull," to show the correct metre of Yankee Doodle, and speak of it as the "original song." This is an error. The poem from which you quote was written by George P. Morris a few years ago, and is entitled "The Origin of Yankee Doodle." It was written for and sung by the Hutchinson Family. You will find it in the latest edition of Morris's Poems.

The original song of "Yankee Doodle," if we trace it to its germ, has considerable antiquity. The tune was known as early as the tune of Charles the First, when a nursery song had these words:

"Lucy Locket lost her pocket,
Kitty Fisher found it;
Not a bit of money in it,
Only blinding 'round it."

In the time of the Roundheads—the period of Cromwell's Protectorate—when Italian fashions being introduced into England, were ridiculed by the satirists and preached against by the Puritan clergy, we find the following verse to the same tune. Here we have "Yankee Doodle" in name for the first time:

"Yankee Doodle came to town
Upon a Kentish pony;
He stuck a feather in his hat,
And called him Macaroni."

Macaroni, at that time, signified a dandy with Italian fashions. Some have supposed that it was written by a royalist to satirize Cromwell, who wore a "feather in his hat."

The "original song," so far as Americans are concerned, was written, it is supposed, in the spring of 1775, after the skirmishes at Lexington and Concord. I subjoin a copy, as printed by Isaiah Thomas, author of the "History of Printing in 1813. It is called

THE YANKEE'S RETURN FROM CAMP.

Father and I went down to camp,
Along with Captain Gooding.
And there we met the men and boys
As thick as hasty pudding.

Chorus.—Yankee Doodle keep it up,
Yankee Doodle, dandy,
Mind the mu to and the step,
And with the girls be handy.

And there we see a thousand men
As rich as Squire David;
And what they wanted every day,
I wish it could be saved.

The 'lasses they eat every day,
Would keep our house a winter;
They have as much that I'll be bound,
They eat it when they're mind ter.

And there we see a swamping gun,
Large as a log of maple,
Upon a deuced little cart,
A load for fathers cattle.

And every they shoot it off.
It takes a horn of powder,
And makes a noise like father's gun
Only a nation louder.

I went as nigh to one myself
As Siah's underpinning;
As father went as nigh again—
I thought the deuce was in him.

Cousin Simeon grew so bold
I thought he would have coked it;
It scared me so I shrink't it off
And hung by father's pocket.

And Captain Davis had a gun,
He kind of clapt his hand on't,
And stuck a crook'd stabbing iron
Upon the little end on't.

And there I see a pumpkin shall
As big as mother's basin;
And every time they touched it off
They scampered like the nation.

I see a little barrel, too,
The heads were made of leather,
They knock'd upon it with little clubs,
And called the folks together.

And there was Captain Washington,
And gentle folks about him;
They say he's grown so tarmal proud
He will not ride without 'em

He got him in his meetin' clothes
Upon a stapping stallion;
He set the world along in rows
In hundreds and in millions.

The flaming ribbons in his hat,
They looked so tearing fine, ah,
I wanted pokily to get
To give to my Jemimah.

I see another smarl of men,
A digging graves, they told me,
So tarmal long, so tarmal deep
They 'tended they should hold me.

It scared me so, I hook'd it off
Nor stopped, as I remember,
Nor turned about 'till I got home,
Lock'd up in mother's chamber

In Farmer and Moore's "Collections, Historical and Miscellaneous, and Monthly Literary Journal," for April, 1824, I find a new version of this song, with some stanzas not found in the original. They are evidently interpolations. I give a specimen or two:

And then they sife away like fun
And play on cornstalk fiddles,
And some had ribbons, red as blood
All round about their middles.

The troopers, too, would gallop up
And fire right in our faces;
It almost scared me half to death
To see them run such races.

Old Uncle Sam came there to change
Fame pancakes and some onions,
For 'lasses cakes to carry home
To give his wife and young ones.

But I can't tell you half I see
They kept up such a snother;
So I took my hat off—made a bow,
And scampered home to mother.

A little while before the battle of Lexington, the British (who had used the tune as one of their military airs at Castle William, in Boston Harbor, as early as 1768,) had a song in reference to the Americans near Boston, who were secretly procuring arms in the city, then occupied by loyal troops. The following verse is preserved:

"Yankee Doodle came to town
For to buy a fire-lock;
We will tar and feather 'em,
And so we will John Hancock."

A writer in the New York Evening Post, a few ago, claimed for the Dutch the origin of "Yankee Doodle." He said that the harvest laborers who, in summer, migrate from Germany to the low countries, of Holland, where they receive as much buttermilk as they can drink, and a tenth of the grain secured by their exertions, had a song with the following chorus:

"Yanker didel doodle down
Didel, dudel lantier,
Yanke, viver voover voun,
Botermilk and Tautheer."

This account is apochrypal, to say the least, for the words in the above verse are neither German, Dutch, nor any other known language on the face of the earth.

Our "southern brethren," who have a decidedly ugly way, at the present time, of showing their brotherhood, and whose "first families," according to their toasted and admired correspondent of the London Times, say, "If we could only get one the royal race of England to rule over us, we should be contented," a sentiment "varied a hundred ways," repeated to him "over and over again," and who "regret the strange result and consequences" of the old war for independence, have naturally discarded "Yankee Doodle." South Carolina by legislative enactment last winter, forbade the future celebration of the Fourth of July and the use of "Yankee Doodle," "Hail Columbia," and "Star Spangled Banner;" and soon afterward the poet Laureate, we presume, of the "Southern Confederacy" (for the British government they so much long for pensions a poet laureate) put forth the following:

FAREWELL TO YANKEE DOODLE.

Yankee Doodle, fare you well,
Rice and cotton float you;
Once they liked you very well,
But now they'll do without you.

Yankee Doodle used to treat
Old Pompey as a neighbor;
He didn't grab his bread and meat,
Nor devil at his labor.

But Doodle now has got so keen,
For every dirty shilling;
Propose a job, however mean,
And Yankee Doodle's willing.

Doodle, too, has had the luck
To get a new religion;
A kind of holy seal to pluck
At everybody's pigeon.

Doodle's morbid conscience strains,
With Puritanic vigor
Too loose the only friendly chains
That ever bound a nigger.

Yet, Doodle knows as well as I,
That when he's come and freed 'em,
He'd see a million niggers die,
Before he'd help to feed 'em.

Yankee Doodle sent us down
A gallant missionary;
His name was Captain Johnny Brown,
The Priest of Harper's Ferry.

With pikes he tried to magnify
The Gospel creed of Beecher;
But Old Virginia lifted high
This military preacher.

Yet, glory to his name is sung,
As if with sin untainted;
The bloody wretch by justice hung,
By bigotry is sainted.

Yankee Doodle, now good bye
We spurn a thing so rotten,
Proud independence is the cry
Of sugar, rice and cotton.

Atlanta, Georgia, February 18, 1861.

We would humbly advise our southern brethren, when they sing the "Farewell," to hum, in alto voice, sufficiently clear for the ear of their northern brethren, something like the following:

King Cotton was a monarch bold,
Till regicidal treason
With promises of untold gold
Deprived us of our reason.

King Cotton now without the aid
Of England, France or Prussia,
Spain, Portugal or Belgium,
Or self-releasing Russia,

Is grow'ing weak in every limb,
And trembles like a woodie,
And we had better make our peace
With angry Yankee Doodle.

The memory of these half-penitent words may serve to mitigate the "ferocity of the northern Goths and Vandals," when those who have hidden "Farewell to Yankee Doodle," shall, as Prentice says, be standing where there will be an impending Crisis and no Helper." B. J. L.

Managers and Music Halls.

"When they do agree on the stage, their unanimity is wonderful."

The managers of the London theatres have lately gathered together in a body, and have offered to the observation of the public a practical commentary on Sheridan's admirable text. On this occasion, the motive for unanimous agreement among these gentlemen has been furnished by a certain entertainment at the Canterbury Music-Hall, London, which bears a suspiciously close resemblance to the representation of a pantomime. Any performance of this sort—if it takes place out of a theatre—or any performance at all which involves the interchange of dialogue between actors (even when they are only two in number) is viewed by the whole body of the London managers as a dangerous infringement on dramatic rights which they consider to have been acquired exclusively to themselves. They have accordingly come forward to restrain the proprietor of a music hall within the strict letter of the license conceded to him, which is a license for music and dancing only—the plain object of the proceeding being to prevent all proprietors of all music-halls from amusing their audiences by means bearing any dramatic resemblance to those which are habitually employed by managers of theatres.

With the immediate judicial decision pronounced on this case, we have no present concern. It is, we believe, understood on both sides, that no one decision will be allowed to settle the dispute, and that further legal proceedings are already impending. Our purpose in referring to the subject in these pages is to ascertain what the fair interests are in relation to it, not of the managers only, but of the public at large. A very important question of dramatic Free Trade is involved in this dispute; and London audiences—comprising in these railroad times people from all parts of the kingdom—are directly concerned in the turn which may be taken by its final settlement.

A large proportion of our readers may be probably in need of some preliminary explanation on the subject of music-halls, and of the quality of the performances which are exhibited in them. These places of public entertainment may be roughly described as the growth of the last ten years, both in London and in the large towns throughout England. They are, for the most part, spacious rooms, attached to large public-houses, but having special entrance-passages of their own. The prices of admission are generally sixpence for one kind of place, and a shilling for another. Both sexes (except, we believe, at Evans's supper-room in Covent-garden, where men only are admitted) are allowed the right of entry—there are female, as well as male performers at the entertainments—and the audience have the privilege of ordering what they please to eat or drink, and of smoking as well, at any period of the evening's amusements, from their beginning about seven o'clock to their end a little before twelve.

Of the kind of entertainment provided for the public, under these curious conditions, and of the behavior of the audiences during the performance, we can speak, in some degree, from personal experience. Not very long since, we visited one of the largest and most notorious of these places of amusement—Weston's Music Hall, in Holborn—on a night when the attendance happened to be unusually large, and when the resources of the establishment for preserving order were necessarily subjected to the severest possible test.

The size of the Hall may be conjectured, when it is stated that on the night of our visit, the numbers of the audience reached fifteen hundred. With scarcely a dozen exceptions, this large assembly was accommodated with seats on the floor of the building, and in a gallery which ran round three sides of it. The room was brightly lighted tastefully decorated with mural painting, and surprisingly well ventilated, considering that the obstacle of tobacco-smoke was added to the ordinary obstacles interposed by crowded human beings and blazing gas-light to check the circulation of fresh air. At one end of the hall was a highly-raised stage, with theatrical foot-lights, but with no theatrical scenery; and, on this stage (entering from the back) appeared, sometimes singly, sometimes together, the male and female of the night—all, with the exception of the comic singers, in evening dress. It is not easy to describe the variety of the entertainments. There was a clever nigger vocalist with a blackened face, and nimble feet at a jig. There was another comic singer, preserving his natural complexion—a slim inexhaustible man, who accompanied himself (if the expression may be allowed) by a St. Vitus's Dance of incessant jumping, continued throughout his song, until the jumps were counted by the thousand; the performer being as marvellously in possession of his fair mortal allowance of breath at the end of the exhibition as at the beginning. There was instrumental music played by a full band of wind instruments. There was a little orchestra, besides, for accompaniments; there was a young lady who sang "serio-comic" songs; there were ladies and gentlemen who sang sentimental songs; there was a real Chinaman, who tossed real knives about his head and face, and caught them in all sorts of dangerous positions with a frightful dexterity—and who afterwards additionally delighted the audience by thanking them for their applause in the purest "Canton-English." Lastly, there was an operatic selection from the second act of "Lucia di Lammermoor," comprising not solo-singing only, but concerted music and choruses, and executed in a manner which (considering the resources at the disposal of the establishment) conferred the highest credit on the ladies and gentlemen concerned in the performance, and on the musical director who superintended it. These entertainments, and others equally harmless, succeeded each other at the shortest intervals, throughout the evening; the audience refreshing itself the while with all varieties of drinks, and the male part of it smoking also with the supreme comfort and composure. At the most crowded period of the performances not the slightest disorder was apparent in any part of the room. The people were quietly and civilly conducted to their places by clean and attentive waiters; the proprietor was always present overlooking the proceedings. Not a single case of drunkenness appeared anywhere; no riotous voices interrupted the music. The hearty applause which greeted all the entertainments, comic and serious, never degenerated into disturbance of any kind. Many colder audiences might be found in this metropolis—but an assembly more orderly and more decorous than the assembly at the Holborn Music-Hall we have never seen gathered together at any place of public entertainment in any part of London.

Such is our experience of one of these music-halls, which may be taken as a fair sample of the rest. Canterbury Hall, which happens just now to be the special object of prosecution by theatrical managers, is simply another large concert-room, with a raised stage—possessing, however, it is only fair to add, an attraction peculiar to itself, in the shape of a gallery of pictures. In other respects, it may be at once conceded that if portions of the performances at Canterbury Hall represent an infringement on assumed theatrical privileges, portions of the performance at the Holborn Hall fall within the same category. The pantomime entertainment at one place may be, to all technical intents and purpose, matched by the operatic entertainment at the other. Both are exhibited on a stage; both are illuminated by foot-lights; both involve the interchange of dramatic dialogue—spoken in one case sung in the other. If the managers of our two operas contemplate asserting their interests, as the managers of the other theatres have done, the performance from Lucia di Lammermoor, in Holborn, is as open to attack as the performance of pantomime which is the subject of complaint against Canterbury Hall. With scenery or without it, with costume or without it, the grand dramatic situation in Donizetti's opera, interpreted by solo singers, chorus, and orchestra, is a dramatic performance, and carries the vocalists as well as the audience away with it. Our own ears informed us, on the evening of our experience, that Edgardo delivered his famous curse in trousers, as vigorously as if he had worn the boots of the period. The Lucia of the night could not have sung the lovely music of her part with greater earnestness and emphasis, if her father's halls had opened behind her, in immeasurable vista, on a piece of painted canvas—and Colonel Ashton was as pitiless a gentleman in an unimpeachable dress-coat, as if he had worn the most outrageous parody on Highland costume which the stage wardrobes of operatic France or Italy could produce. If it simplifies the question now at issue—and it does surely, so far as the public discussion of the subject is concerned!—to confess at once that some of the entertainments at music-halls do in some degree trench on the ground already occupied by entertainments at theatres, we make the acknowledgement without hesitation. Legal quibbling apart, the resemblance complained of, does partially exist; and is, in the present state of the laws which regulate such matters, open to attack. Granting all this, however, one plain inquiry, so far as the public are concerned, still remains to be answered: Are the managers morally justified in claiming for themselves a monopoly in dramatic entertainment, and in proceeding against the proprietors of music-halls accordingly?

In their present situation, as we understand it, the managers have two grievances which they all complain of alike. The first of those grievances is, that theatres and music-halls are not impartially submitted to the same conditions of State and control. The theatres are under the direction of the Lord Chamberlain; the music-halls are under the direction of an act of Parliament of George the Second, and the licensing magistrates. The Lord Chamberlain, acting as the official victim of old precedents, shuts up the theatres under his jurisdiction in Passion Week; and arbitrarily throws out of employment for that period, not the actors only, but the thousands of poor people who live by ministering to the obscure necessities of the stage. On the other hand, the licensing magistrates, having no old precedents to fetter them, allow the music-halls to open their doors as freely in Passion Week as at any other time—the practical result being, that musical and dramatic performances, with smoking and drinking, are officially permitted, at exactly that period of the year when musical and dramatic performances without smoking or drinking, are officially prohibited. The absurdity and justice of this proceeding are too manifest for comment. If it is wrong to allow any public amusements in Passion Week, shut the music-halls—if it is right, open the theatres. So far is this really serious grievance is concerned, our sympathies are heartily with the managers. Instead of gaining any advantage by being placed under the courtly authority of the Lord Chamberlain, they are actually oppressed, in this particular, by a gross injustice; and they deserve all the help we can give them in subjecting that injustice to public exposure and public attack.

But the second grievance—which these gentlemen are now endeavoring to assert—the grievance which practically declares that they object to all dramatic competition, out of their own especial circle, is so preposterous in itself, and is so utterly opposed to the public spirit of the time, that we reject all belief in it, on grounds of the plainest common sense. The great social law of this age and this nation, is the law of competition. Why are managers of theatres not to submit to it, as well as other people? Some of these gentlemen, in all probability, occasionally see a penny daily paper. What would they have thought, if the proprietors of the Times, of the Daily News, and of the other morning journals previously established, and selling at a higher price, had all met together, on the starting of penny papers, and had claimed protection from the public authorities, on the ground that cheap competition in the matter of purveying daily intelligence was an attack on their personal interests? Why, the very pastry-cooks, who once had the monopoly of sixpenny ices, knew better than to make a public outcry on the establishment of the penny ice-shops! Nay, the predecessors of the managers themselves, not only recognized but asserted the privilege of free competition in a free country. Whose voices were raised loudest against dramatic monopoly, in the time of the two patent theatres? The voices of the proprietors of minor theatres, who then occupied a position which the music-halls now occupy towards all the theatres in London. Here is the elder generation of managers shout, on one side, for Free Trade—and there is the younger generation petitioning, on the other, for Protection! Was there ever such an anomaly? Who is to justify or explain it?

If there had been no other and better reason to restrain the managers from coming forward to assert an obsolete protectionist principle (under cover of asserting a strict interpretation of the law), surely the consideration of mere expediency might well have hindered them. We know that these gentlemen are acting on a strong conviction, however lamentably mistaken they may be. But the public has no time to draw fine distinctions: what will the public think of the attempted suppression of the pantomimic entertainment, in Canterbury Hall, at the suit of the London managers? Will it not be said: "Here are several eminent gentlemen, occupying the highest places in their profession, and administering the resources of our greatest theatrical establishments, all incomprehensibly jealous of the performances of a tavern concert-room!" Such an imputation would, no doubt, be justly repudiated by the managers; but what plain inference is the world outside the green-room to draw from facts as they stand at present? Perhaps there is one other legitimate conclusion, which has certainly occurred to ourselves, and which the report of the trial in the newspaper may justify. When we saw the deservedly respected name of Mr. Benjamin Webster—who has done more (at the New Adelphi Theatre) to promote the public convenience than any other manager of his time—set up as the name of the plaintiff in a case which had for its ultimate object an interference with the public amusement, we certainly did consider that the spectacle of the wrong man in the wrong place had been somewhat inconsiderately offered to popular contemplation. And, let it be added, we were only the more confirmed in this view, when we remembered that the manager who had been selected to express, on behalf of his brethren, a deep-seated distrust of the rivalry of music-halls, was also the very manager whose theatre has been literally besieged by the public for the last hundred and fifty nights, and is likely to be besieged in the future for a hundred and fifty more. Surely it was a grave error to choose such a prosperous proprietor as Mr. Webster—a man who has shown a determination to advance with the time—to point the protectionist moral and adorn the managerial tale!

To speak seriously, in conclusion, the managers have taken a false step. They have placed themselves in a persecuting as well as a prosecuting position; and they are most unwisely attempting to dispute a principle which the public opinion of the age has long since regarded as settled. We earnestly recommend them to reconsider their course of action—in their own interests. The hostile point of view from which they now regard the music-halls is short-sighted in the extreme. To return to our previous illustration. It is notorious that the cheap newspapers, instead of disputing the public encouragement with the newspapers at a higher price, have raised up an audience for themselves. It is notorious that the library circulation of good novels has rather increased than diminished, since the time when opposition novels have stirred the waters in the world of fiction, by pouring regularly from the press in cheap instalments at a penny a week. On the same principle, the music-halls have unquestionably raised up their new public; and, in doing so, will indirectly help to improve the prospects of the theatres, by increasing the number of people who look to public amusements as the occupation of their evening. If the managers don't see this—if they don't see that a percentage of the music-hall audience (not a very large one probably, but still a percentage) is, in the ordinary course of things, certain to drift into theatres from a natural human love of change—they must at least admit that they already possess, in undisturbed monopoly, immense dramatic advantages over those other caterers for the public amusement, who are following them at a respectful distance. They have the use of stage means and appliances which no music-hall can possibly command, without being knocked down and built up again for the purpose. They have actors and actresses who stand, in a personal as well as in a pecuniary sense, out of music-hall reach. They have relations with English literature which no music-hall possesses, or dreams of possessing; and they have a refined, intelligent, and wealthy public to appeal to, from which the music-halls are separated by the great social gulf which we all know there is no crossing. Here, without prosecutions, disputes, and vexatiously strict interpretations of the letter of the law, is vantage-ground enough for any theatre which is properly administered; vantage-ground which the fiercest music-hall rivalry cannot cut away.

As for the public interest in this question, the discussion of which we have modestly left to the last, the direction that it takes is so obvious as hardly to need pointing out. The more competition there is, the more certainly the public will be the gainers. Let the spur of the music-halls—if any such spur there be—stimulate the theatres to higher and higher exertions by all manner of means; the drama will be the better for it; the actors will study their art the more for it; the audiences will be the larger for it; the managers will be the richer for it. The success of The Colleen Bawn, at the Adelphi; the success of that excellent artist, Mr. Fechter, at the Princess; and the success of the admirable pantomime at Drury Lane; all three achieved in the same theatrical year, are facts to form an opinion on; facts which justify the conclusion that a great dramatic attraction is as much above all small rivalries in our day, as ever it was in that golden theatrical age when music-halls were not heard of in the land! We trust the managers may yet be induced to reconsider the motives on which they have too hastily acted. We trust they may yet see that it is their interest, as we are sure it is always their inclination, to follow the old proverbial rule which enjoins us all to Live and let live.—All the Year Round.

The Development of the Musical Facilities.

PLAYING ON THE PIANO.

After singing, the command of the pianoforte is our most essential qualification, and among us is so considered. The piano is the only instrument, excepting the scarcely accessible organ, on which melody and harmony, and the rich web of combined and simultaneous voices or parts, can be produced with accuracy and almost unlimited magnificence of effect. It is also highly adapted to accompanying song, and to conducting. From these advantages it has happened, that for this single instrument more masterpieces have been written, since the time of Seb. Bach up to Beethoven, than for all other instruments put together. Most songs have been composed with accompaniment for that instrument—organ parts can be transferred without any change—and whatever quartet and orchestral music found favor with the public, was immediately presented to pianoforte players in the form of arrangements, &c. Therefore, no branch of practice can promise so rich a harvest as piano playing; and it must be acknowledged, that, without so abundant a field, any extended acquaintance with our musical literature would be scarcely possible to the world in general. To the composer this instrument is nearly indispensable, partly on the foregoing grounds, and partly because no other is so appropriate, both for exercising and exciting his own imagination and for proving the effect of many-part compositions. It is equally important to the conductor and to the singing master. Even its defects are advantages to musical education, and particularly to the composer. The pianoforte is greatly inferior to bowed and wind instruments in inward feeling and power of tone or quality of sound, in the power of sustaining a tone in equality of force, in crescendo or in diminuendo, in melting two or more tones into each other, and in gliding imperceptibly from the one to the other, all which so admirably succeeds on bowed instruments. The piano does not fully satisfy the ear: its performance, compared to that of bowed and wind instruments, is in a manner colorless, and its effect, in comparison with the resplendence of an orchestra, is as a drawing to a painting. But exactly on this account the piano moves more powerfully the creative faculty of both player and hearer; for it requires their assistance to complete and color, to give full significance to that which is but spiritually indicated. Thus imagination fosters the new idea, and penetrates therewith to our hearts; while other instruments immediately seize, and move, and satisfy the senses, and by their means attack the feeling more powerfully, perhaps, in a sensuous direction, but not so fruitfully in the soul. This is probably the chief reason why the piano has become the especial instrument for spiritually musical education, and particularly for composition; since other instruments easily overcome their votaries, whom they seduce into their own instrumental peculiarities, and create a one-sided mannerism in their productions.

For the earliest instruction, also, the piano has the advantage (good tuning being supposed) of presenting to the pupil correct tones, and a clear insight into the tonic system by the key-board.

But just from this point arises the important quality of the instrument, which may be perilous to all the real advantages derived from it, unless it be sedulously counteracted; and this, we must confess, is at present but little thought of—nay, indeed, that dangerous quality is speculated on, and an entirely false system of education is built on it for outward show, through whose apparent advantages even the true artistic education is represented in a false light, as ignorant and baneful. Since the pianoforte has its fixed tones provided, it is easier to play upon this instrument than upon any other, without any internal feeling of correctness of tone, or even without hearing, and to arrive at a certain degree of mechanical dexterity. How often do we meet ready piano players, who, from want of a cultivated feeling of tone, are incapable of singing a correct succession of tones, or of imagining it, who have no clear notion of what they are playing—nay, who in reality hear nothing correctly! How many bravura players might one name, to whom the artistic meaning of a simple movement remains a sealed book, and who therefore perform the greatest and the least compositions, with assumption and vanity indeed, but without inward participation—without awakening joy in themselves or in their audience, but merely a fruitless astonishment at their technical cleverness! And how deep has this perversion of art into dead mechanism penetrated into artistic life! Whoever has an opportunity of observing many students of music and their teachers, cannot conceal from himself that at present, particularly in large towns devoted to vanity and fashion, the greater part of the pianoforte students are in this manner led astray; and that a great part of the teachers are themselves ignorant of the right path, or otherwise have not the courage to oppose the stream of fashion, or the allurement of example and personal advantage.

If however, satisfactory instruction is not to be expected from all masters, nor every student is to hope for the choice of a good master, there remains still a tolerably sure method of guarding against this wide-spread evil. It consists in rigidly examining the work, which is exacted from the pupil, in the pupil himself and his parents or preceptor insisting absolutely that the teacher shall furnish really profitable work; or, if that cannot be secured with certainty, in seeking immediately another teacher more trustworthy to his art.

We have already said that the pianoforte possesses an extremely voluminous literature, partly written expressly for it, and partly adaptations from other works foreign to it. What can be more natural or more enlightening than to make these works the chief means of instruction, their complete possession being one of the objects of pursuit. For this end, technical readiness, finger exercises, and studies are required. But these are manifestly only means to an end; and as certainly as their use ought not to be delayed, so certainly also they ought to be set aside when the required dexterity has been gained, and the principal difficulties overcome; or else, from a want of methodical arrangement, exercises may be prolonged without end. We cannot conceal from ourselves that in these latter times this error has been stretched to excess, and has overwhelmed us with countless studies, &c. Every respectable teacher, every distinguished amateur, considers himself bound to present the world with some dozens of studies, from which a few particular artistic forms of fingering are to be acquired. And since the composition of a well-sounding study exacts nothing but the occurrence of an idea to be worked in the ordinary routine of composition; since, moreover, a little burst of enthusiasm is highly thought of in these matters; and, further, since the brilliant playing of the author, or the reputation of his master, renders him tolerably sure of his public, we can never tell when this composition and spread of studies will come to an end: neither, indeed, can we imagine how the pupil shall find time to labor through the most respectable of them only; to say nothing of the real works of art themselves, for whose sake alone the whole drudgery has been endured.

Let the non-musical inquirer consider the foregoing as a token of good and bad instruction in the question before us.

Sebastian Bach and Handel, Joseph Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—these are the artists to whom we owe the greatest and the most numerous works of art for the pianoforte. Among these, Bach and Beethoven stand forward, the one in elder, the other in our own times, as those who have reached the highest eminence. After them, Emanuel Bach, Clementi, Dussek, Karl Maria von Weber, Hummel, and many more may be named. We abstain from giving a more numerous list, particularly of those still living, as it is not the province of this work to pass judgment upon individuals. Upon the highest, the vast preponderance in estimation of the five first named artists, there is not the slightest question among those who have the least tincture of art. The one may indeed be compared with the other, but the high pre-eminence of all is unquestioned.

We can therefore declare as a condition for good piano-forte teaching, that the works of those five eminent men* shall be considered as the distinguished and governing lessons in the instruction. Whatever finger exercises, hand lessons, or secondary work, a teacher may find necessary for his pupil, must be left to his decision, as it cannot be estimated. But the teacher who does not conduct his pupil into the study of the five great masters, as soon as it can be done with any precision, and the time of the lesson permits it, and does not make them the chief object and goal of the instruction, such a teacher, we say it, without hesitation, is not able to give a true artistic education, however clever and careful he may be in other parts of his duty. Teachers who keep their pupils to fashionable dances and such trifles, to arrangements from favorite operas, &c., are altogether unworthy of the confidence of those who seek for genuine education in art. Therefore, no teacher ought to be chosen without the previous knowledge of his method of instruction.

Piano-forte learning may begin very early—in the seventh or eighth year, or even earlier, even before the hand can span the octave. There is, moreover, a sufficiency of excellent works of Haydn and Mozart, well adapted to the sensibilities of that tender age, if the teacher be but capable of choosing them. —Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

* We have to give an urgent warning with respect to Seb. Bach's work, the "Wohltemperirte Klavier," that the younger scholars be not set too early to the study of it; and that neither they nor others should be persuaded that everything that that great man has composed—often composed for momentary objects of instruction, &c.—was of equal value. Bach's manner is so different from the modern style, that we cannot without reflection employ his works. This, and the usual beginning with pianos of the most accustomed temperament, have driven more friends of art from this master than the pleasure of his music has created him admirers; and, therefore, with the greatest veneration in his regard, we will not refuse to acknowledge that another portion of his works, namely his dances, have outlived their time and become antiquated. But the enlightened teacher will find in the six preludes pour les commensaux, in the inventions and single fantasias, namely in the English and other suites among the preludes, sarabands, jigs, &c., a rich choice of the most charming and imperishable compositions, most intimately adapted to our tastes and feelings, and highly calculated to produce both pleasure and improvement in his scholars. We would here wish to recommend the new collective edition of Bach's works, at Peter's, in Leipzig. As an Introductory School for conducting from our own time and manner into those of Bach, which are so importantly different, and for primary instruction in polyphonic playing, the Author has published a selection from Seb. Bach's compositions, at Chailier's, in Berlin, at 20 Sgr.

The above warning may also apply to Handel, whose works, however, for the piano, are not numerous. We can recommend his Six Fugues and a Capriccio, at Frautwein's, in Berlin, for more advanced students.

Editorial Correspondence.

[In the absence of anything from the Editor specially intended for the eyes of the readers of this Journal, we offer them to-day some random notes of travel taken from private letters written since his last letter from Berlin.]

VENICE, APRIL 18, 1861.

Eccomi qui! In "sunny Italy," as you say. And it is sunny! For five days that I have been here and one in Trieste, there has been cloudless blue sky and blue water all the time, and such a light as well accounts for Titian. Perfect spring weather, air fresh, sweet, lively, just warm enough. I float in gondolas, I gaze at palaces and churches, I stand on bridges and quays and lose myself in reveries watching the sails and sights upon the water, I stand before the Titians, Tintoretos, Giov. Bellinies, (having already seen the three greatest works of Titian), I promenade the piazzas and wander around and in the wonderful church of St. Marco; have been all over the Doge's Palace, and I take great pleasure and got [very tired in finding my way] afoot from place to place through the labyrinth of little narrow lanes (but light as noonday), always opening something new and picturesque. What a luxury, too, is acety without horses! Great contrast to Vienna where the carriages (in streets not half as wide as Washington street,) dash by you in frantic speed, bewildering and endangering. Here too are pretty faces, pretty costumes, and cheerful dolce far niente life. One feature, though, is very ugly: the city swarms with Austrian soldiers; they are pouring into Italy continually; on every railroad and steamboat I have travelled with them. * * *

I left Vienna on the 10th, and spent the night in Grätz (over the most wonderful of railroads); reached Trieste the next night, and spent the following day there, finding it necessary to reconnoitre before attacking Italy—for I had not studied the language at all, nor even laid out the campaign from guide-books. Saturday, 13th, exquisite sail on the blue Adriatic to Venice, in 7½ hours. But it is no use to try to tell you about it. And there was wonderful old Prague too, where I wandered about every hour of the time for two days.

In Venice too, I am all alone, not a countryman to be found. I believe the expectation of war has turned them all away, and really it looks as if war could hardly be prevented. Never has the peace of Europe looked so uncertain. Every Italian looks on war as a foregone conclusion, likely to turn out now any day. If it does, I am here in the midst of it, unless I can get seasonable warning. But I propose to persevere in my plan and go to Padua day after to-morrow, stop one night, another at Verona, then to Milan and stop two days, then perhaps to Turin, to Genoa, by sea to Livorno and Florence, and to Rome. There I do hope to find somebody whom I know—but that depends on the chances of peace or war.

Truly if there is a place where air and light and constant novelty and beauty could lift a man out of his own grief and sense of loneliness, it is this wonderful Venice. For hours sometimes I do contrive to lose myself in wonder and admiration; but one cannot live upon these sentiments; the more I enjoy, the more I feel the need of friends, of those with whom I have been wont to share my life.

As to letters (editorial), I shall try to finish one to-day and to-morrow. But the chances are much more against my writing while in Italy than I had supposed. Time is so used up by new sights and fatigues, and especially by the necessity of constant studying out of plans—still more by my inability to talk Italian (being alone), so that I seldom come the shortest way at anything.

Rome, June 2.

I told you of my ten days of fine weather and enjoyment in Venice—only I had not a soul to speak with while I was there—not even an Englishman. Sunday, April 21, I left there and came as far as Padua, where I spent the day, visiting the fine old church of St. Antonio, and Giotto's chapel (!), covered walls and ceiling, with the best preserved of all his frescoes. The next day, took cars to Milan, feeling a sense of positive relief and joy when I crossed the boundary at Peschiera, and found myself beyond the everlasting swarms of Austrian soldiers, and breathed for the first time the free air of V. Emanuel's Italy. I enjoyed Milan exceedingly, and was delighted with the free Italian people. There, and in all Northern Italy, and Florence, they are the most cheerful, orderly, sweet, good-natured population that I have anywhere seen. The Cathedral filled me with wonder and delight. I spent, in several climbs, six or eight hours on its roof and spire, amid its bristling pinnacles and its population of three or four thousand statues. I staid there three nights, and saw the cathedral last, white and like a soaring airy thing, under the full moon! Many fine works of Art, too, I saw in Milan—but always alone—still no Americans. Italian politics of course interested me much. Newspapers were sold and read as eagerly in the streets, as in Boston—a new phenomenon to me in Europe! Cialdini's bitter letter to Garibaldi had just appeared, and there was great sorrow and indignation and some attempts at "demonstrations"—but the good sense and self-possession of the people frowned on demonstrations and would have them—was it not beautiful?

Then a half day's railroad ride, past the battle fields (Magenta, &c.), and with a splendid panorama of snowy Alps looming across the delicate green Lombard plains, to Turin. I thought it worth a day to go round there and take a peep into the Parliament, where I was politely led into a good seat and saw Cavour, and heard him make a short speech. He is a most lively, hearty, somewhat Pickwickian looking little man; never two minutes still, but running about all over the chamber, talking with every member, and gesticulating vigorously. He looked happy and seemed to be continually congratulated. He had reason to feel well, for it was the morning after the great reconciliation between the three chiefs. What noble patriots! I had hoped to see Garibaldi; but he was not in health, and did not come into the House any more.

The next afternoon I reached Genoa, one of the most superb of cities. Dickens has described it as a mouldy, tumble-down, gloomy mass of obsolete splendor; but to me it looked in its prime of youth and beauty. I could not satiate myself climbing its hill-side streets, admiring its exquisite hanging gardens (roses, figs, and oranges), gazing off over its beautiful harbor, and exploring its grand old palaces. Two of these I went through, which contained the largest and finest collections of paintings. (What thousands upon thousands of fine pictures I have seen! In Venice no end of Titians, Giorgiones, Tintoretos, Paul Veroneses, Giov. Bellinis, Bonifaccios—the whole Venetian school has made the clearest impression on me).

At sunset the next day I took the steamer for Leghorn. Uncomfortable, wretched little boat—immense price—rough sea—and more and worse seasickness than I had in the whole passage of the Atlantic. It should have taken 9 hours, and it took 15. I was so sick on reaching Leghorn that I could not go right on to Florence, but had to rest there most of that Sunday. Before sunset, however, I was able to take the train, and enjoy the lovely Tuscan scenery in the valley of the Arno, bounded by deep purple or snowy mountain ranges.

Florence was, much of that week, as cold as Boston in the same month, a lovely place though, smothered in roses, and surrounded with soft, green hills, and mountains white with snow. I must take some better time, when I come home, to tell you how much I enjoyed its great art galleries, its Greek statues, and Michael Angelo's "Day and Night," &c. (the Medici monument), and the Raphaels and Del Santos and Titians; the old convent of S. Marco, where Fra Angelico lived (a monk took me round through cell after cell full of his frescoes, and into the refectory, (tables all set) where is a noble fresco of the Last Supper, in the same position as Da Vinci's, by Ghirlandajo, Michael Angelo's master. (I went to see Da Vinci's in Milan). Then, too, the superb Duomo, with cupola larger than that of St. Peter's, and the view from the top of it, and Giotto's Campanile beside it, and the Baptistery with Ghiberti's doors. No end of such things while I was there; and I left ever so much unseen. One most interesting walk was out to the Protestant cemetery, where I saw Theodore Parker's tomb; a fresh bunch of flowers lay on it, and the place is most lovely, sweet with birds and roses, planted with tall cypresses, and looking from a gentle elevation over towards Fiesole. I was nine days in Florence—entirely too short a time.

I had supposed that, when in Florence, I should be within eight or ten hours of Rome. It is not so far as from Boston to New York. But practically it is several days off. I had either to take another sea voyage, or go by diligence, costing three days, or in the mail coach (two nights and one day). I chose the latter for shortness, having to pay eighty-four francs (!), and get myself first by rail to Siena, where the coach starts. So I took the early train, drove right to the post-office, where I left my baggage, and then wandered about Siena the whole day, — a most interesting place, — and expected to start with the coach at 9 P.M., where I presented myself, tired enough — but they didn't choose to start till 12; so I had to wander three hours more, sit in cafes, &c. And then came a long and dismal ride; only I and the courier inside. I entered Rome at 12 the next night, having enjoyed the distant view over the Campagna, the Alban and Sabine Mts. with Soracte, from the hill after leaving Viterbo, as long as daylight lasted — and then I fell asleep, and woke to find myself trundled along between endless white stone walls, with a strange sensation of approaching Rome. It was much nearer than I was aware, and soon we stepped inside the Porta del Popolo, in the silent square, where passport was taken, and then down the Corso and to the post-office; and I was soon walking behind a porter at midnight, and a stranger, in the streets of Rome, to the hotel. Didn't I sleep well! Rose late, walked out in the sunshine, to the Piazza di Spagna, to the banker's and found no letters — then up the interminable steps to the Pincian hill, catching a first view of St. Peter's, and then on to Story's studio. He was not there; but President Quincy, larger than life, stood there just inside the door — marble, with a man chipping away at it — and a plaster double by his side — so I couldn't help going in; and I was led from room to room, looking at statues while I waited for Story, and I sat a half hour there amid his white ideals, his "Cleopatra," "Hero," "Gretchen," Beethoven," and last of all, and really great, his "African Sybil"! It was a fine introduction. It had both the feeling of Rome and of home in it — to me so long accustomed to entire strangers only. D.

Organ for Chicago, Ill.

I had the pleasure, on two evenings the past week of listening to the tones of a new organ, built for the Episcopal Church, in Chicago, Ill., by Messrs. Stevens & Jewett, No. 120 Leverett Street, in this city, and can confidently state that the Society will receive one of the handsomest and best instruments that ever left this city. By the kindness of the builders I had an opportunity to examine the interior of the instrument, and to obtain a description of it, which I send you.

The height of case is 30 feet, width of front, 20 feet, and depth, 10 feet. The style of architecture conforms to the church in which it is to be placed, made from a plan drawn by the architect, T. V. Wadsworth, Esq., of Chicago, and is Romanesque. The contents are as follows:

BOARD OF MUSIC TRADE.—The Annual Meeting of the Board of Music Trade, which was to have taken place in this city this summer, has been postponed, in consequence of the present state of affairs in the country, to the first Wednesday of August of next year. Those whose interests are so closely connected with Harmony do well, we think, to come together only in Peace and Harmony, which we hope may, before that time, again reign in the land.

ERRATUM.—In the article "Concert Programmes," page 102, in our last number, an annoying typographical error occurs. In the last line but eight the words and the better works of Beethoven ought to read and the LATER, &c.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, ILL., JUNE 24, 1861. — Philharmonic Concert. The Philharmonic Society crowned the efforts of its first season with a very brilliant concert in Bryan Hall, on Saturday last, June 22. It was an auspicious conclusion of a series of musical entertainments, which have successfully inaugurated a new musical era in this city. The Society was organized under circumstances which rendered its successful accomplishment of the object aimed at somewhat doubtful in the minds of many whose hearts were with it. That object was the introduction of the best classical music in a community which had previously given the larger share of its patronage to productions of an inferior order. But the complete and triumphant success of the Society in its first season has, we think, demonstrated the practicability of the undertaking and reflected all honor upon the good taste of its numerous members. This success is undoubtedly owing in a very large measure to the labors of Mr. Balatka, the talented musical director, than whom no better musical executive can be found in the North West.

The following programme closed the first season:

1. Fifth Symphony, C minor.....L. V. Beethoven.
a. Allegro con brio.
b. Andante.
c. Allegro.
2. "Winged Messenger".....Feen.
Miss Dewey
3. Elegy to the Memory of Stephen A. Douglas.....Balatka.
4. Aria from "Jerusalem".....Verdi.
Mr. De Passio.
5. Souvenir de "Robert le Diable".....Meyerbeer.
6. Overture to "Martha".....Flotow.

The symphony in C minor was played by the orchestra in truly excellent style and with proper regard to light and shade. Every performer seemed inspired by the greatness of the composition and anxious to convey the idea of it to the audience. The best part of the Symphony might well be considered the triumph of instrumental music, for it is hardly possible to imagine anything more sublime and effective. The Winged Messenger was handsomely done by Miss Dewey and heartily encored. Mr. De Passio gave the aria to "Jerusalem" in his usual excellent style and is deservedly the favorite of our concert-going people. A most interesting performance of the evening was Balatka's Elegy in memory of Stephen A. Douglas, it being new to every one. It is a dignified and solemn composition which conveys its meaning to the listener at once. Very expressive is the last part, where in passages of exquisite tenderness, the last touching farewell seems to be offered to the departed by sorrow-stricken friends. The composition will add greatly to the already high reputation of Mr. Balatka. The rest of the programme "Souvenir de Robert," and "Martha Overture" were by their perfect rendition much admired by the friends of a lighter style of music. The Directors announce, that the second season will commence with a concert to be given in September.

An Organic Complaint.

STREET MUSIC IN LONDON AND A PUBLIC MEETING.

At a time when the paper question threatens to unseat a Ministry, and the American troubles to create dissension, the London Star and Dial devotes one column and a quarter to another serious difficulty still—street music. The Star says:

"Marylebone, it appears, is at this moment agitated by a tremendous outburst of popular indignation. We were in blissful ignorance of the fact until a few minutes ago. The storm has been brewing silently, and thunder clouds have been gathering, while the sun seemed to be shining and the heavens bright and clear. At last the tempest has broken out in good earnest; the evidence before us places this beyond the reach of doubt. We have just received a hand-bill, headed in large capitals, with the resonant and wrath-provoking motto, 'Might against Right,' convening a public meeting of the ratepayers of the borough, this evening, in the Courthouse, Marble Lane. The veteran Reformer, Mr. Nicholas, is to take the chair, and Lord Formoy and Mr. Harvey Lewis have been invited to grace the platform with their presence. Our readers will doubtless be eager to learn the object of this imposing demonstration. We may, therefore, as well inform them at once that the meeting has been called, not to elicit the opinion of the inhabitants of Marylebone upon any vital question of domestic or foreign policy, but simply to protest against a sentence passed some few weeks since by Mr. Mansfield upon four members of a peripatetic brass band, who had been perpetrating their habitual discords to the annoyance of Mr. Charles Babbage. The Home Secretary, it is stated, has been appealed to, but in vain, and now the ratepayers are solemnly convoked to give formal utterance to their wrath at a judicial decision which is stigmatized by the promoters of the meeting as an act of 'magisterial tyranny.' We are ready to do the most ample justice to the motives of the gentlemen who have taken the foremost part in fomenting this tempest in a tea-pot. We are fully convinced that they have been actuated by the kindest motives, and we willingly believe that the error of judgment into which they have been betrayed arises from want of practical experience of the nuisance in behalf of which they have thought fit to interpose. At the same time, we feel bound to record our protest against the extension of any toleration to a pest which has really become past endurance. Mr. Babbage is no exceptional sufferer, and the courage and perseverance with which he has vindicated the right of every man to enjoy a peaceful existence in his own dwelling entitles him to be regarded as a public benefactor.

"The nature of the strains to which we are compelled to listen makes this nuisance intolerably hideous. If Caliban were a dweller in London now, he might truthfully exclaim, 'The isle is full of noises.' But, alas! he could not add, 'sounds and sweet airs that give delight and hurt not.' There is an organ player under our window at this moment; by the turning of his fatal crank he professes to be executing a composition of Vincent Wallace. In a certain sense he is executing it; he is so breaking it on the wheel that the accomplished musician could scarcely recognize his reputed child. For all the melody that exists in the concatenation of sounds he is producing, it might be the offspring of Richard Wagner."

Music Abroad.

Wallace's Opera of "Lurline," has been published in Germany under the title of "Loreley."

VIENNA.—Richard Wagner, while in Vienna, for the first time heard his "Lohengrin," at a rehearsal. The performance in the evening was made the occasion of an ovation to the composer. During the evening he was three times called upon the stage. No composer has ever before received like honors in theatre. The nobility took particular pains to show their sympathy with the enthusiasm of the Princess Metternich in Paris, who is one of them, and the applause was overwhelming. Wagner was not let off without having made a little neat speech. He is the lion of the day, and is richly indemnified for the bitter days of his exile by the smiles of the Imperial city.

MOSCOW, (Russia).—The Concert season, which is now over, has proved quite unsuccessful. No artist drew a full house. Many Concerts heralded with great pomp had to be given up as nobody would buy tickets. This has never happened before. Of foreign artists only Dreyshock and Wieniawski came; the former just saved his purse; the latter was sadly out of pocket. The Musical Society of the city—Philharmonic—was also poorly patronized. Only one of their concerts paid expenses. Liszt's Preludes were on the bills of the last one. The Russians did not seem to relish it much.

LEIPZIG.—Classical Leipzig has been blessed at last with the first performance of "Il Trovatore." The "Signale" comes to the conclusion that Verdi is better than his reputation. Signora Trebelli, in the character of Azucua, contributed much towards the success of the Opera. She is undoubtedly one of the first artists in Europe.

PARIS.—The Society of dramatic authors in Paris have been paid during the last eleven months the sum of one and a half millions of francs, being the author's share in the performances of works of their members.

The musical societies of the lower district of the Rhine have celebrated their 38th annual musical Festival at Aix-la-Chapelle. Works performed were Beethoven's grand D minor Mass, and Sinfonia Eroica, and the Oratorio of Joshua by Handel. The latter created a profound sensation. Several of the choruses were encored.

We clip the following from a Berlin letter in the Leipzig "Neue Zeitschrift": "Mr. Paine, from America, a pupil of our best organ-player and distinguished composer A. Haupt, gave an organ concert previous to his departure, in which he performed pieces by Bach, Mendelssohn, Thiele and of his own with astonishing perfection. His pedal-playing and clearness of execution on the manuals are rarely equalled. He is more of a player than a composer. His variations on the Austrian National Anthem are suggestive of talent, but lack the maturity of a well formed individuality." This concert took place some time ago, but the report is new.

Vienna.

A circumstance that has already been remarked is that individual concert-givers scarcely dare any longer present themselves to the public without Beethoven, Chopin, and Schumann. Although, in many instances, this is done rather clumsily, and although it is desirable that Beethoven should be the Omega and not the Alpha in the education of our young professionals, the necessity the artist is under of presenting a programme of sterling worth to his patrons, affords satisfactory testimony of a cultivated taste on the part of the hearer; and the performance of three-and-twenty symphonies, without counting Liszt's Dichtungen—to which we devoted a separate paragraph above—the public performance, we say, of three-and-twenty symphonies, during the course of six months, in a city like Vienna, is really no small advance. It is, as a matter of course, altogether out of the question to compare Vienna, as far as activity in musical affairs is concerned, with many a smaller town in northern or middle Germany. Concentration of thought upon special and limited objects, and total absorption in one well-defined direction, cannot be expected or required of us. People must not insist on Vienna's being Leipzig, Breslau, or any other city where men of great talent pursue their course, with iron consistency, towards some one particular object. On the other hand, Vienna boasts of so many men of such varied talent, while public sensitiveness is so great public feeling so frank, and public sentiment so fresh, that anything only needs to be awakened into being, to pulsate freely, freshly, and vigorously, following its own path; and though it may sometimes giddily spring aside from it, it speedily returns to where its correct instinct calls it. This instinct warns us more especially against everything wearisome. If this results in our having sometimes not at first appreciated, from a dread of what appears monotonous, many things we subsequently enjoy, we gain a by no means inconsiderable advantage, namely, an ever fresh, quick feeling of appreciation for the essentially vital element in art generally, and, in music more especially, for the light genius of melody.

We should have to plunge into a thorough analysis of particular circumstances and individual institutions, if we attempted to give a detailed account of the continuous progress of musical Vienna. It is not long since we endeavored to show what a change had taken place here during the last ten years. We shall often probably have occasion to express our opinion of the system of musical associations, and the ends they have in view. Many persons consider logically musical matters among us solely in a musical light, without taking into account their influence on society. We ourselves have, perhaps, frequently arrived at a wrong decision, in consequence of this circumscribed mode of viewing things. We do not hesitate, however, to own our error, when we think we have discovered something better. We endeavor, also, if only as "an exercise for the memory," to gain a clear insight into the connection between human and artistic matters; and when, as last winter, for instance, we see the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde taking the lead, and achieving triumphs with the Mass in D, with Schubert's Opera, with the formation of an orchestra of their own, and with the organization, which has been commenced, at least, of the Conservatory, we cannot help recollecting the struggle necessitated not for a merely professional change of officials, but for placing the guidance of the Association in the hands of men who could be relied on, and who would work well together. We make this observation in order to mark distinctly the party to which we belong; for parties there must be as long as life and human activity exist, and those persons who cherish a love of art must hold together, unless they would have their cunning opponents enlist on their side the whole body of weak and neutral individuals. We rejoice sincerely at the successes thus achieved; and, while passing over in silence what did not turn out so well, but which was quite immaterial when placed in the balance against so much that was most excellent, we will, in conclusion, express the hope that, at the expiration of another year, we may have it in our power to give an equally favorable account of the "Vienna Concert Season."—Vienna Recensionen.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—This interesting event is fixed to take place on Tuesday the 27th of August, and three following days, making the twenty-eighth triennial celebration of these famous musical meetings. The proceeds arising from the festivals are applied to the assistance of the funds of the Birmingham General Hospital, one of the largest beneficent institutions of this nature out of London. So great has been the success of the Birmingham Festivals, that since their establishment in 1768, nearly eighty thousand pounds have been realized for the charity. The meetings, under royal patronage, are supported by the nobility and gentry of the Midland counties, who not only act as Vice-presidents, but by their presence in the Town Hall, where the performances are held, manifest the interest they take in the welfare of the hospital. The arrangements are made by a committee, and are always on a scale of grandeur and completeness: the best available vocal and instrumental talent being invariably engaged, and the works performed consisting always of the highest class of sacred and secular music, by the most renowned ancient and modern composers. The last festival was held in 1858, when the Earl of Dartmouth was President. This year that office will be filled by the Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Stars and the Stripes. G. A. Mieske. 25

A powerful song of the old flag, with a vigorous melody which must at once impress itself favorably upon musical ears.

Land of Columbus. Quartet. Geo. Howe. 5

An Anthem of three verses, corresponding in measure to the Anthem of "God Save the Queen," but provided with an original melody, well adapted for children's voices, by Mr. Howe. The Anthem has been sung by the children of the Warren street Chapel during the Fourth of July celebration at the Academy of Music, and elicited warm encomiums. It is conveniently arranged for part-singing.

Instrumental Music.

Governor Curtin's Grand March. Rieter Fitzgerald. 25

A well written, pleasing March, by the junior editor of the "Philadelphia Item," and dedicated to the eminent man, who occupies the gubernatorial chair of Pennsylvania.

Croyez moi. J. Ascher. 25

A charming little Nocturne, eclipsing many a more pretentious composition in striking beauty of melody and nicety of detail. Everybody will be taken with it. It is not difficult.

Immortellen Waltzes. Four hands. Gungl. 75

One of the finest sets of modern Waltzes; an uninterrupted chain of beautiful melodies, now jubilant and joyous, then again subdued and plaintive, the whole prefaced by a slow and impressive March in memory of Johann Strauss, who had just died when these Waltzes were composed. Two good players can enchant any audience with these strains. They are not difficult but must have the true whirl of the Waltz, in order to be fully effective.

GUIDE TO MUSICAL COMPOSITION. By Heinrich Wohlfahrt. Translated by John S. Dwight. Bound. 75

This little book is intended for those amateurs who have a penchant for composing, without being able to devote their time to a course of instruction in harmony. The author gives the laws of phrasing, or musical construction, lays out the web of modulation, and, in a manner, even teaches to form melodies. A musical person of some practical experience, who has a little of the inventive faculty, will, by the aid of this book, be able to shape his ideas into a satisfactory, finished form. There are many such to whom pretty ideas come plentifully, but who, when trying to put them together and make a musical whole of them, find that they will not connect, or that there is too little or too much of them, in short, that there is something wrong which they are not able to remedy. After studying Wohlfahrt's book they will see clearly where the defect lies, and whence the remedy must come.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

"O, Mother of a Mighty Race."

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

O, Mother of a mighty race,
Yet lovely in thy youthful grace!
The elder dames, thy haughty peers,
Admire and hate thy blooming years;
With words of shame
And taunts of scorn they join thy name.

For on thy cheeks the glow is spread
That tints thy morning hills with red;
Thy step—the wild deer's rustling feet
Within thy woods are no more fleet;
Thy hopeful eye
Is bright as thine own sunny sky.

Ay, let them rail—those haughty ones,
While safe thou dwellest with thy sons!
They do not know how loved thou art,
How many a fond and fearless heart
Would rise to throw
Its life between thee and the foe.

They know not, in their hate and pride,
What virtues with thy children bide—
How true, how good, thy graceful maids
Make bright, like flowers, the valley shades;
What generous men
Spring, like thine oaks, by hill and glen;

What cordial welcomes greet the guest
By thy lone rivers of the west;
How faith is kept, and truth revered,
And man is loved, and God is feared,
In woodland homes,
And where the ocean border foams.

There's freedom at thy gates, and rest
For Earth's down-trodden and oppress,
A shelter for the hunted head,
For the starved laborer toil and bread.
Power, at thy bounds,
Stops, and calls back his baffled hounds.

O, fair young Mother! on thy brow
Shall sit a nobler grace than now.
Deep in the brightness of thy skies
The thronging years in glory rise,
And, as they fleet,
Drop strength and riches at thy feet.

Thine eye, with every coming hour,
Shall brighten, and thy form shall tower;
And when thy sisters, elder born,
Would brand thy name with words of scorn,
Before thine eye
Upon their lips the taunt shall die.

The Development of the Musical Faculties.

COMPOSITION.

We name the study of composition as the third object of general musical education. Deep penetration into art and its productions, a rich development of musical talent, cannot be attained without this study. If it be undertaken in the right sense, it rewards every step forwards with clearer insight and increased pleasure; and, indeed, those also who are not destined by peculiar talents to the profession of composers.

This circumstance demands the more deliberate consideration, the more imperfect and erroneous the representations are which have been attached to it.

Music consists, as can be seen from this book, in an inward comprehension of innumerable most diversified forms, constantly approaching and separating, perpetually combining and dissolving in each other. Their operation can be perceived, more or less, without previous cultivation, and can be understood and represented by a superficial instruction; but to comprehend them entirely, to penetrate into their whole nature and attributions, is to know the meaning and force of each form by itself, and also when in combination with every other. Now, let us imagine a great composition before us, in which different parts are united in the most varied manner, in all sorts of artistic forms, each part having its cantilena, its rhythm, its succession of tones, while each tone has a determined relation to the tones of the other parts, and with all this are combined different degrees and kinds of motion, of furte or piano, and of manner of performance. Now, we say, with such a composition before us, we presume it will be admitted that without study such a composition could not be understood, and that the study for that object must be thorough, systematic, and methodical.

Let us suppose for a moment that any one unaccustomed to composition undertook the dissection of the above imagined work. Then would he be overwhelmed with an intolerable burden of unities. The completion of his task would be impossible, were it only from the creation of new forms and applications of them which daily take place in art.

The only ready, practicable, and fruitful procedure is, therefore, to set one's own hand to work, to learn one's self how to bring the forms from out the world of sound, to "call the spirits from the vasty deep;" to learn to feel the rhythm of the forms, so that all present and future forms shall be within our scope and comprehension, because we have grasped the root of their existence—because we know how they have come into existence, and why. This the doctrine of composition teaches us. This science alone gives us, not abstract ideas upon art—not merely superficial notions upon the operation of art—not a few cut out dead parts, but the whole entire, with all its individualities, and in its unity, matter and spirit, form and meaning, in that single entirety which is the material of true art.

We may add, from a large experience of every age, and of both sexes, that the study of composition, without any proportionate loss of time, even for amateurs, most surely rewards every step, even when but small disposition exists in the student, or circumstances should prevent a lengthened pursuit of the subject. The first few lessons in one-part * compositions will at once awaken the sense for melody, and give a significant idea of its fundamental forms, of the efficacy of rhythm, and of the origin and accumulation of passages and phrases. Already the doctrine so comprehensive and so easily comprehended of the two and two composition in two parts, built upon the natural harmony, makes the foundation of all harmony and tonic progression perfectly obvious, and furnishes to moderately endowed students, pleasurable and exciting lessons. So much can be acquired in two or three weeks, with a couple of lessons a week and but little exertion; and, moreover, we might abandon our studies at this point, without having lost our labor. Then the gradual development of harmony and the richer progression of parts, will have, in the mere inspection, the charm of a perfectly rational and highly copious display, from the most simple fundamental forms and the most obvious laws. But to any one who enters upon this pursuit with inbred activity, to such a one the regions of sound are illumined and extended with every effort—the sense of music is vivified, excited and strengthened by every fresh manifestation of the internal art. Now, with the knowledge of the limitation of chords, freedom in the unfolding of art returns, and her play becomes continually richer and more variegated. Then all artistic forms are imagined and explained, the one from the other—the order of the succession being pre-supposed—the one quite as easy as the other, until finally, their realization on determined instruments or in song, in ecclesiastical, dramatic, and other objects of our art, completes the whole study. At any point the study may be relinquished with profit, in proportion to the labor bestowed, if circumstances should so command, or the zeal of the student should not urge him to further investigation.

The study of composition may begin early, particularly with talented and lively children, but not before they have made some progress upon a musical instrument,—if possible the piano-forte, and have thereby gained some participation in and capacity for art, and also more penetration and habit of reflection. They ought at least to have got beyond the elementary exercises, and be able to play with feeling and technical correctness larger works, such as, for example the sonatas of Haydn and Mozart. Instruction in composition at an earlier period than this would be mere empty playing; or, what is much worse, would disturb, in the still unself-supporting scholar, the free and immediate enjoyment of the compositions lying before him; and thrust, in the place of lively, soul-inspiring, artistic employment, cold and profitless mechanisms of the understanding. This is one of the greatest errors of a system pursued in many shapes, of instruction in the piano and harmony combined, which apparently advances the students through an intricate mechanism with great rapidity, but at the cost of the feeling of music itself, which remains undeveloped, and becomes, indeed, oppressed and stifled by the disturbance of the understanding, and the mechanism which that system brings into action. The true joy of art and artistic accomplishment becomes the more surely destroyed thereby,—the more deceptive to the observer is the joy of the scholar at his mechanical success,—and the more his sudden progress in certain parts of music is in the beginning inexplicable to the uninstructed.

We consider thus much to be necessary upon general education. The choice of other instruments may be left to each individual, under the advice of the better-informed. The science and history of music must in like manner be left to the disposition and leisure of every friend of art. The composer, and particularly the well-educated musician, will scarcely be able to restrain himself from the history of his art, not merely from books, but from the works of art themselves.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

* The author has conformed himself here to the tenor and tendency of his Doctrine of Musical Composition (Lehre von der Musikalischen Composition), at Breitkopf and Härtel. How little can the above assurance be given by the old thorough-bass and doctrine of harmony; how unartistic is it in foundation and method, how extremely incomplete and unsatisfactory. This the author has exemplified from time to time in the Instruction for Composition, but more demonstratively in the work "Die alte Musiklehre im Streit mit unserer Zeit" (the old Doctrine of Music in contention with our times), at Breitkopf and Härtel, 1841—as had been acknowledged and declared long enough before him by Reicher and every thinking Professor of composition. The indolence of so many old masters, or the ignorance of masters absolutely unacquainted with the real nature of composition, is still answerable for the painful and useless labor of many young persons. Many such, indeed, are still enduring in the continually disappointed hope that they will at last, some day, arrive at composition, or at least at a clearer insight into the nature of art: they endure until the time has passed, and with it all pleasure and natural feeling, which either dies away or becomes corrupted.

Surry Music Hall.

The destruction by fire of the Surry Music Hall is one of those dreadful accidents which periodically befall our places of public amusement, and which seem alike to defy precaution and watchfulness. Within a few years we had to chronicle the burning of Covent Garden Theatre and St. Martin's Hall, and have now to add that of the very splendid building in Surry Gardens, devoted to music. In the present case, we believe, the cause of the conflagration is distinctly traced; and the smallest care, it would appear on the part of the workmen who were occupied in repairing the roof, would have prevented the catastrophe. Generally, however, the cause remains concealed, or is only surmised. In the case of the Royal Italian Opera, conjecture was completely baffled; and to this day the burning down of that magnificent theatre continues a mystery. Is there any means of preventing these terrible occurrences? Must it be set down in the book of probabilities that any given theatre in London is doomed to share the fate of the Surry Music Hall—say, once in twenty years? If this be correct calculation, and that there are twenty theatres in London, every year should have its conflagration, which, fortunately, is not the case, and which, no doubt, is owing to the superior providence of some managers over others, or to a better system of ventilation or fire prevention adopted in the structure of the buildings. In any case, it behooves those who construct theatres, as well as those who watch over them, as far as lies in their power, specially to provide against accidents by fire. Where such inflammable materials as painted canvass and fragile wood-work are used and brought into all but immediate contact with flickering jets of gas—as in the case of all theatres, and is unavoidable—it is really wonderful that accidents are so few, and proves that the midnight guardians of the temples must be wakeful at their posts. In the case of Her Majesty's Theatre a large tank of water surmounts the building, which is so arranged that the whole contents may be turned on to the interior of the house in a very few minutes. Such a body of liquid would no doubt extinguish summarily any ordinary fire, and would seem to be all that is required. Whether any other theatre has adopted the same plan we do not know. But we would recommend strongly the adoption of large cisterns, after the manner of that used in the Old Opera, not only in theatres, but in every building devoted to public amusements; in which case a single watchman, by the turn of a single cock, would be enabled to do the work of twenty fire-engines, and in ten times briefer space.

Poor Julian! The Surry Music Hall was one of his brightest dreams. He, who always looked forward to the art enlightenment of the public, saw in the establishment of a music-hall in the somewhat barbaric region of Walworth, Lambeth, the Boro', and Camberwell, a new field for his enterprise, a new theatre for his ambition, a new arena on which to carry out his boundless speculations for the advancement of music. No missionary with gospel in hand ever went to the Coast of Gold, or remotest Indian isle, to convert misbelievers, with purer intent or more fixed determination than Jullien to the farther side of the Thames, to regenerate the untaught hosts of Surryland by means of good music. But "the race is not always to the swift, nor battle to the strong;" and they who deserve most of fortune too often in the end come off the worst. Jullien gave up heart and soul to the establishment of the new Hall—as, indeed, was his nature, his instinct—and in an evil hour embarked in it all the hard and honorable earnings of many years. The Surry Music Hall was inaugurated with every prospect of success. Soon, however, matters took an adverse change. Ill management, increase of expenditure, disagreement among the share holders, improvidence of the directors, and a brief career of bad luck, brought the speculation to bankruptcy. Jullien lost several thousand pounds, all he had in the world indeed, and as far as money was concerned, was a ruined man. He bore up manfully, however, against the calamity, and displayed more energy and vigor than ever in stemming the torrent of adversity. It cannot be concealed, nevertheless, that the bankruptcy of the Surry Music Hall planted the first nail in Jullien's coffin. He not only lost all his worldly estate, but his brightest vision had fled, his dearest hope was gone. And thus the Surry Music Hall, in its moral ruin, engendered a far deeper calamity than in its physical annihilation. Insurance offices and shareholders may again raise the structure aloft to the skies, and endow it with new beauty and splendor; but what power can restore him who constituted its life and light, without whom the Hall itself would have had neither locality nor a name!

It is gratifying to know that the building is largely insured, although by no means to the extent of covering the loss. The fears, too, have proved premature that the destruction of the Hall would involve the foregoing of many important concerts already announced, thereby throwing hundreds out of employment. This, we are glad, is provided against. A temporary building, we understand, has been erected, of boarding, we may suppose, at the end of the supper-room, where the concerts will take place until the hall is rebuilt, and in which some fêtes on a prodigal scale will be given for the benefit of the proprietors. The weather, moreover, could not be more favorable; so that, notwithstanding the terrible disaster which has brought destruction on the hall, the musical season at the Surry Gardens will not suffer total eclipse.

Verdi.

Signor Verdi is the most fortunate of composers. Just when his prestige seemed to be on the wane, when his popularity appeared to totter beneath the new impetus given to good music; when the Trovatore was beginning to pall upon the public taste, and the Traviata was all but banished from the operatic repertory, comes a new work from his pen, which has already excited the greatest interest, not merely on account of the value attached to it as a composition, but because the managers of the two Italian theatres have announced it for performance, and the music has been already made familiar to the visitors of Canterbury and Oxford Halls. Un Ballo in Maschera, Signor Verdi's last opera—and, as some say, his best—was one of the special novelties which figured in Mr. Gye's prospectus this season; and, therefore, if priority of announcement constitute a claim, the Royal Italian Opera has the first right of production. The law of copyright, however, as it seems, does not affect the opera being given at another theatre; and as the director of Covent Garden has not been able, as we learn, to obtain the exclusive power of performance for his theatre, Mr. J. H. Mapleson, manager of the Lyceum Italian Opera, has also advertised the Ballo in Maschera for representation, and even takes precedence of Mr. Gye, since the opera is announced in the bills for tonight; whereas the Royal Italian performance does not take place until Thursday. Here, then, we have two impresarii of Italian opera openly contesting for the honor of laying Verdi's latest inspiration before the public, and expending all the resources of their establishments on its production. The Covent Garden cast comprises, in the principal parts Mesdames Penco, Miolan-Carvalho, and Nantier-Didié; Sigs. Mario, Graziani Tagliafico, and M. Zelger; that of the Lyceum, Mlle. Titiens, Mesdames Gassier and Lemaire, Sigs. Giuliani, Delle Sedie, and M. Gassier; two powerful lists of names, and which demonstrates how worthily considered the opera must be in the minds of the directors.

Sig. Verdi is now in reality the hero of the opera, and his old influence is about to be renewed. Once more must the star of Mozart and Rossini grow pale in the dazzling glare of young Italy's composer, and a second Trovatore furor be created. It might be desired, however, that Sig. Verdi had essayed his talent on any other subject than that which had originated one of the most undoubted chefs d'œuvre of the French school. In selecting Gustavus the Third; or, the Masked Ball, already hallowed by the genius of Auber the Italian composer acted unwisely; since he brought his music into direct competition with that of one who was a far greater master and a more inspired writer than himself, and could hope to obtain little profit from the comparison. Is it possible that Signor Verdi ever entertained the idea of making the world forget Auber's opera through his own? Perhaps he remembered how Rossini's Barbiere had entirely obliterated that of Paisiello, and fancied his Ballo in Maschera would do the same by Auber's Masked Ball. Or can it be possible that Signor Verdi knows nothing of the opera of Gustave, and had no "compunctious visitings," when the book was presented to him by some enthusiastic music publisher? This, indeed, would constitute his fairest excuse; since, to fancy he could go calmly and hopefully to work after an attentive hearing of Auber's music, is impossible. Nay, is it not more likely that, after listening to the divinely melodious opening chorus, he would have dashed down the libretto in despair, and cried aloud, "This, indeed, is beyond the scope of my inspiration, and I shall not attempt to rival it?"

We do not seek in these remarks, to disparage or underrate the composer of Rigoletto. We shall be delighted to hear a new opera from his pen, satisfied that from it alone we can hope to obtain anything, now-a-days, veritably original. If Sig. Verdi were deposed, it would only be to make room for some one without a tithe of his inspiration, and no part of his dramatic power. Therefore, if we are to have novelty, let us seek to procure it from a quarter where we are certain to gain something with which we had no previous acquaintance. The general public, after all, are not such fools; and Sig. Verdi's long-ending popularity proves incontestably not only that he possesses qualities which no other composer possesses, but that to him belongs the still rarer quality of interesting and exciting in an eminent degree. And so we, too, as well as the prufanum vulgus, will be right glad to hear a new work which has emanated from his fertile pen.—Musical World.

War Song.

Dedicated to the Massachusetts Regiments.

BY W. W. STORY.

Up with the Flag of the Stripes and the Stars!
Gather together from plow and from loom!
Hark to the signal!—the music of wars
Sounding for tyrants and traitors their doom.
March, march, march, march!
Brothers unite—march in your might,
For Justice and Freedom, for God and the Right!

Down with the foe to the Land and the Laws!
Marching together our country to save,
God shall be with us to strengthen our cause,
Nerving the hand and the heart of the brave.
March, march, march, march!
Brothers unite—rouse in your might,
For Justice and Freedom, for God and the Right!

Flag of the Free! under thee we will fight,
Shoulder to shoulder, our face to the foe;
Death to all traitors, and God for the Right!
Singing this song as to battle we go:
March, march, march, march!
Freemen unite—rouse in your might,
For Justice and Freedom, for God and the Right!

Land of the Free that our Fathers of old,
Bleeding together, cemented in blood—
Give us thy blessing as brave and as bold,
Standing like one, as our ancestors stood—
We march, march, march, march!
Conquer or fall! Hark to the call:
Justice and Freedom for one and for all!

Chain of the slave we have suffered so long—
Striving together, thy links we will break!
Hark! for God hears us, as echoes our song,
Sounding the cry to make tyranny quake!

March, march, march, march!
Conquer or fall! Rouse to the call—
Justice and freedom for one and for all.

Workmen arise! There is work for us now;
Ours the red ledger for bayonet pen;
Sword be our hammer, and cannon our plow;
Liberty's loom must be driven by men!

March, march, march, march!
Freemen! we fight, roused in our might,
For Justice and Freedom, for God and the Right!

DEATH OF AMODIO.—We regret to record the death of Signor Amodio. He was a person of no inconsiderable gifts in his profession, and will be identified in the memory of most of us with some of the leading characters of the modern Italian Opera.

The following from the Evening Post will be read with interest:

"Alessandro Amodio, whose death we briefly noticed yesterday, was born in Naples in 1831. His family is an old and respectable one, and his father is editor-in-chief of the official journals of Naples.

A few months ago a Havana correspondent said: 'Amodio is learning the flute.' A mistake, for he had played that instrument from the day that he was old enough to hold it in his lips. In that direction his fine musical genius first developed itself. With his perfected voice came the desire to use and cultivate it. Accordingly, at the age of eighteen, he put himself under the training of the two most celebrated maestri of Naples, Glosa and Biasaccia.

Having continued for three years in their schools he became so enamored of the stage, that, failing to obtain the consent of his family to a public career, he ran away and joined the troupe singing at the Teatro di San Carlo, where he made his first appearance with Borghi-Mamo and Giuglini. He was so enthusiastically received that an engagement for three successive seasons was immediately concluded with him by the manager of the opera at Florence.

There Strakosch heard him, and asserted that if he would come to America he might make his fortune in a year. He accordingly finished his Florence engagement, and after singing in Milan, Leghorn and Lucca, paid his first visit to this country. Here he first appeared, in the role of Il Conte di Luna, and the reception he met has too long made him a household word among those who love music to need mention at this day.

He travelled through the whole United States, appearing everywhere in concert or opera, with most unequivocal success—interspersing between his appearance here, three separate seasons at the Tacon Theatre of Havana. Finally he went to Venezuela, sang with the same applause in Caracas, and was on his way to his adopted home in New York when he died of fever.

His younger brother, Francesco, also a fine barytone, and just beginning his career, was with him when he died, and is afflicted to the last degree at the loss of one who, as he touchingly says, "was older than I, but my heart's very twin." The love of these two brothers was everywhere remarkable.

The death of Alessandro is the first affliction of the Amodio family, who now number both parents, six sons and two daughters. Francesco is the only one left on the stage. Amodio is a severe loss to the lyric stage, but an irreparable one to thousands of friends, and a man who left no enemies.

Liszt in Paris.

The sudden sultriness of the weather, which has sent the Court to Fontainebleau and so many owners of country residences to the delights of la villegiatura, has brought out the gardens of this gay and brilliant city into the fulness of their floral glory. The salons of that portion of the beau monde which lingers on until the close of the Legislative chamber, are so laden with flowers as to be often oppressive, especially where the reception rooms happen to be small, and the company numerous as was the case at the soirée given last week to Dr. Liszt by M. de Lamartine.

The prince of pianists being too rich and too grand to play any longer for money, has turned a deaf ear to all entreaties to allow himself to be heard in public. But having dined at the Tuileries, he condescended, after dinner, to play for his imperial hosts, and that to such purpose that the Emperor testified his delight and admiration by naming the artist, then and there, Commander of the Legion of Honor. Liszt has also played at the magnificent dramatic fête given by the Count de Morny by way of adieu to the gaieties of the expiring season; and being an old and intimate friend of Lamartine, whose admiration of his powers is unbounded, and with whom he has promised to take "a family dinner," he graciously empowered the poet to invite "a few friends" to come in after dinner and hear him play. M. and Mme. de Lamartine, greatly delighted with this permission, immediately sent off notes of invitation to as many of their "dear five hundred" as they thought their small salon in the rue Ville l'Eveque could be stretched into holding; among others, to the principal editor of the Siècle.

By some error, this note, instead of being delivered to M. Havin, found its way into the compositor's room; and all the music-lovers of Paris were electrified, next morning, by reading in the columns of that popular journal, the following lines:

"My dear Havin: Liszt who does me the inappreciable honor of dining with me on Thursday next, consents to allow my humble parlor to hear those wonderful sounds so long unheard in Paris, and to witness the renewal of the old prodigy of Orpheus, who animated wood and metal at his pleasure! 'He that hath ears,' &c., &c."

"Yours ever, LAMARTINE."

In vain did the unfortunate poet address, in wild affright, a second note—this time, meant for publication—to the editor of the Siècle, explaining that his first had been metamorphosed into a public advertisement altogether by mistake, that his parlor was too small to hold more than the few he had already personally invited, and, by implication, imploring the public to stay away. The excuse offered by the unlucky mistake of the newspaper people afforded too good an excuse to be neglected, and the poet's house, on the appointed evening, was literally besieged by crowds of persons utterly unknown to him, who had flocked thither in the hope of getting in, not only from every quarter of Paris but from every part of France. One eager malomane of Marseilles having caught sight of the tempting paragraph in the Siècle, consulted his watch, saw that he could just accomplish the journey in time, if he managed to catch the next train for Paris, had his valise packed in a twinkling, dashed off to the station, reached it in the "nick of time," and reached the poet's residence early enough to secure an entrance, which the greater part of those who came after him were, of course, unable to do; Liszt's enormous piano—which he takes everywhere with him—occupying a good part of the salon, and every available inch of space in the house being speedily crammed almost to suffocation.

The great artist is just like his portraits; little changed from the lion of twenty years ago, save that his hair is now almost white. No description could give any adequate idea of the amazing performance of this unrivalled artist, while those who have formerly heard and seen him play, it will suffice to say that his astounding power is the same as ever, but that he now plays with rather less of that frantic, maddening, thunder-bolt sort of force which led to the utterance of the famous dictum of the musical criticism of that day: "Thalberg plays like a god, Cramer like an archangel, and Liszt like the devil!" Liszt played also at Prince Poniatowski's, whose reception rooms were crowded almost as suffocatingly as the poet's house. On both occasions the quantity of flowers in the rooms, though extremely charming to the eye, was positively oppressive, and was confidentially voted a nuisance by all the guests.

An opulent banker here, with whom Liszt had engaged to dine, and to whom he had sent his piano, determined to keep the expected player entirely for himself and a few of the members of his family. Shortly before six o'clock the artist reached the banker's house, which he entered, to the stupefaction of that personage and his wife, with two splendidly dressed ladies—both princesses—to each of whom he had given an arm. Princess D—speaking for them both, gracefully explained that, unable to resist the temptation of hearing the artist, they had invited themselves to share the hospitality of Mme. G—. The host and hostess though not a little annoyed at this unceremonious invasion of their premises by persons who were not only total strangers, but of a rank so much above their own, were fain to make the best of the affair, and protesting that they were "delighted," "flattered," and "enchanted," had an additional leaf drawn out of their dining-table, and did the honors of the evening with all the grace and amabilité of Paris—an Amphitryon.

Liszt is eccentric and extremely proud: he moreover cherishes a singular animosity against apples, which useful fruit he considers as unworthy of being ranked among the edibles of the planet. At a certain dinner, not many years ago, some young men having made a bet that they would draw out the "lion" on the subject of his favorite antipathy, one of them, when the desert was placed on the table, launched forth into a high-flown panegyric upon apples, but declared that he was unable to decide "whether they should be peeled or eaten with the rind." "Pray, M. Liszt," continued the young man, "what do you consider to be the most correct way of eating an apple?" "Sir," replied the artist with freezing haughtiness, "no well-bred man would eat an apple in any way."

On another occasion Liszt was invited to a grand soirée given by the Russian Princess L—, renowned for her pride, and for her insolent way of showing it. Among Liszt's many whims is that of always helping himself to sugar with his fingers, disdaining sugar-tongs. When tea was brought in Liszt helped himself to sugar in his usual way. The Princess, who happened to be very near him, said to the footman who was carrying the tray, "Take away that sugar-basin and bring another." Liszt took no apparent notice of this insult, but went on conversing with those about him, taking several cups of tea, and seeming to enjoy them greatly. It was a warm summer evening, and the windows of the salon were wide open. When Liszt had finished his last cup of tea, he walked deliberately across the room to the nearest window, and threw his cup and saucer—the service being most magnificent and costly—out into the street.

"Good heavens, Mr. Liszt!" shrieked the indignant Princess, springing to her feet, "what could have prompted you to commit such a piece of Vandalism?"

"Madame," replied Liszt, with an air of the utmost simplicity and the most perfect sangfroid, "I had touched both the cup and the saucer with my fingers, and I supposed you would have considered them as defiled by the contact."—Corr. N. Y. Evening Post.

Mario as a Teacher.

It is well for the prosperity of the vocal art that such a teacher as Signor Mario is still before the public. It is well, too, for the same cause, that such music as Rossini's Barbiere is not altogether overlooked. Such a singer and such music are indeed constituted to uphold genuine Italian vocalization, in spite of the degenerate influence of Signor Verdi and modern operatic composers. Let us, however, do Signor Verdi and his laborers in the same vineyard justice.

Rossini wrote for nearly all the most accomplished singers of the age, singers educated in the best schools, trained after the best models, and severely tested before they ventured to confront public opinion. No doubt his own music had no small share in making the singers, more especially as he had a consummate knowledge of the capabilities of the human voice, and never—at all events while he devoted his genius to the Italian stage—would tax its powers to the utmost for the sake of effect. Rossini was, perhaps, more intimately acquainted with the means and resources of every kind of voice than any composer who ever wrote, excepting Mozart. He was himself a first-rate barytone, and, when a boy, was one of the treble singers in the cathedral of his native city. This early teaching, combined with wonderful quickness of observation, enabled him to create music for the singers which, without in the least concealing their powers, allowed them to produce the finest effects. That, nevertheless, his vocal compositions, for the greater part, were adapted to the means of popular singers, is well known; and hence, it cannot be denied that the singers had a certain influence on his music.

When Signor Verdi commenced writing for the stage, the vocalists in the legitimate Italian school were extreme rarities. He found vociferators instead of singers, and was compelled to accommodate his music to their capacities. It was suddenly discovered that a good voice alone was wanting to constitute the vocalizer; and Signor Verdi endorsed the discovery by writing compositions which required for their performance the smallest amount of art. Here was a chance for tyros. Why learn singing at all, when it might be so easily dispensed with? Why encounter difficulties, expend time and money, and waste one's best energies in close and severe application, when a reputation might be made by mere strength of lungs and a fortnight's discipline? It is wonderful how the "vociferators" came into vogue, and what influence they exercised upon composers. Signor Verdi, above all, "championed them to the utterance." The school of David, Tacchinardi, Garcia, Rubini, Galli, Tamburini, and others was gradually dying a natural death, and, as an inevitable consequence, Rossini's music, having nobody to interpret it, was falling into disrepute. Fortunately, now and then singers were found who added a desire to attain the highest excellence in their profession to natural aptitude and instinct, and who thus became preservers of the loftiest school of the vocal art. More fortunate still that some such legitimatists should have descended to our own times, and that we still can boast of Mario and Alboni.

The performance of the Barbiere, now being given at Covent Garden, cannot fail to prove entirely gratifying to those who pin their faith to pure Italian music and pure Italian vocalism. We might search back in vain to the first representation of Rossini's enchanting work for singing more legitimate and more perfect, for acting more easy, gentlemanly, and instinct with comic genius than may be found in Mario's Count Almaviva. The very spirit of Rossini and Beaumarchais are concentrated in his performance. And what a study for the singer! A tenor might learn from listening to Mario attentively one night, than from a dozen lessons administered by the most erudite professor. Such artists, indeed, have ever proved the indoctrinators; and it is matter for no small congratulation that after so many years passed in exerting himself to please the public, the great tenor should be enabled to exhibit his admirable talent with almost undiminished powers. The performance of Mario in Count Almaviva will have a twofold value for singers; it will teach them that the old school cannot be dispensed with, and that the voice may be best preserved by adhering to the best models. No tenor who knows his art is compelled to force his voice in the music of Almaviva, not because it is written less high than Signor Verli's tenor parts—which certainly is not the case—but because it lies so artfully for the voice, and because the upper notes are never called upon for extra exertion. In many parts of the Count's music the voice is taxed to the highest part of the register—witness the trio "Ah! quel colpo"—but a well-trained organ can take the passages without difficulty, and attack the highest notes without effort. Such is the effect of legitimate vocal music. We strongly recommend every tenor who wishes to procure a lesson in genuine Italian singing of the very highest value to go and hear Mario in Count Almaviva, cautioning him at the same time not to suffer his enjoyment to interfere with his instruction, which we acknowledge to be no easy task. Perhaps the best way would be to hear him twice, the first time for pleasure, the second for information.—London Musical World.

Church Music.

Rev. H. W. Beecher, in the Independent of August 27th, in a letter from "Mountain Rest, Matteawan," discourses as follows of church music:—

By the way, yesterday morning I was at the Methodist church here. A very pleasant room it is, and I am told that a very worthy society occupy it. But I have a most weighty charge to bring against the good people, of musical apostasy. I had expected a treat of good hearty singing. There were Charles Wesley's hymns, and there were the good old Methodist tunes, that ancient piety loved, and modern conceit laughs at! Imagine my chagrin when, after reading the hymn, up rose a choir from the shelf at the other end of the church, and began to sing a monotonous tune of the modern music book style. The patient congregation stood up meekly to be sung to, as men stand under rain when there is no shelter. Scarcely a lip moved. No one seemed to hear the hymn, or to care for the music. How I longed for the good old Methodist thunder! One good burst of old fashioned music would have blown this modern singing out of the windows like wadding from a gun! Men may call this an improvement, and gentility! Gentility has nearly killed our churches, and it will kill Methodist churches if they give way to its false and pernicious ambition. We know very well what good old fashioned Methodist music was. It had faults enough, doubtless, against taste. But it had an inward purpose and a religious earnestness which enabled it to carry all its faults, and to triumph in spite of them! It was worship. Yesterday's music was tolerable singing, but very poor worship. We are sorry that just as our churches are beginning to imitate the former example of Methodist churches, and to introduce melodies that the people love, and to encourage universal singing in the congregation, our Methodist brethren should pick up our cast off formalism in church music. It will be worse with them than with us. It will mark a greater length of decline. We could hardly believe our eyes and ears yesterday. We could not persuade ourselves that we stood before a Methodist church. We should have supposed it to be a good solid Presbyterian or Congregational church, in which the choir and pulpit performed everything, and the people did nothing.

Our brethren in this church must not take these remarks unkindly. They are presented in all kindness and affection. The choir sung better than many choirs in city churches, but no one sung with them. The people were mute. They used their ears, but not their mouths! But alas! we missed the old fervor—the good old fashioned Methodist fire. We have seen the time when one of Charles Wesley's hymns, taking the congregation by the hand, would have led them up to the gate of heaven. But yesterday it only led them up as far as the choir, about ten feet above the pews.

Conducting;—

A FEW PRACTICAL COUNSELS HOW TO LEARN IT.
BY HERMANN ZOPFF.

Conducting is a matter of experience. It is true, there are some qualifications indispensable for the conductor, but these are of no use, if they are not regulated and controlled by experience.

Necessary, general qualifications for the conductor are:

1. A good ear, not only for the different tones themselves, but also for a sharp distinction of the timbre of single voices or instruments. The best mode of acquiring this, is to investigate, at first, the character of the sound, the impression made upon our soul by every voice and every instrument. It is thus, only, one can successfully practice that distinction mentioned above.
2. Good and vigorous piano-forte playing.
3. A thorough knowledge of re-producing the full score on the piano.
4. Knowledge of all the keys, and ability to transpose.
5. A sure appreciation of time; and,
6. Resoluteness and affability toward the performers. As long as you are conducting, do not submit to any interference, even if it comes from the most intelligent of your performers; for such interference once tolerated, produces, pretty soon, the nice result, that every body is conducting. But it is a well-known fact that two persons can not conduct at the same time, without causing confusion among the performers. If the conductor commits a real blunder, let him cheerfully admit it. Everybody is liable to err. But if he blames the blunders of some of his performers, let him be careful not to compromise these by calling their names, or by addressing them personally. If it is a player, mention his instrument, if it is a choral singer, call out to the part in general as well as to the row in which the performer stands, but as soon as you are alone with him, criticize him severely.

Whoever wants to become a conductor, will do well by practising before the mirror a thoroughly distinct marking of time and parts of time. It is thus that he will soon learn to know whether he is liable to produce any of those ridiculous movements of body and arms which so often disfigure conducting.

Every beat must cross the air in a direction different from the preceding one, not too short and hasty, also not too slow and drawing.

Every direction of the baton must form one sole and decided beat. A timid proceeding, an interruption, or a repetition, will not do.

The change of the direction must form sharp corners: if not, it will result in an incomprehensible forming of circles, called in Germany, "coffee grinding."

Be careful not to beat every quaver, and content yourself, according to the quickness of the movement, during a measure, with four, three, or two beats, and in Presto with one. Only in a very slow movement is the marking of every quaver appropriate, but in this case, those which are not accented must be indicated by small beats while the accented ones are demonstrated by large beats.

The upper part of the arm must not move, it is best to move only the wrist, else the arm will be soon tired. Raise the elbow only in case you want to indicate some special accentuation, and where you intend to make an uncommon impression upon the performers. He who, while conducting, is constantly moving the members of his body or his whole body, will produce dullness and want of attention among the performers.

Beat always in such a manner that all can see the baton.

*For*te and piano are best indicated by larger and smaller beats, sforzati by a short and quick thrust. Every ferrnata is to be prepared by a rallentando. Hold up the baton as long as it shall last, and if you wish to stop it, turn your baton a little upward. If single instruments or voices have paused for some time and are to resume their parts, the conductor must previously look toward them, and give them a sign, which is best done by the other hand.

The conducting of singing is, in most cases, very poorly treated. The majority of the conductors of singing-clubs are either frightened, and, consequently uncertain, when conducting, or they do not thoroughly understand the nature of singing. It is for this reason that he who will make the above his speciality, ought to study first the peculiarities of singing, perhaps best by participating for a time in the performances of the choir. He will soon learn to know that, in singing, as well as in speaking, he gives at discretion his own self, so to speak, his own soul, to the ears of a great many persons. But this will produce a somewhat uneasy impression upon every singer who is not fully convinced of his own superiority, especially in case he has to sing high tones. He will feel constrained, and this feeling causes, very often, a false position of the throat, head, mouth, or tongue, for the right delivery of the tone. A careful conductor will know in such cases how to prevent this, at least how to lessen the evil. His ability with regard to this matter will be mostly tested when conducting a choir, especially a choir of ladies, who, being generally amateurs, feel often inclined to be inattentive, and moreover, not very regular in their attendance at the rehearsals, are apt to forget, and consequently feel frightened as soon as they have to sing a high tone or a difficult interval.

A little intelligence, a little power of observation on the part of the conductor, will soon remedy this. Conductors of choirs will always do well to be prepared for this, as singing is under any circumstances influenced by disposition of mind, and will therefore expect from their choir rather too little than too much, basing this latter estimation perhaps upon one single good performance. Choirs, especially small and mixed choirs, have, like a single person, their special disposition or temper. One day every thing goes finely, the other day the singers sing so badly, that one should like to despair. It is true, sometimes it is the frame of mind of the conductor, which unconscious to him, influences the singers. Ladies generally come with just as much pleasure as want of attention to the rehearsal. Every new comer, every appearance of a new solo part, every mistake in speaking on the part of the conductor, is likely to disturb their attention. If this increases too much, it is well to tell them that such a proceeding cannot fail to render the task of the conductor still more difficult. Further it is necessary not to repeat too often a place in a part where a blunder occurred, else soon the singers will be so tired of it, that pleasure and attention can be in vain exacted from them. But the conductor can obtain the same result in interspersing these repetitions by the rehearsal of other places and pieces. Constant corrections and interruptions also make them absent-minded and dull. It is much better to go straight through to a period, and then return with all strictness to the single blunders which may have occurred. Just as you must not fatigue one and the same voice too long by rehearsing some difficult passages, you also must not leave too long unoccupied any of the members of the choir. If, for instance, the whole choir of men (in a mixed choir) should for hours consist only of a few members, let them sing just as if the whole choir was present, in order not to cause in them the feeling of superfluity or non-estimation.

The sometimes wavering character of singing, caused by the breathing, the developing, and reposing of the tones, requires occasionally for the mixed choir a peculiar conducting. The Germans, for instance, exhibit such a virtuosity in reposing upon all tones suitable for this purpose, that necessarily strict time cannot be kept. Under these circumstances, it becomes urgent to beat the quaves so near to their eyes that they cannot avoid seeing them, at least occasionally, or to mark every weak part of the measure upon which another tone is to be sung with the same importance as if it were a new entry of a part. For the same reason let him give an energetic sign before all such measures, where a high tone, especially one of long duration, occurs as an indication that the preceding ones have to be quitted, and then, an upward turn of the baton to remind the singers of the approaching high tone. Besides, the conductor will soon experience that every sign to commence for the whole choir as well as for single parts, after they have paused for a while, will prove insufficient if the sign is not preceded by the drawing of a large circle with the baton, well seen by everybody; this proceeding which causes them involuntarily to breathe and to prepare for the singing, is often neglected by conductors, who are surprised if the wished for entry of the part is not forthcoming, and who unjustly blame the choir for this neglect, while they themselves are mostly accountable for it. If, sometimes, it will nevertheless not go satisfactorily, the conductor will do well to indicate himself the entry or single high tones,* or show by example how to sing very difficult passages, and if this still has no better result, let the passage be performed by a violin-player. It is an old experience of the greatest masters that a pure intonation cannot be better acquired than by the aid of a violin. As soon, however, as a satisfactory result has been obtained by one or the other of these means, the singers have at once to perform without them, and also occasionally without an accompaniment, in order to acquire independence and firmness.—N. Y. Musical World.

* Sometimes it will not be amiss to practice high tones, which have been constantly sung too low. In the beginning a little higher than they ought to be. If a difficult passage lies very high, one may also practice it at first half an octave lower. Every conductor must be able to transpose this much.

NIGHT HATH SONGS.—Have you never stood by the sea-side at night, and heard the pebbles sing, and the waves chant God's glories? or have you never risen from your couch, and thrown up your chamber window and listened to these? listened to what? Silence, save now and then a murmuring sound, which seemed sweet music then. And have you not fancied that you heard the harp of God playing in heaven? Did you not conceive that yon stars, those eyes of God, looking down on you, were mouths of song—that every star was singing as it shone, its mighty Maker, and his lawful, well deserved praise? Night has its songs. We need not much poetry in our spirits to catch the song of night, and hear the spheres as they chant praises which are loud to the heart, though may be silent to the ear—the praise of the mighty God, who hears up the unpillared arch of heaven, and moves the stars in their courses.—Spurgeon.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

No. XIV.

LONDON, June 21.

—So, here we are! The circle has come round like the long dream, long and varied, of a short summer night's sleep. Circle of twelve months making up the year that rounded itself before the mind illimitable in the anticipation. Circle of famous countries, France and Switzerland and Germany and Italy and France again, — the traveller's eager dream, which loomed so large and inexhaustible before him, and which now, suddenly, lies all behind him—hopes all changed to memories—a change as swift and hard to realize as the great change that has come over his own happy land at home,—or what was home. These scenes, with all their new experience of life and men, their contrasts of the picturesque, monotonous and grand in Nature, their historic monuments, their music and their Art, are past—past all, while this feeble attempt at a record and report thereof still hangs suspended and unfinished far back in these wintry days of Berlin, "made glorious summer," though, by Bach and Beethoven, and now that a few days of comparatively quiet, settled life have come at last, here is one more attempt to resume the broken thread of correspondence.

I shudder to think what a wide chasm of continual changes separates me from the point where I left off recording! The last letter was about Bach in Berlin, and recalled mid-winter. It is now midsummer! And since then, topic after topic has kept dropping down stream, while new countries, new interests, wonders, cares, have seized and possessed the mind in rapid, unremitting sequence, making it impossible to write. The Berlin musical winter is not yet half chronicled; and to this now must be added a month of musical life, most genial and social, in quaint old Leipzig; a pair of sunny Spring days, with an oratorio of Handel, and a revisiting of Raphael and Corregio in Dresden; an evening, a right memorable one, with Robert Franz in Halle; a trip up the Elbe, through the "Saxon Switzerland," and two days like a wondrous dream in one of the two most picturesque old towns of Germany, Prague (the other being Nuremberg, of which, too, there will be something to recall hereafter); a pleasant ten days in Vienna—too late for the great musical season, but not too late for the society and friendship of an earnest circle of young artists of the right stamp, who let me hear Beethoven's last Quartet, and other Quartets, in the way that one likes best to hear such things, the way in which one can come nearest to them and can enter into them; not too late for Wagner's Tannhäuser and Fliegende Holländer, nor for gazing with insatiable appetite up the Gothic tower and spire, the growing grandeur, (the type of the Infinite), of St. Stephen's; nor for the rich galleries of Art which Austrian emperors and princes have collected. And thereto must be added—if ever opportunity occurs—ten days of perfect sunshine, and of moonlight nights, in Venice, city of light, with silent streets of water, not a horse in it, save those four brass ones over the door of St. Mark's; most cheerful looking city, but the people very sober and not listening (despite their tuneful temperament) to the splendid Austrian band that plays in the square to idle soldiers and chance forestieri; a city sadly changed, yet nearly all the famous things remaining, or at least the outward forms thereof—the palace of the Doges, the inexhaustible beauty of St. Mark's, which seems to have floated up out of the magical caverns of the sea; the masterworks of Titian's art, too, and of Tintoretto's, Veronese's, Giorgione's, John Bellini's, Bonifacio's, and all those rare creations of the Venetian school, which has at length converted Ruskin. And then a day in Padua, fabulously old, which hints of Troy, with its rich old church enshrining the remains of good St. Anthony and its Giotto's chapel (!). Then past Verona, through the smiling plains of Lombardy, past the last famous battle-fields, and safe across the border, beyond Austrian soldiers, to breathe, refreshed, the free air of a new Italy, and enjoy the sight and sound and contact of its happy, courteous, lively, self-possessed, well-ordered, generous people in the stately city of Milan; where, as in Venice and in nearly all Italian places now, the only music is that of the streets and churches; but where the white cathedral, with its forest of arches, spires and pinnacles, and its population of some three or four thousand marble statues, yearningly lifts itself in the moonlight, the completest instance I have ever seen of Mme. De Stael's "frozen music." Here, too, were rare works of art; the Last Supper of Da Vinci, with the heavenly Christ head, and all the grand heads, soiled and worn, in the old monks's refectory; and the collection of the Brera, worth a long journey to see, if only for the exquisite frescoes of Luini, which are collected out of church and convent there, where they may be seen and do good, unlike so many famous pictures in churches, whose light is kept carefully under a bushel, withheld from the flock which the church would fain gather into its fold, and only exhibited for money to the curious stranger.

And still no chance to write! We must move on; again through battle fields, through delicate green, fragrant plains of Lombardy and Piedmont, to Victor Emanuel's capital, the centre of free Italy until Rome be free; most lively, bustling, political Turin, in the centre of a green plain, ringed closely round by bold snow Alps; and there we hear the tramp of broad ranks of boys and young men in the evening to the Garibaldi hymn; and there we see the first Italian parliament in session, and see and hear Cavour, looking so full of life and vigor,—so happy too, receiving every one's congratulations; never two minutes still in one place, but running about all over the hall, talking in the most animated manner with this one and with that one, now and then putting in a few words in the debate—face beaming with satisfaction and good nature—and had he not reason to look happy? for it was the morning after the great reconciliation of Garibaldi with him and with Cialdini. The last man one would have thought marked for early death; and yet in one month came the shock of that sad, sad news, which was to try the strength of Italy anew, and prove if she be fit enough for freedom to go on without a leader.—And then came Genoa, with its stately old palaces and hanging gardens; and time too short, too full at Florence; and three weeks, laden with the dream of centuries, in Rome—but there was no time to live all this so rapidly and to report it too—and there is no time now. One who has been through it is too much tempted to write down a barren list of names, like the above, since each mere name is so suggestive to himself; whereas to write down the suggestions would be to journalize to doom's day, and far beyond. The blossoms have fallen; but some fruits of all this rich year's experience are, I trust, ripening for the enriching of this our Journal in due time hereafter. At any rate, we can never again discourse of Music to our readers from quite so provincial a standpoint as before; although far be it from us to suppose that we have learned the lesson of Europe thoroughly.

And now, having heard no music to speak of since we left Vienna, in April,—save two or three indifferent operas in the smaller theatres of Italy (the larger were all closed); the Pope's choir, by no means equal to the Dom Chor in Berlin; the Italian street singing and guitaring, decidedly inferior to our "Ethiopian" serenading; and one memorable episode, which shall be told hereafter, an evening when we tracked the Roman improvisatori to one of their osteria haunts, and heard four men of the people, in their shirt sleeves, alternating rhymes in elegant Italian, to an old chant, Tityrus and Melibæus-like, with wonderful felicity and fluency, through out an hour or two; and also the wonderful orchestra of three instruments, which first accompanied the rhymesters, and then us in a chariot procession by moonlight to the Coliseum (!); to which add a graceful little operatic jeu d'esprit of Rossini's, the "Comte Ory," at the Grand Opera, on the return through Paris;—having fasted musically to this degree for two whole months, we find ourselves again in merry England, for the first time in London, where the season is still at its height, and one may hear more in three weeks than he can comfortably digest in a whole year.

This letter is too far spent, to commence the enumeration now; but in that of next week I shall have to tell of Symphonies by Philharmonic Societies; of Concertos (Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Moscheles, &c.) played by Pauer, Wieniawski, Moscheles; of Ella's Quartets and Quintets; of operas at Covent Garden; of Mario, Tamberlik, Roncone, Formes, Zelger, Belletti, Sims Reeves, Santley; of Grisi (still taking her farewell), Penco, Czillag, Carvalho, Rudersdorf, and perhaps "little Patti" who charms London ears as much as she did those of Boston in antediluvian days before the war. Also of the classical pianist, Charles Hallé, who is performing the entire series of Beethoven's piano-forte Sonatas in course. Four of them I go now to hear, and therefore close this letter. D.

LETTER FROM TROVATOR.

ST. PETERSBURG, RUSSIA, JUNE 10, 1861.—It has been my privilege for several years to communicate with the readers of Dwight's Journal, and during that time I have had the good fortune to date some of my letter from the great capitals of Europe, and from the delightful towns of that foremost land of song—Italy. But I little thought that I should have to write to them from the home of the Czars, of "Istwaschiks," of tallow and of all kinds of oily food.

Funny thing on an ocean voyage to watch the passengers. If any of them possess musical talent it is sure to leak out. The Adriatic on her last trip to its shame be it spoken had no piano on board and thus the passengers were deprived at once of much solace and a great deal of torture. Had we had instruments the trip would have been marked by some musical demonstrations, as we had among the passengers the Volpinis, soprano and tenor from Havana on their way to France, expecting to return in the fall. With them was a gentleman whose name I forget—an Italian—a Roman and as splendid a looking man as I ever saw—who was on his way to Italy to form a new opera company for Cuba. Though not a professional vocalist he sang a superb baritone, and enlivened the passage by trying to introduce several Italian choruses and comic songs, with the male passengers as choristers. One of the songs, adapted rather for the nursery than for the stage, and written. I should suppose in the Chinese vernacular and with a pretty little easy melody read as follows:

La tool-a-rool-a-ra,
La tool-a-rool-a-ra
La tool-a-rool-a-ra-ra-ray La (high note) toor-a-rool-a-roo (low notes) ditto. ditto.
Ching-ching-ring-ching-a-ring-ching
Ching-ching-ching-ching-ching
La tool a rool, &c.

In the "ching" portion of this touching aria the singer would direct his closed finger at various members of the audience as if he was about to throw pepper into their eyes. What all this meant nobody seemed to know, but they laughed quite as much as if they did, and probably more.

Another favorite was something of the "theme that Jack built" style of sentiment, with a pretty refrain to the words "Entra dolci o non famale;" and another, a patriotic song "Siarra fratelli" with a chorus and the words after each line "all'armi, all'armi." Of course the extempore choristers sang ridiculously bad; and as usual in such cases there was a little man who, too scientific to confine himself to shouting the melody with oi polloi made up a painful tenor, while another tall gaunt creature in spectacles made gestures with the arms and grunted out a prodigiously funny and mightily incorrect bass.

The musical notes gathered in a hasty business trip, through Europe from Galway to St. Petersburg can be but few and weak. In England, there was the opera at the Concert Garden London, where a week or two ago, Grisi began another series of six farewell performances. She has so often announced her farewell appearance, that on the present occasion but little faith is placed in the advertisements; and indeed there is no more reason for her retirement now than there was five years ago. I heard her sing in Lucia and while she of course acted superbly, her voice seemed to have regained much of its early power. It is simply absurd to say that Grisi is "worn out." She is yet an incomparable artiste, and her present performances at London would do no discredit to her palmiest days.

Ronconi was the Alphonso; another superb actor, but his voice is so far gone that he has to take the most annoying liberties with the music, altering whole phrases to suit his limited compass. Tiberini sang the tenor, but he has not exactly hit the fancy of the Covent Garden audience, and though he sings with care fails to elicit much enthusiasm. Nantier Didier, the contralto was good. It is worthy of notice that all these vocalists have sung in the United States.

And now the United States is repaying the musical debt. You have undoubtedly before this, heard of the success in London of Adelina Patti, who debuted in Sonnambula, made a hit and followed up her success with Lucia. She is just now "the rage" of the English metropolis, and Mr. Strakosch has, I understand, effected an engagement for her at London for several seasons yet to come. In the interim she she will visit Paris and probably other continental cities. The English critics praise her acting as highly as her singing, and her success in all the departments of a prima donna's profession may well excite the envy of the old London favorites.

Adelaide Phillips is in London too, and has crossed the ocean to recruit her health, exhausted by a recent illness in Cuba. She will probably obtain engagements at some of the European theatres before leaving for home, and may not return until the settlement of our political differences render the United States more desirable for musical artists to remain in.

At Paris there is nothing specially new going on. Old operas and old singers are entertaining in those musically disposed.

At Berlin, I had a pleasant call on Meyerbeer, who by the way, is not as well posted up in musical matters in America as he might be. He did not know much about our opera houses, or musical people. He remembered William H. Fry, to whom however, he did not allow just originality as a composer, but knew no one else in the musical ranks of America, excepting Maretzek. As he asked me for the name of the best musical composer now in the United States I gave him that of George W. Bristow which name he repeated several times till he learned it by heart.* He asked about the music publishers and of course I mentioned Oliver Ditson & Co.; Hall & Sons, Firth & Pond and others, but the names were so odd that I don't believe he now remembers one of them, as they seemed to puzzle him from their vast difference to German and French names. Meyerbeer is a delightful man in conversation, very unpretending in his manners, and free from any affectation of eccentricity in which so many great men indulge.

The Berlin opera house has so often been praised and has been so recently described in your columns by Mr. Dwight, that I will only say it deserves all the praise which has been bestowed upon it. Yet it is not surprising that in this very home of classical music, in Berlin itself, the opera house should just now be devoted to Verdi, and that poor dear abused "Trovatore" should be played here when the operas of Gluck and Wagner are in existence? Ah! scoffing and ridiculing after all don't kill the vitality and real popularity of the Italian melodic opera in Germany any more than in the United States.

In my next I will give some account of the musical affairs of St Petersburg. TROVATOR.

* The question would have puzzled us. We are glad, however, that our lively correspondent had an answer so ready. Ed.

CHICAGO, JULY 3, 1861.—The Philharmonic Society was organized last autumn. Mr. Balatka, for years a resident of Milwaukee was induced to remove hither and assume the duties of the post of Conductor. The first season of eight monthly performances has been brought recently to a successful close. The orchestra is small numbering less than thirty members; but under Mr. Balatka's careful drill, they have managed to produce some of the Mozart and Beethoven Symphonies in a very satisfactory manner.

The Musical Union are practising the choruses of Elijah with great assiduity. Mr. Geo. F. Root has been elected conductor. But as he is now at the East nobody officiates in his absence. The Pianist of the Union, Mr. Wade, having gone to the country in pursuit of health, the duty of accompanist has devolved upon Miss Tillinghast, occasionally upon Mr. Bird.

The Mendelssohn, and the Glee and Madrigal Societies have very pleasing rehearsals. The following is the programme of Miss Tillinghast's Organ Concert which took place last evening in St. Paul's Church.

1. Overture to Anna Bolena. (Organ). Donizetti
2. Prelude and Fuga, No. 2 of the set dedicated to Thomas Atwood, Composer to H. B. M.'s Chapels Royal. Mendelssohn
3. Strike the Lyre. T. Cooke
Sung by Messrs. Ballingall, Leonard, Fullerton and Cox.
4. National Hymn, with Variations for the Organ. Rink
5. Oh Thou to whom this Heart. W. V. Wallace
Sung by Mrs. Mattison.
6. Grand Sonata for the Organ, Allegro Mod. e Serioso; Adagio—Andante Recit—Allegro Assai Vivace. Mendelssohn
7. Pity Oh Saviour. Stradella
Sung by Mrs. Mattison.
8. Andante from C major Sym., arranged for the Organ. Beethoven
9. Fantasia for the Organ, on Luther's Choral "Ein Feste Burg." Fehllenberg

Miss T's command of the pedals is considered as not the least noteworthy point in her execution. If any of your young organist readers wish to try it on, let them take Concone's vocalises, and practice the voice part with the Pedal coupled to the 15th of the great Organ, and the accompaniment on the Choir or Swell. The stringed instrument triplet allegro runs with which the Anna Bolena Overture opens Miss T. uses with capital effect as a pedal Solo, the Organ full to the sequenters and coupled. While writing, the Evening Journal comes in, containing a notice of the performances which I append. It will be necessary to explain that Mr. De Passio took Mrs. Mattison's place in the seventh number of the programme, on account of her "provoking hoarseness."

Miss Tillinghast's organ concert last night, was a complete success, musically, and was, without exception, one of the very best concerts of the season. Miss T. delighted and astonished all with her wonderful executive ability, and despite the character of the place, received a hearty applause which could not be restrained. Mrs. Mattison, although laboring under a provoking hoarseness, sang with her customary excellence. De Passio did the "Prayer of Stradella,"—Pieta Signore—splendidly. De Passio is one of the most careful, conscientious and artistic singers in the country.

We regret that this is the only concert of the season Miss T. will give, if the one of last evening is a sample. It was certainly one of the most delightful musical entertainments ever given in the city.

The new Trinity church has been completed and is soon to be furnished with a new organ from some of your establishments.

ATLANTIC MONTHLY.—In the present number Mrs. Stowe continues her new story, "Agnes of Soeronto," which might as well have been called Agnes of Marblehead. It smacks but little of Italy thus far, beyond the Italian names of the Yankee characters, and some rather far-fetched and labored attempts at descriptions of natural scenery. Mrs. Howe contributes an admirable poem "Our Orders" and Dr. Holmes an interesting article on "Sun Painting and Sun Sculpture." "The Ordeal, by Battle" is an able paper on matters of present interest. We regret to learn that Professor Lowell no longer has charge of the Atlantic, which has been much indebted for its success to his various and accurate scholarship, his unerring judgment and good taste, and his brilliant contributions to its pages. His successor should be a man of no small calibre, and will have no easy task to make good his place.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Madame Schröder-Devrient, the Great German lyric artist, whose name will forever remain coupled with the character of Leonora in Beethoven's "Fidelio," tells of an interesting incident connected with this impersonation. While she was studying the part, she could never render that scene to her own satisfaction where she suddenly confronts the Governor, while threatening her captive husband with death—with, "First kill his wife!" and presents a pistol at him. She thought she could imagine the wife's feelings in this trying situation and her fancy had made a sketch of the scene, which she tried to act out, but after trying, she felt that there was something wrong in it, though not knowing what. She despaired of giving to the public a striking portrayal of the great scene. The certainty of failure at this point caused her much uneasiness. When the performance took place, this feeling nearly unfitted her to begin her duties. The nearer the dreaded moment came, the more she trembled inwardly. When it came, the thought, that she would not act truthfully, caused her to visibly tremble all over and to come very near to the verge of fainting away. How much was she astonished, when the whole house shook with a tempest of applause, and, afterwards, when she received the loudest and most general praise for this involuntary piece of acting! Of course, profiting by this lesson, although keeping her secret to herself, she ever afterwards rendered the scene as near to the first performance as she could.

PARIS.—The right of authors are strictly guarded by the French tribunals. M. Rely, director of the Theatre Lyrique, was recently sued by Mlle. Rivay, for breach of contract. It seems that she composed an opera called "Maitre Palma," which has been performed at his theatre, without, however, any great success; he had directed her to prepare a new one, entitled "La Croix Blanche," and had guaranteed her forty representations. He, however, failed to produce it, and set up in defence that the dramatic censorship had greatly modified the work, and had changed its title to that of "Gaston." It was, therefore, not the same as that which he had ordered, and he was on that account not bound to produce it. But the tribunal finding that, after accepting the opera, he had wilfully delayed the production, ordered him to pay the plaintiff 1,000 francs as damages for the injury she had already sustained; also to represent the work within a fortnight, under pain of paying her a further sum of 5,000 francs.—Phil. Sunday Transcript.

"TANNHAUSER" AT THE STADT THEATRE.—The house was crowded in spite of the intense heat which prevailed on the evening of the performance. To play and sing the music of "Tannhäuser" in a temperature of 90 degrees in the shade, with the additional heat of the gas-lamps and—the music, is no joke; in fact, it is one of those herculean undertakings which the present generation can undoubtedly feel, but that can be thoroughly appreciated only by the future. When we looked at the orchestra, led by Mr. Bergmann with all that vigor and love for his subject for which that gentleman is distinguished, when we saw all of them literally bathed in music, we could not help feeling admiration for the heroic little band, especially, as somebody whispered to us, that their labors were more an affair of love and friendship for their conductor than anything else. And when we saw the Pilgrims march and sing under these very aggravating circumstances, and the soloists, Mrs. Berkel, and Messrs. Quint, Lehmann, Graf, Friedeborn, and Lotti, enthusiastically struggle against the pressure from below, above, and everywhere, we felt convinced, in spite of the late memorable performance of the same opera at Paris, that "singing under difficulties" was never carried to a greater extent. Well, the public, at least, were thankful. They welcomed the old and familiar music with hearty and thoroughly appreciative salvos of applause, a result, a part of which must be undoubtedly attributed to the fact, that the Venus-scene in the first act, and the combat of the singers in the second act, were omitted. To make up for this deficiency, an act of Herold's "Zampa" was given; and if music ever fell flat, meaningless, and trashy upon the ears of listeners, it was that of Herold's charming little opera on this occasion. Can we, after this experience, felt by every musician present, wonder, that the Parisians, who are brought up and constantly fed by this kind of music, failed to appreciate Wagner's "Tannhäuser?"—N. Y. Musical World.

PORTUGUESE MUSIC.—The music which the Portuguese play on their wire-strung guitars, consists principally of waltzes, landums and the accompaniments of their molinhos, which are really beautiful and national. The waltzes are chiefly of their own composition, and are generally very pretty, and strongly tinged with the national languishing expression. The landums are more particularly Portuguese than any other of their music. Their guitar seems made for this sort of composition. To be well played, it is necessary that there should be two instruments, one of which plays merely the motivo or theme, which is a beautiful and simple species of arpeggio, while the other improvises the most delightful airs upon it. In these, full scope is given to the most musical and richest imagination possible, and they are occasionally accompanied by the voice; in which case it is usual for the words also to be improvised.

This kind of music is always of an amatory, melancholy nature; to such a degree, indeed, that it frequently draws tears from those hearers whose hearts are more tender, or who find in the words of the musician something analogous with their own situation.

It is customary that in an improvised mondinha, strictly speaking, the words, as well as the music, should begin with a motivo, to which all the rest shall have a reference. One of the most famous and popular of the native composers was Vedegal.

There was a time when this composer could have made a considerable fortune, so great was his talent, and so much was he sought after by the best company: but unfortunately, though a great natural genius his talents were confined so exclusively to music, that, as if to balance his extraordinary share of this gift, he was totally destitute of that most necessary of all qualities—common-sense. To whatever company he might be asked, professionally, if the most profound silence did not reign in the room, if any one breathed even too loudly, his harmony would be discord; and rising in a violent passion, he would quit the company, calling them all brutes. On one occasion, a lady who was troubled with a severe cough, and who, to enjoy the pleasure of listening to his improvisations, had been suppressing it even to pain, at length burst forth; when Senhor Vedegal, although he must have been aware of the cause, rose in a passion, and beating his guitar to atoms on the back of a chair, rushed out of the room, uttering maledictions on her for the interruption. Such singular behavior naturally led to his exclusion from good company, and he was obliged to live by getting up occasional concerts of his own, where he might, with impunity, break as many guitars as he judged proper.

The Portuguese piano-music is chiefly that of Bon tempo, the Mozart of Portugal. Although different opinions prevail as to his compositions, his powers of execution were indisputably very great. Marcos Antonio Portogallo has composed some fine pieces, amongst which his "Ritorno di Sese," and "Il Morte di Mitridate," stand very high, and when well given, produce a very fine effect.

A custom prevails, which is connected with music, and which is very striking. Immediately after sunset, the evening bell is heard to toll for the "Ave Maria," or hymn to the Virgin. Groups of people are instantly seen to assemble in front of an image niched in the wall of some house, with a lighted lantern before it, of which there are numbers in almost every street. In some of the streets, the singing, which is in parts, is really very beautiful; we instance the "Rua Esperanca," where there is a fountain, which is always surrounded by "Galegos," or water-carriers; at this moment all of them quit their barrels to join in the general chorus, and base, as well as tenor voices, are frequently heard here, which would not disgrace a concert-room.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Adelina Patti has killed Guillaume Tell—we mean the success of La Sonnambula has been so great, as to necessitate the withdrawal of Rossini's masterpiece. Well let us not grumble. We have had Guillaume Tell performed already seven times this season, and are likely to have it performed two or three times more. Ten representations of one opera in a season is of very rare occurrence. The second performance of the Barbiere on Saturday showed Mario again in delightful voice, and warbling the "golden couplets" of Almaviva like a nightingale—a Rossini-ol. Being a subscription night, the theatre was crowded in every part, although the Barbiere is not so great a favorite with the fashionables as the Trovatore—a thing hardly to be accounted for, since Count Almaviva is the very pearl of a gentleman, while Manrico neither musically nor dramatically is gentle in any way. Perhaps the Troubadour is preferred because of the contrast he presents to themselves in placidity and graciousness of bearing. Manrico may have the same fascination for the ladies which the Gypsy Guitarist had some years ago at Norwood. We cannot think, nevertheless, that the music of "Di quella pira" can exercise the same power over sensitive minds as that of "Ecco ridente."

On Monday La Sonnambula again, as attractive as ever, with Mlle. Patti ravishing one half the house, and converting the other half, who had gone to hear her, sceptical as to all the reports about her, and now had to enrol themselves among her most enthusiastic admirers. Signor Tiberini is almost entirely extinguished in the dazzling brightness of the young and ardent prima donna.

The third of Mad. Grisi's "Farewell performances" took place on Tuesday, when the Huguenots was given for the first time this season. We have heard more complete and powerful performances of Meyerbeer's grand work, but Mario's splendid singing, and more than magnificent acting, would have made amends for a thousand times greater drawbacks. His voice had all its pristine beauty and charm—and what voice was ever like it for quality and sympathy of tone?—and he seemed to have gained a renewal or super addition of strength, if we may judge from the force and volume he displayed in the septet in the duel scene. The duet with Valentine (Act 4), however, is Mario's crowning achievement; and here literally he created a furor, and the plaudits rained upon him so thick that he was compelled to appear twice before the curtain—with Mad. Grisi, of course—before it could be appeased. Mad. Grisi, nevertheless, did not allow the great tenor to monopolize all the applause, but won them for Valentine individually, when no Raoul was present. It would be impossible for Mad. Grisi to go through a performance without indicating that power and genius which have long placed her name highest among modern dramatic singers. Valentine, though not vocally suited to her style, is, on the whole, after Norma, Semiramide and Lucrezia (we might name perhaps Anna Bolena), her grandest achievement. Here and there—now unfortunately more than ever—the music is too high for her; but, generally speaking, the part is one in which her means and her talents find ample scope for display. The audience, determined to let no consideration interfere with the current of their sympathies, applauded their old favorite vehemently in every scene, and took no cognizance of short comings.

Mad. Miolan-Carvalho makes one of the most brilliant of Queens, and Mad. Nantier-Didé is one of the most effective of pages; while M. Faure sustains the character of St. Bris with dignity and power, and Signor Polonini does all he can to allow the mantle of Signor Tagliafico to fall becomingly on his shoulders in the part of Nevers. The Marcel of M. Zelger has been enlogized more than once in these pages; but why the part should not have been given to Herr Formes, who reckons it among his most powerful achievements, baffles surmise.

The band and chorus were unusually excellent, and the "Rataplan" chorus, this time, thanks to the correct singing of Signor Lucchesi, who sang the solos, escaped the customary sibilation.

LYCEUM THEATRE.—The performances of Italian opera which for some time past have been advertised to take place at this elegant little theatre—under the direction of Mr. Mapleson, late factotum of Mr. E. T. Smith—commenced on Saturday night. The opera was Il Trovatore, given, so far as the principal singers were concerned, in such a manner as left nothing to desire. This will be readily understood when it is added that Mlle. Titiens was Leonora, Mad. Albani, Azucena, Signor Giuglini, Manrico, and M. Gassier, Ferrando; while the part of the Conte di Luna was undertaken by a new barytone—Signor Delle Sedie, who created so favorable an impression at one of the recent concerts of the Philharmonic Society. An orchestra of some 45 performers, conducted by Signor Arditi, and a chorus of average strength, materially aided the effect of the representation, which was further enhanced by a "mise en scène" that would have done credit to any theatre.

About the Trovatore itself we need say nothing. By this time it is almost as well known to frequenters of the Opera as the Barbiere di Siviglia or Don Giovanni, and if its popularity should happen to prove as enduring as it has been sudden, the critics of "the future" will be justified in allotting it a place by the side of those undisputed masterpieces—as a work that (if nothing more) has outlived the "fashion" of the period at which it was originally produced. Nor is it requisite to devote a column to the performance of Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini, seeing that the Leonora of the one and the Manrico of the other are, to the musical world of this metropolis, "familiar as household words"—the result of an experience to which the "four sea-ours" have, almost in an equal measure, contributed. Since the operatic waters were first troubled by Mr. E. T. Smith, it is difficult to state specifically at what precise period of the year Mlle. Titiens has not, from time to time, been singing (magnificently) "Tacea la notte," and Signor Giuglini pouring out his vocal soul, with outstretched arms, to the melting strains of "Ah! si ben mio." No more, then, will be expected from us than a simple record of the fact that on Saturday night Mlle. Titiens—singing and acting her very best—once again triumphantly proclaimed herself the most superb Leonora, without a single exception, that the Anglo-Italian stage has witnessed; that Signor Giuglini never sang the music of Verdi's romantic and inexplicable hero with greater sweetness and expression; and that the efforts of both accomplished artists were never more thoroughly appreciated or more enthusiastically applauded. Far less familiar to the operatic public, but equal and in some respects superior to either, was the Azucena of Mad. Albani. It has been too persistently maintained that the music given to the Gipsy—"that inauspicious and ghastly woman" (vide English libretto)—can only properly be "screamed;" but it is the privilege of Mad. Albani to vindicate the reputation of Signor Verdi, by showing that the music of Azucena may be sung—and sung, moreover, with as much ease as if it had proceeded straight from the fluent and graceful pen of Rossini himself. Mad. Albani, indeed, both sings and declaims the part of Azucena to perfection. Not merely in the unaffected melodious phrases of "Stride la vampa," and "Si la stanchezza," does she illustrate the truth, that in the mouth of a genuine mistress of the art of singing every phrase intended for the voice becomes naturally "vocal," but even when (as in the scene where Azucena narrates her adventures to Manrico) each successive phrase is declamatory, she manages so to temper declamation with the element of vocal expression, that her performance never ceases to be purely and absolutely musical. For this reason alone it is calculated to exercise a charm in which that of other artists of the highest rank—not excluding Mad. Viardot, who exhibits with such terrible minuteness all the melodramatic peculiarities of the character—has been more or less wanting. Signor Delle Sedie made a good impression as the Conte di Luna, especially in the romance, "Il balen," which, though robbed of its native simplicity by a slight excess of ornament, he sang otherwise remarkably well, amply meriting the encore that, as a matter of course (when was "Il balen" not enquired?), he obtained. The other encores were for the "Miserere" (Mlle. Titiens and Signor Giuglini)—an irreproachable performance in every respect—and "Ah! si ben mio," which Signor Giuglini gave with true and refined expression. A more efficient representative of the subordinate, but by no means unimportant, part of Ferrando than M. Gassier has not been witnessed. At the end of each act the principal singers were recalled.

After the opera the National Anthem was given—the solo verses by Mlle. Titiens and Mlle. Albani. The house was well attended.

On Tuesday Lucrezia Borgia was given with a cast nothing inferior to that of the Trovatore, comprising Mlle. Titiens as Leonora, Mad. Albani as Maffeo Orsini, Signor Giuglini as Gennaro, and M. Gassier as the Duke. It is not necessary to go through a performance so well known, nor point out its many striking features, such as Mlle. Titiens's transcendent singing of the air "M'odi, ah! M'odi;" Albani's Brindisi, one of the most perfect vocal efforts ever listened to (of course encores); Signor Giuglini's pathetic singing of the tender and graceful music of Gennaro, just suited to his style; and the very admirable singing and acting throughout of M. Gassier. No wonder indeed that the house was crowded in every part; no wonder that the favoritism was divided between the two ladies; and still less a wonder that the audience were enchanted from first to last. Il Trovatore was repeated on Thursday for the second and last time.

This evening Verdi's last opera Un ballo in Maschera is announced with a cast, including the names of Mlle. Titiens, Mad. Gassier, Mad. Lemaire, Signora Giuglini and Delle Sedie and M. Gassier. Next week, therefore, we shall be enabled to state how far Signor Verdi has succeeded in obliterating all recollections of Auber's Gustavus the Third.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—Although the series is now drawing rapidly to a close, there being but two more concerts to complete the present season, the public interest in no way diminishes, nor is there any falling off in the enterprise and judgment which have all along so strongly characterised these entertainments. No sooner has M. Vieuxtemps abdicated the post of leader, which he had so honorably maintained ever since the beginning of the year, than he is succeeded by M. Wieniawski, also a fiddler of the very highest pretensions, further attraction being, moreover, added in the shape of a fresh pianist, M. Nicholas Rubinstein, who made his first appearance here on Monday last, and performed Beethoven's "Sonata appassionata," and was recalled. The programme was selected from the works of Beethoven, and, in addition to the sonata, included the Quintet in C major, Op. 29; the quartet in F major (No. 1, Op. 59); and trio in B flat major, for piano-forte, violin, and violoncello (Op. 97)—the latter for the first time here, being the sixth and last of Beethoven's piano-forte trios—dedicated to the Archduke Rudolph. M. Wieniawski, who was received with great enthusiasm, was well seconded by Messrs. Ries, Webb, Hann, and Piatti. Mr. Sims Reeve's singing of the exquisite "Lieder Kreis," and elegant ariettes, "The Savoyard" and "Stolen kiss," produced the accustomed impression.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The seventh concert took place on Monday last, when the following programme was given:—

PART I.—Sinfonia Eroica (Beethoven); Romanza, "Perchè dell'aure" (Torquato Tasso) (Donizetti); Concerto, violoncello (Kraft); Aria, "Qui la voce" (I Puritani) (Bellini); Overture (Ruler of the Spirits) (Weber).

PART II.—Sinfonia in A major, No. 2 (composed expressly for the Philharmonic Society) (Mendelssohn); Cavatina, "Largo al factotum" (Il Barbiere di Siviglia) (Rossini); Concerto in C minor, piano-forte (Beethoven); Duet, "Dunque io son" (Il Barbiere di Siviglia) (Rossini); Overture (Figaro) (Mozart). Conductor—Professor Sternedale Bonnett.

A magnificent instrumental selection, with one exception, though for some ears somewhat too familiar. The violoncello solo was entirely out of place, and was utterly bad. Signor Pezze, a capital executant, did all he could to render it agreeable to the audience, but to no purpose. The effect of the performance was a decided inclination to somnolency. In fact, Kraft's concerto is a work of little Kraft, by which we do not mean Kraft fils. Had the piano-forte concerto been placed where the violoncello concerto was, and the latter eliminated from the programme, an immense advantage would have been gained. Moreover, the directors departed from their usual routine by the introduction of two concertos into one scheme. The piano-forte concerto was played by Mr. J. F. Barnett with great power and expression, and elicited cheers from all parts of the hall. No success could be more decided or better deserved. The singers were Signora Guerrabella and Signor Delle Sedie. The lady had been heard before in London, but not in so public an arena as the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society. She gave the air from the Puritani with considerable boldness of style and dramatic energy, and evidently made a "hit." Signora Guerrabella's proper theatre, nevertheless, we fancy, would be the stage, where her forcible manner and vigor would find ample scope for display. Signor Delle Sedie gave the romanza from Donizetti's opera with remarkable finish and a command of the upper tones very unusual in a baritone. We did not altogether fancy him in the air from the Barber, nor did the duet from the same opera exhibit both artists in the most attractive light. The last concert is announced to take place on the 24th instant.—London Musical World, June 15.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Our good ship sails to-night, my Love.

Emile Berger. 25

An uncommonly pretty song, the words of which have a more than ordinary significance in the present times. This will no doubt contribute to make it popular; but the music itself is sufficiently striking to direct attention to it.

Up with the Flag of the Stars and Stripes.
War Song. Words by H. W. Story. Music
by N. Ravnskilde. 25

A song which a patriotic son of Massachusetts, travelling in Italy, wrote, when he heard the news of the glorious uprising of the Freemen in his own country. A friend, a young Norwegian artist, inspired by the subject, composed music to it, such music as no composer would be ashamed of, and the manuscript, by the agency of a kind hand, found its way across the water to the publishers. The words are printed in another column.

Instrumental Music.

Darling Nelly Gray. Varied. R. Schroeder 25

Simple Variations on a very popular melody, pleasant and instructive. Teachers will recollect Schroeder as the author of the well-known Variations on the Swiss Boy and several others.

La Reveille. Grand March Militaire.

Carl Meyer. 25

A very brilliant Concert March, rather difficult. It is quite indicative of the brisk step of the soldiery when marched to the battle-field, full of life and animation. The Trio has fine melodious strains. Altogether amateurs fond of a good show-piece will find much pleasure in the practice of this piece.

Immortellen Waltzes. Four hands. Gungl. 75

One of the finest sets of modern Waltzes; an uninterrupted chain of beautiful melodies, now jubilant and joyous, then again subdued and plaintive, the whole prefaced by a slow and impressive March in memory of Johann Strauss, who had just died when these Waltzes were composed. Two good players can enchant any audience with these strains. They are not difficult but must have the true whirl of the Waltz, in order to be fully effective.

Books.

THALBERG'S L'ART DU CHANT. (The Art of Singing applied to the Piano.) Handsomely bound in Cloth. 3 00

The Piano cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, but the player may overcome this imperfection with address and skill. How this may be done, the great Player has shown in twelve Transcriptions. The melody is engraved in large notes, so as to stand out and be recognised easily. They are all fingered, and are as invaluable to the accomplished pianist as to the student, who could get at the root of the marvellous effects which Thalberg produced in his playing.

Teachers and Methods of Teaching.

It is manifest that, in order to attain the object of musical education, the choice of a teacher is highly important to the student, while the choice of the most sure method of teaching is equally so to the master. So many parents know not how to help themselves in this regard—so many respectable well-intended teachers are anxious to ascertain and rectify, if needful, their methods of proceeding—so many scholars have already been led astray or ruined, in a musical sense, either by a mistaken choice or an erroneous system, that we have considered it to be our duty to suggest a few hints on this subject. We give only a few hints on the principal points applicable to the matter in general. A fundamental improvement cannot be arrived at by a book; it must be the result of a more elevated education of the teachers, by institutions of the state, and through a real enlightenment of all educated persons on the nature and necessity of music.

The profession of music is highly important, from the powerful influence this science exercises on our senses and on our spiritual and civil life. Parents should weigh well, in the choice of a teacher, that power is given him through his art over the mind of their child; that he may elevate the youthful mind to the most noble sentiments, or defile and lower it to the most grovelling; how prejudicial it is merely to leave the mind vacant, while music is acting irresistibly upon the sense and the mind. Listlessness, thoughtlessness, sensibility, vanity, unbridled passion, may be implanted and fostered by the teacher of music; but we may also be indebted to him for awakening and cherishing the noblest powers and sentiments of the soul.

From the foregoing, it would appear that the weightiest point to be considered, in the choice of a music master, is, what influence may be expected from him on the mind of his scholar. His good manners, however necessary, are no sufficient guarantee for suitability. But, indeed, the high and pure sense in which he has formed his conception of art, and the degree of his general capability and education, which enables him to transfer his conception to his pupil,—all this must be maturely pondered. But the choice made, boldly and with full confidence give free hand to the teacher. Half confidence, interference in the instruction, would only disturb the efficiency of the master.

We must, therefore, with regard to music, consider in the first place, what view the teacher takes of it, and what motive urges him in his employment. The mere technical man, who uses art simply as handicraft, will produce nothing but a handicraftsman. The player, from understanding, will give cold lessons and perceptions; he can give technicality with ease and certainty, but he will never warm the heart with inward fire; he will rather rob it of its natural warmth. The mere man of feeling will perhaps allow the scholar to sympathize in company with him, but never insist upon sure instruction. Art is not mere technicality, nor mere understanding, nor mere feeling. It is the expression of the whole whole man; and only he who embraces it in its entirety can ingraft and rear its true nature and power. Talent and knowledge, a feeling heart, and a rational consciousness of the reality of the nature and operations of art—these are indispensable qualities of a teacher of music. One of the signs of his artistic standing—we must repeat a former observation—is the works at which he and his scholar are employed. A teacher who occupies himself with small worthless compositions, in lieu of the abundant masterpieces of our art, shows the inferiority of his position, and a poor estimate of art. There are indeed, masters who limit themselves to approved works, on the sole authority of the name, without taking any lively interest in them; in this case, certainly, their instruction can be but of small benefit. The next general qualification which a teacher indispensably requires, is the faculty of working with decision and effect on the mind and disposition of his pupil. The mere capability of playing himself a piece of music with propriety and effect, does not here suffice. It may delight the scholar, it may move or excite him, it may induce him to a successful imitation, and even, perhaps, finally to a more or less noble and happy manner; but will not create himself a free independent feeling, and conscious certainty in art. It is not necessary only that the teacher should enable the scholar to play whole compositions as he does himself, but that he lead him into the composition itself—that he enable him to see and comprehend thoroughly each unity therein, their combination and mutual dependence, and their constitution as a whole. A bright consciousness only of the nature of art and of the contents of each work of art, advances the pupil to a free comprehension and performance peculiar to himself, and conducts him by his own productions to the summit where individuality of the artist and nature of the art join in conscious union, and give style to his creations. Only such a method of instruction works beyond the circle of lessons which he has run through. If the scholar has seized the essence of the matter, he will not hold it fast in studies and forms only, which the teacher has worked out with him; he will seek and seize it everywhere equally when the master is absent. This is the true life in art; this alone guarantees that the exercise of art will not cease with instruction, but will adorn the whole of life. For this object there is required on the part of the teacher, deep insight, extensive knowledge, and in both such ability and certainty that he can comprehend and explain his subjects under all their aspects. A teacher must know more, much more than he is required to teach; he must be everywhere at home, and perfectly master of his subject, in order to be able to answer every question, and supply every unnoticed deficiency.

After the elementary and technical instruction, we require absolutely from a good singing and piano master the study of composition, as the sure, if not the only means of penetrating with full consciousness into the recesses of art. We require of him an extensive and well-grounded knowledge of the masterpieces of art of elder and modern times; and strongly recommend a continually observant and sympathizing eye on new productions, in order to acquire every movement in artistic life, even although masses of unsuccessful or retrograde composition should make the duty burdensome. The higher teacher, especially one who is concerned in the education of composers and teachers or conductors, ought not to delay his acquaintance with the history of art and the science of music, besides his study of fundamental composition; since everything, and therefore music, can be perfectly known and fully understood only by the help of its history.

To the properly artistic capacity and education must be added the knowledge of mankind, and the talent of working upon the minds of others; but then, also, love of the business of instruction, and a heartfelt interest in the advancement of the scholar. An able master studies the disposition and inclination of his pupil. He judges from them, how he may be won, how convinced, upon what qualities he may rely, where he wants assistance, and by what other powers his deficiencies may be compensated. He does not consider himself as another being, foreign to his pupil; he neither presumes on his own superiority, nor lowers himself to his pupil (both false methods of teaching), but penetrates with his higher ideas and education into the mental condition of his pupil; comprehends as it were, from the soul of the young disciple the conceptions he has acquired of the art and its forms; he here separates by his superior knowledge, the true and healthy from the soft and insufficient; he encourages, expands, and exalts the former, and corrects and amplifies the latter. In short, he endeavors to originate or unravel every desirable faculty in the pupil himself, because only that which is engendered in and grows out from ourselves, not that which is brought to us from without, is vital, and works with the energy of life.

Such a teacher will lose courage only in the case of total indifference or absolute incapacity; or much rather, with our feelings, he would decline the scholar. But each single deficiency, every erroneous or one-sided conceptions, he knows how to meet. If the feeling of measure cannot be trusted, or is perhaps confused by earlier teachers, the master will prescribe very simple lessons of determined rhythm, and then make rhythmic—melodic variations on them, so that the pupil will proceed on the same simple lesson from simple rhythm to more rich, placed together and increasing in difficulty. If the sense of tone be undeveloped, the teacher will apply the earlier to the practice of chords; first the major triad, then the chord of the dominant, lastly the major and minor chords of the ninth (major chords always before minor) by ear on the piano, and then have them sung by the pupil. For since those chords are the first indications given by nature herself, one of her tones helps the imperfect feeling of tone in the student, to the other; and the most important intervals, such as the octave, fifth, fourth, major and minor third, minor seventh, whole tone and semitone, will be gained from the laws of nature. If the scholar has a strong partiality for brilliant and off-hand playing, the teacher will fall in with this inclination (since to oppose it abruptly would rather alarm than overcome), and by gradually shading the passages, separating and binding, changing the forte and piano, &c., in a manner comprehensible and agreeable to the scholar, he will make the latter perceive how one and the same passage may, by different playing, become newer, more attractive, now more neat and delicate, and then more forcible, &c. It will now be easy to take a more noble direction from this point, and to awaken the deep sense of melody. Should the intelligent element assume a pre-eminence, let us profit by it to comprehend and seize with more intimate feeling, accentuation, which is the nearest associate to rhythm, in relation to the understanding. Let us penetrate, into the innumerable degrees of accentuation, and awaken thereby the conviction that musical matters are not exclusively the business of the understanding, but that it is often necessary to trust to feeling only. Hence it is easy to see that feeling must have free operation, and participate of right in musical composition and performance. If, on the other hand, the scholar should be inclined, perhaps from enthusiasm, to devote himself to the unknown feeling, let that noble power of the soul be respected and upheld which lies at the foundation of this one-sidedness. Let us apply to heartfelt compositions, and with preference to those whose effect has been already experienced, and point out the chief traits which have caused our emotion; illustrate occasionally such passages, by comparison with similar or dissimilar instances, or by changes which would rob us of our power of tenderness. Should our sensibilities be excited, as is generally the case with superabundant feeling, by melody, chiefly or exclusively, we will apply gradually to movements in which a captivating chief melody is met by a leading passage full of character, or where two or more highly interesting melodies combine and proceed together. In so far as the pupil, either by himself,—or induced by the teacher, can be brought to notice in each of the significant parts that which has hitherto exclusively occupied him, he is on the way to elevate himself above the one-sided, obscure and overworked feeling, to a higher consciousness, to a more comprehensive and fruitful spiritual sympathy.

It is impossible here to accumulate all the counsels and advantages arising from a perfect intimacy of the master with the mind of the pupil. It is enough, if, from a few examples, we have made ourselves clearly understood.

That there are now but few teachers, such as we require for so many scholars, is true. But this is, however, no refutation of the justice of our demands; it is only a sign of the insufficiency of our supplies for the requirements of our consciences; and proves a concurrent striving for a recognized good, according to our power. It cannot also be denied, that often persons, clear-sighted enough in general, instead of selecting the obtainable good masters, procure others far from proficiency, out of thoughtlessness, want of knowledge of the parties, or other secondary considerations. Here, however, the reproach falls on the musicians and teachers themselves, who have given themselves but little trouble in enlightening the public in general on the true nature of their art and the means of acquiring it—a conviction which has had great part in the production of this book.

We must also notice another erroneous idea concerning instruction. It is the deceptive notion, often repeated, that for the beginning an inferior teacher is sufficient. This persuasion often arises from the wish to save for some time the cost of a good master. But we must consider this opinion as an erroneous delusion. The unskilled master lays a bad foundation. He delays the fundamental elements and exercises upon which all future progress must be founded. He neglects the awakening and expansion of the natural dispositions, gives a false direction to all artistic procedure, and misuses or destroys the pleasure and activity of the scholar. The succeeding better master finds a scholar half tired out with wandering hither and thither without profit or reward. He meets everywhere with only imperfect or false preparation, and he finds difficulty enough in exciting attention and activity in the scholar for the attainment of an object of which this latter imagines himself to be already possessed. What teacher, under these circumstances (and they are of frequent occurrence), does not wish that no instruction had been given—that he might freely and with good heart build upon fresh and unencumbered ground; and how many a gifted scholar has abandoned art in disgust, when he has discovered, after years of labor, that in order to succeed, he must begin again from the beginning.

In conclusion, it is the method itself of teaching which claims our consideration. In this matter, after every necessary qualification as to the ability, we will limit ourselves to one fundamental requisition, which seems to us important and comprehensive, and which to the reflective teacher will develop itself so advantageously in every direction, however simply it may be expressed. The teacher must constantly bear in mind that he teaches an art. Consequently he must treat his scholar and the subject of his teaching in the sense of an artist and of art, and prove himself to be an artist.

He must also constantly show to his scholar that love and respect which are due to his fellow artist and to every one engaged in higher and intellectual occupations.

He will foster and elevate the disposition of the pupil of art. Artistic activity must flow spontaneously from the heart, if it is to fructify into life; we cannot force even ourselves into its possession, much less others. The pleasure we derive from it is therefore the first and indispensable condition of all success in this region; and the teacher who knows not how to preserve and increase it will certainly miss his aim. He must, however, awaken true pleasure in the art itself; not false pleasure—vanity, desire for reward or profit; and, in order, indeed, that the student may become constantly more susceptible of her pleasures and more capable of producing them, he must moreover excite his pupil to a worthy use of his powers by an encouraging word, by a well-timed performance of the works of art, &c.

The following point is most worthy of consideration. Art is not abstract thinking,—it is not feeling without thought nor unconscious activity; neither should the teaching be an abstract combination. Every lesson, every rule, must be derived from nature herself before the eyes of the pupil, and immediately, if by any means possible, reduced to practice. That this is practicable in teaching composition, we think we have shown from the fact in our Doctrine of Composition. It was one of the most unartistic aspects of the earlier art of teaching, when all possible intervals and all possible chords were thrown before the pupil in a heap together, and then all the forms of counterpoint in small unartistic passages, before the application of any of them was sought for. Most, indeed, of the books of instruction give no application at all. Nature and the history of art point out another way. Wherever a free course has been open to reason, she has immediately proceeded to the absolutely necessary, and in art to the actual practice, without delay. She has followed reflection by holding fast that which the moment required, and so in every instance she has elevated her mode of action into consciousness, her thoughts into living incarnated operation. Such also has reason, proceeding by facts, by real operation. Such also has been the development of art—entirely according to reason, proceeding by facts, by real operation, as her history, properly understood, demonstrates.

Also, in the practice of music, this fundamental proposition is thoroughly practicable. The total system, the system of notation, the arrangements of rhythm, are so entirely according to reason, that every scholar, under the gentlest guidance of the teacher, can unfold them further from their first intimation, and can again discover them for himself. It appears to us one of the crudities of the usual mode of teaching, to burden the scholar with the whole tonal system at once, then (or even before, as some books of instruction do*), with the whole system of notation (and perhaps in several clefs of the same time), then with the whole system of bars, while for the moment he wants only the smallest part of them: such as a few notes in one clef, leaving the remainder to be acquired on further advancement. By this misapplication, the scholar is withdrawn from immediate living and improving comprehension to an unartistic work of memory. It follows, therefore, that the order of these books of instruction, which merely present the materials of instruction to the memory, should also illustrate and complete their work; and not doing so, can have no claim to be considered an order or plan of really practical instruction.

Even the exercises, whose immediate object is to produce readiness of hand and voice, must not only be brought into the service of the hand and the observant understanding, but also be used for the pleasurable feelings of the scholar, whenever practicable, so that what he has learned may as soon as possible be applied in artistic form. From these considerations we cannot look without hesitation upon an invention lately introduced, to make beginners practice upon finger-boards made of paper. However convenient and cheap this may appear, it is evident that artistic participation must be injured, or, to say the least, not excited or vivified.†

* They therefore teach the sign before the thing signified, so that their notation is objectless, and must remain incomplete until we become acquainted with tones.

† This manner of teaching was adopted in Berlin by the late Mrs. Schindelmesser and Dr. Lange, so far as the author knows, with good result for the quick attainment of technical readiness. The scholars perform the exercises on paper or real keys (without strings), while another person produces the

This is the true doctrine, which, in the smallest and the greatest, holds fast and advances the reality of art, and upholds the student from the lowest up to the pinnacle—however high he may be able and willing to climb—in perfect artistic sympathy and activity. But this is possible only to a teacher, who, himself an artist, is replete with the spirit of art.

Franz Schubert.

FROM THE GERMAN, BY THEO. HAGEN.

Of Schubert's Songs, none are, perhaps, so popular as those which are known under the title "Die Schoene Müllerin," words by Wilhelm Müller (born 1795, died 1827). This cycle contains twenty-five songs, of which, however, only twenty were set to music by Schubert.

Each of these songs forms in itself a perfect whole, although it is only a part of the whole cycle. The idea of musically illustrating certain feelings and sensations, in all their stages of development, Beethoven, too, has expressed in his "Liederkreis;" but, besides the difference in the subjects, the treatment by Beethoven must be considered more according to the strict rules of the classical school, while Schubert, in his Müller Songs, displays all the charm of true romanticism.

Next to the "Müllerlieder," is the cycle "Die Winterreise" (The Winter Journey), words also by Müller, to which our attention is called. It contains twenty-four songs, mostly of a dark and melancholy character. Schubert read the proofs of the second part of this cycle only a few days before his death. A great interest is attached to his "Songs of Ossian." In these the composer was to give warmth and life to the fogs and cold of the unfriendly fields of Caledonia, to illustrate in vivid colors, the roaring of the rapid stream, the stillness of the heath and the moor, the playing of the Will-o'-the-wisp, and the storming call to the hunt, as well as to musically picture long and descriptive poems like "The Night" and "Loda's Ghost," in such a way as not to become monotonous. If we look at the masterly treatment of this difficult subject, as done by Schubert, then only nineteen years old, as well as at the intimate knowledge of right accentuation and prosody he exhibited in them, we do not know of any other composer who, under similar circumstances, could have done as well as he did.

Just as the first chords of the Ossian Songs remove us at once to a desolate and misty land, so, again, it is the atmosphere of romanticism and mediæval knightdom which we breathe in listening to Schubert's illustration of Scott's "Lady of the Lake," "The Pirate," and "Richard Cœur de Lion." He never misses the appropriate expression for the most varied and strange subjects and situations, and just as he hits upon the right tone for the poems by Scott, so does he make us feel, in his treatment of the two poems, "Suleika," the sultriness and the fragrant of the sunny Orient.

Some of the most well-known and charming songs of Schubert are those which he wrote in the latter part of his life, and which, numbering fourteen, were published under the title "Schwanengesang" (Swan's Songs). It is among these that we find his last composition, "Die Taubenpost" (Pigeon's Post) as well as his popular Serenade.

The songs by Schubert are a world in them-sound on a real instrument. The progress of the pupils, at all events, gives evidence of the talents of the otherwise already advantageously-known teachers, and if youth is to be taught in large masses where an instrument is not to be had, or if the unpleasant sound of technical passages is to be avoided, this plan furnishes, perhaps, the most, the best remedy. But it must be allowed that a method of practice so abstract that the scholar does not hear himself—in which he himself produces no sound—that music, which he is to learn and bring forth, he is only to hear by the operation of another: such a musical exercise cannot be so animated and animating as the living sound which the scholar himself produces, and therefore feels with greater vivacity and judges of by his own feelings. But then, must all the world learn the piano? must it be taught in masses? and is not technical skill in inseparable union with true musical practice, and therefore to be acquired before everything audible? The author hopes to publish soon in another place, and after a future more minute investigation, a more extended disquisition on this subject, and he will freely and joyfully retract his objections if any good grounds should appear sufficient to destroy their validity.

selves. There is scarcely one phase of human life which has not found its musical expression in them. Love and hatred, joy and sadness, defiance and resignation, gentleness and anger—every passion, as given to men—has been illustrated, and the deepest secrets of the human heart are brought to light, sometimes in tones of sweetness and tenderness, but often, also, in those of deep and mighty passion.

A large list of Schubert's songs was formerly in the hands of his friend and admirer Pinterics, and is now owned by the music-publishing house of Spina, in Vienna. It contains 505 numbers, but is said not to be complete.

Of the songs for more voices, by Schubert, only the smaller part are strictly vocal, the others are with obligato accompaniment of the pianoforte the guitar, the melodeon, and the organ. They are for three, four, five, and eight voices; there are also double choruses among them, for men's and female voices alone, but mostly for mixed chorus, with and without solo.

To songs without accompaniment belong the following ones for men's voices: Jünglings wonne Liebe; Zum Rundetanz und Die Nacht (Night), words by Matthison; Die Flucht, by Lappe; Rauberlied, An des Frühling, Fischerlied, Der Entfernten, Der Wintertag, and the Quartet—"Es rieselt klar und wehend"—sung for the first time at the inauguration of the tablet of memory on Schubert's house of birth, in Vienna. To these strictly vocal songs must be added the Canons a tre, composed in 1813; The Gravedigger's Song, Elysium, by Schiller, for two tenors and bass; Holz's Mai Song, for two sopranos and bass; Chorus of the Angels, from Faust, composed in 1816; Trio on the occasion of the birthday of his father, for two tenors and bass; Duo, Abendroth, by Kosegarten, and Klage um Aly Bey, each for three voices; Prayer, by De la Motte Fouque; and the Dance, quartets for mixed voices; the 92d Psalm, in Hebrew, for two baritones, soprano, alto, and bass, composed in 1828; Song in the Open Air, by Salia, quartet for men's voices, composed in 1817; "Wer Lebenslust Fühlet," quartet for two sopranos, tenor, and bass, composed in 1818. Further, the choruses; Das Grah, by Solis; Bergknappenlied, Trinklied vor der Schlacht, Schwertlied, Punschlied im Norden zu Singen, for two voices; Jagdlied, by Zacharias Werner; Lützow's Wilde Jagd, composed in 1815; Der Morgenstern and Jägerlied, by Korner, for two voices and two horns; Battle Song, by Klopstock, for three voices; and the beautiful double chorus, for men's voices, Schlachtlied, by Klopstock, composed in 1827.

To those with obligato piano-forte accompaniment belong the well-known quartets for men's voices:—Das Dorfchen, Die Nachtigal, Geist der Liebe, Wider Spruch, Der Gondelfahrer, Im Gegenwartigen, Vergangenes, Nachtgesang im Waile, Frühlinglied, Naturgenuss Nacht-musik, by Seckendorf; Trinklied, from the fourteenth century, from the historical antiquities, by Ritsgraff; and the Boating Song, from Scott's Lady of the Lake. Further, the two comical trios—The Lawyers, for two tenors and bass, and the Wedding Meal, by Schober, for soprano, tenor, and bass; An die Sonne, quartet for mixed voices, composed in 1816; Der Schicksalslenker, Gott in Unge witter, Gott der Weltschöpfer, Hymne an den Unendlichen, Gott in der Natur, also for mixed voices; the Psalm "Gott ist mein Hirt," for female chorus (four voices); Nachthelli and Standchen, for solo and female chorus; Der Mondenschein, by Schober, quintet for men's voices (two tenors and three basses); Coronach, Death's Song, from Scott's "Lady of the Lake," for two sopranos and alto; Miriam's Siegesgesang, for soprano and alto, solo and mixed chorus; at last, the chorus for eight men's voices, "Schlachtlied," by Korner; and also the "Hymn" for eight voices; this last one, also, with accompaniment of wind instruments.

The following songs for several voices are with accompaniment of the orchestra:—The chorus "Auf den Sieg der Deutschen," accompanied by violins and violoncellos; Song of the Spirits over the Waters, by Goethe, chorus for eight voices, with accompaniment of violins, violoncellos, and bass-violos, composed in 1817; and the cantatas Der Frühlings morgen, Empfindungs Aeusserungen des Wirtin-Institutes der Schullehrer Wiens für den Stifter und Vorsteher der selben, Domherrn Spendu,* for solo, chorus, and orchestra, composed in 1818—1819; Glaube, Hoffnung, und Liebe (Faith, Hope, and Love), for men's and mixed chorus (accompaniment of wind instruments), by Reil, which has, unfortunately, not been preserved; Prometheus, composed in 1816; Die Erweckung des Lazarus, Easter cantata for singing and orchestra, of which, however, only the first part was composed (in 1820); and Volkslied, by Deinkartstein, for chorus and orchestra, performed in February, 1822, on the celebration of the birthday of the Emperor Franz. The same song was published in 1848 as "Constitutionslied" (Song of the Constitution), and is as such designated, with op. 157, in the catalogue of Schubert's works.

Besides these cantatas Schubert composed, in 1827, one with Italian words, in honor of Miss Irene K., for two tenors and two basses; further, "Saenger, der vom Herzen singt," for soprano, tenor, and bass, composed in 1819, and the one for men's voices, in honor of the jubilee of the Conductor Salieri.

It is a matter of course that there is not attached to these songs for several voices by Schubert, that deep and general interest which is felt for his Lieder, although some of the former do belong to the best that has ever been written for this branch of music, and Der Nachtgesang im Walde (Night Song in the Forest), Nachthelle,† Miriam's Triumphal Song, and Chorus of the Spirits over the Waters,† stands unrivaled in the whole literature of this class of compositions.—N. Y. Musical World.

* The longest title, probably, ever given to a cantata, as may be seen from the English translation—"Uttering of Feelings of the Members of the Institute of Widows of the School Masters of Vienna for the Founder Director of the same." This cantata consists in a solo for bass, a solo for soprano (the wife's) chorus of the children, solo of the mother, a duo between the widow and an orphan, a solo of the bass, chorus of the widows, again, a solo for bass, and a quartet for mixed voices. The piano score was written for Ferd. Schubert. Perhaps this cantata is worthy the attention of our Professors of School Music.—TRANSLATOR.

Sketches of French Musical History.

XVII.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC IN FRANCE.

The Chanson, Vandeville and Comic Opera—these are French par excellence; instrumental music on the contrary—the quartette, the symphony—is essentially German. That which affords the highest gratification in France are the clearness, precision and neatness of the idea; hence the saying of Fontenelle; Sonate, que me veux-tu? is still in vogue in spite of the partisans of pure music, which certainly has great value, when it is the expression of happy ideas skillfully developed, but which limits itself to mere scholastic exercises, when it is but the servile imitator of foreign masterpieces.

Surely, notwithstanding honorable efforts made in our country instrumental music ready belongs alone all to Germany, the fatherland of scenery and fantasy. We must bow then before the immortal symphonies of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven—the masters who have reached the highest flights in this elevated, sublime form of pure music. Still we ought not to pass in silence the works of our compatriots, who have devoted themselves to this class of composition—though they have been but little encouraged and inadequately recompensed in our positive and material age. The names of Gossec, Reicha, Onslow, Reher, Berlioz and David, have a real and incontestable worth; they have then a right to the consideration of both artists and amateurs.

Gossec, father of French instrumental music, was born at Vergnies, a village of Hainaut, Jan. 17, 1733. He began life as a choir boy in the Antwerp Cathedral, but afterwards came to Paris having no other resources than the direction of the orchestra of La Popelinere, the Farmer General. Having first exhibited his powers under Rameau he took to the composition of symphonies. The first were published in 1754,—the same year in which was composed the first symphony of Haydn.* As with all new things, the importance of these works was not at first felt; but after a few years, the public of the Concert Spirituel began to enjoy the vigorous forms of harmony and instrumentation, before which the overtures, which had preceded them soon began to give way.

After the reform of La Popelinere's orchestra, Gossec entered into the service of the Prince of Conti, as Director of his music. His first quartettes appeared in 1759, and his Mass for the Dead, was executed the following year in the church of St. Roch, with a prodigious effect. Gossec also tried his powers in dramatic writing and his opera, Les Pécheurs, was successful; but he soon returned to his natural vocation.

In 1770, he founded the Amateurs' Concert, directed by the chevalier St. Georges. Down to this time the most extensive scores were composed but of the four string instruments with the occasional addition of two hautbois and to horns.† Gossec in his 21st symphony in D, added to this combination, the contrebass, flute, clarinet, bassoons, trumpets and kettle-drums. The effect was very remarkable. In 1773 and the four following years, he directed the Concert Spirituel enterprise; but the greatest service rendered by him to French music was the institution of the Royal school for singing, which preceded that of the Conservatory. It was founded in 1784 by the Baron de Breteuil, with Gossec as director, who had conceived its plan and gave in it excellent instruction in harmony and counterpoint. The national fêtes of the Revolution opened a new field for the talents of Gossec. It occurred to him to accompany the hymns and choruses sung in the open air, with wind instruments, and thus obtained remarkable effects. Appointed inspector of the Conservatory in 1795, Gossec actively co-operated in the organization of this establishment and in the preparation of most of the text books employed in the course of study. During his twelve years service as professor of composition, he formed many distinguished pupils—such as Catel, Audrot, Dourlen, Gasse and Panseron. He was admitted into the section of music at the formation of the Institute and decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor upon the foundation of the order. He was pensioned in 1815, but continued to frequent the sittings of the Academy of fine Arts until 1823, when his faculties began to fail. He then retired to Passy, where he died tranquilly, Feb. 16, 1829. Son of a laborer, this patriarch of the French school formed himself entirely by labor and the study of good models.

Anton Reicha, was born at Prague Feb. 25, 1770, and musically educated by his uncle at Bonn. At the age of sixteen years he directed the performance of his first symphony. In 1794 he settled at Hamburg, where he gave lessons for five years and wrote the music to a French opera text—Godefroid de Montfort. By the advice of M. de Fombrune, an exile, he journeyed to Paris whither he arrived at the beginning of 1799, and where he made a good impression by a symphony played at the concerts in the rue de Cléry. After this discouraged by the successive closing of the theatres Feydeau and Favart, he went to Vienna, where he enjoyed the friendship of Haydn, Albrechtsberger, Salieri and Beethoven. He here published thirty-six fugues for the pianoforte, constructed on a new system, which consists in making the answers in all the notes of the scale. The approach of war caused his return to Paris, in October, 1808. The performance of one of his symphonies at the Conservatory again attracted the public attention to him. He then devoted himself to teaching composition in which field he labored with great success. His "Traité de mélodie," published in 1814 does not exhibit genius; it was seldom consulted; but his "Cours d'Harmonie," which was followed in 1824 by a "Traité de haute composition," was very soon in the hands of all musicians; Reicha succeeded Mehul as professor of counterpoint at the Conservatory; and wrote some excellent quintets for wind instruments.* Upon the death of Boieldieu, he was placed in the vacant chair of the Institute, but died soon afterwards—May 28, 1836, regretted for his social virtues by all who knew him personally.

* NOTE BY THE TRANSLATOR.—It will be seen a few paragraphs on, that these so called symphonies were at the most octettes—while Haydn's first was a real symphony; for a full, though small orchestra, and in the true Sonata form. It is this which gives Haydn claim to the title of "Father of the grand Symphony."

† M. Poiselet must mean in Paris; for Handel in England had long before employed trumpets, drums and flutes in his scores—and perhaps other instruments.

George Onslow was born at Clermont, in Auvergne, July 27, 1784. He was of English descent on his father's side, but his mother, de Bourdailles, was of the noble family of Brantôme. Under the instructions of Hullmandel, Dussek and Cramer, Onslow became a talented pianist. He remained, however insensible to the operas of Mozart, and had his musical sense awakened by Mehul's Overture to Stratonice. He now gave himself to the study of the violoncello and carefully studied the structure of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven's quartettes and quintets. His Opus I, consisting of three quintets for the violins, viola and two violoncellos, was published towards the end of the year 1807. He then wrote a sonata for the pianoforte, three trios, and an "opus" of quartettes after which he studied with Reicha. His operas, L'Alcade de la Vega, le Colporteur, and le Duc de Guise, obtained but a moderate success. His symphonies were not warmly received at the concerts of the Conservatory; for his music while it possesses great scholastic merit, is often deficient or even wanting in musical ideas. His orchestration proving colorless and dull, especially when compared with that great German symphonists, Onslow thenceforth confined himself to the composition of quartettes and quintets for stringed instruments, a class in which he achieved a considerable and merited reputation.† Passing most of the year on his estate in Auvergne he found there the leisure and tranquility necessary for his serious and continued labors. He came up to Paris during the winters to produce his new works which were always remarkable for their improvement in style. Onslow had the honor of a seat in the Institute.

His successor in the Academic chair was M. Henri Reber, a modest artist, and like the Germans devoted to music for its own sake. He was born at Mulhouse in Alsace, Oct. 23, 1807, and entered the Conservatory at Paris in 1828, as a pupil of MM. Jelempurger and Seuriot. He was allowed to compete for the prizes the next year, and ended his course of study under Lesueur. In 1835 and following years Reber published an Ave Maria an Agnus Dei, a quintet and three quartets for stringed instruments. These remarkable productions made the young composer favorably known. MM. Seghers and Batta placed their executive talents at the service of the master. The two trios for pianoforte violin and violoncello (op. 8 and 12) are distinguished by the form and connection of the musical ideas as well as by the ideas themselves. The second trio in E flat is admirably written, the first movement is melodious and vigorous, the scherzo neat and elegant, and the energetic finale in the old style is a worthy crown to the whole, various pieces for two and four hands, and six waltzes for pianoforte and violin are little masterpieces of true poetry; the themes are free and natural, the harmony correct and striking. All this has real worth.

The "Pirates Chorus," the "Captive" (sung by Gerald), "Hai Luli," the chanson of Thibaut Conte de Champagne, "Bergeronnette," "les Stances à Malherbe," "l'Echange" (so well declaimed by Wartel—all these little pearls of melody gives Reber a just claim to the title of the French Schubert. The beautiful overture to "Naim" and the two symphonies executed at the Conservatory worthily close our list of his instrumental works. For the theatre we are indebted to M. Reber for a ballet "le Diable Amoureux," next a comic opera "la Nuit de Noël," a charming work in German style, "Le Père Gaillard," which obtained a substantial success, "les Papillotes de M. Benoit" and "les Dames-Captaines."

His enemies or rather those who envy him (for what composer of talent does not meet with envy?) accuse Mr. Reber of being rococo, old-fashioned and obsolete in style. I find, on the contrary, in his retrospective tendencies but a healthy protest against the abuse of the noise, confusion and bombast of the modern school. Certainly, the old school had not at its disposition the richness of orchestral effects which we have. But, it must never be forgotten, that melody is the living soul of music. Reber, as successor of Colet, professor of harmony at the Conservatory, has gained a new title to the consideration of artists. The cross of the Legion of Honor bestowed upon him in 1854, was rather a tardy acknowledgment of his great deserts.

Hector Berlioz was born at Côte-Saint-André, in the Department of l'Isère, December 11, 1803. He was destined by his father to the medical profession, but the young composer preferred the dry problems of harmony to the works upon anatomy and therapeutics, which were put into his hands. When sent to Paris at the age of nineteen, Berlioz showed a similar preference to the conservatory and the opera over the Medical Schools. He immediately copied the scores of Gluck; and became enthusiastic over the "Danaïdes" of Salieri. He entered the class of Lesueur and at the same studied the arts of counterpoint and fugue with Reicha. Afterwards, wishing to try his hand at dramatic music, he wrote to Andrieux asking for an operatic text on the subject "Estelle et Nemorin." The Academician refusing his request, one of Berlioz's comrades offered his services. From this association of youthful talents, resulted but a very mediocre work, soon thrown into the fire. A mass executed not without much difficulty at the church of St. Roch, though honored by the best energies of Mad. Lebrun, had a similar fate. Berlioz burned a number of manuscripts which seemed to him entitled to the honors of the auto de fé. After an unsuccessful trial for the prize of the Institut, Berlioz was called home by his family, but his vocation for music caused him to return to Paris. He was now deprived of the allowance previously made him by his father and gained a subsistence by teaching the flute and guitar, until he successfully completed for the place of a chorist at the theatre des Nouveautés. By the assistance of friends he at length gave a concert made up entirely of his own compositions. The programme contained the overtures of "les Francs-juges," "Waverly," a "Scène héroïque grecque" and "la Mort d'Orphée." The members of the orchestra, with their usual kindness(!) left at midnight, upon the pretext that their rules compelled this, leaving the concert unfinished and the composer in a state of exasperation easy to conceive. Their unexpected departure gave rise to the story next day that Berlioz's music put to flight the musicians engaged to execute it. The unlucky composer was all the more sensible to his misfortune, as his heart was at the time consumed by one of those burning passions, which arouse one to the production of masterpieces or plunge into despair. A blonde Ophelia had made real to the fiery Hector the sweet form of his poetic reveries.*

The cantata "Sardanapalus" opened the road to success for Berlioz. The work, expected at a concert of the conservatory, before his departure for Italy, was appreciated as it merited. His "Symphonie fantastique" was also played for their first time at this concert. This remarkable work paints all the phases of a passion through a succession of false joys, cruel deceptions, the fury of the jealousy and strange visions.

In Italy Berlioz wrote "Lelio ou le Retour à la vie" a monodrama which should be considered as the complement to the Symphonie fantastique. Upon its execution at the Conservatory in 1833 it gained an immense success, thanks to the sincere enthusiasm which was then excited by the revolution. The symphony "Harold en Italie" written with alto principal so affected the celebrated Paganini that the day after the concert he sent to its author a present of 20,000 francs, with a letter declaring him the successor of Beethoven. At the request of the Count de Gasparin, Berlioz composed his "Requiem" which was executed for the first time at the Invalides, Dec. 5, 1837, in commemoration of Gen. Damremont.

"Benvenuto Cellini," text by Auguste Barbier and Leon de Wailly, badly received at Paris, is at present a stock piece in most of the German theatres. On the day when the remains of the victims of July were brought in triumph to the Bastille, a monster orchestra, increased by the voices of 10,000 spectators swelled forth to the astonished crowd the magnificent tones of the "Apotheosis." The symphony of "Romeo and Juliet," notwithstanding occasional prolixity, contains many fine passages. The treatise on Instrumentation published in 1841 is an excellent theoretic work. During his travels in Germany Berlioz composed "la Damnation de Faust," a work given with success in Russia. Returning to London he wrote "The Fight into Egypt," under the pseudonym of Pierre Ducré. That preface to "l'Enfance du Christ" opened to him at length the doors of the Institut, where he took the seat of the regretted author of the "Châlot."

We add to complete the list of this master's works, a "Te Deum" for three choirs, orchestra and organ, executed under the direction of the author in the church of St. Eustache—the cantata "Imperiale," written for the distribution of prizes of the Paris Exhibition of Industry—"le Cinq Mai," a work commemorative of Napoleon I.—many choruses with orchestral accompaniment—the overtures of the "Corsair" and "Carnival Romain," works full of strength and color—divers collections of melodies among which are to be noted "la Captive," "le Jeune poète Breton," "la Belle Voyageuse" and "l'Absence"—two very curious books entitled "Voyages en Allemagne et en Italie" and "les Soirées de l'orchestre"—the remarkable feuilleton of the "Debats" Journal, and a grand opera in 5 acts, entirely the work—both text and score, of this Delacroix of music. Let us close by saying that in M. Berlioz, the honor of the private man and the impartiality of the critic, are above all question.

Felicien David was born March 8, 1810, at Cadenet, a town in the Department of Vaucluse, was left an orphan at the age of five years, and was brought up one of his sisters. As the child sang with marvellous correctness, some amateurs persuaded the family to present him to M. Garnier, first Oboe player at the Grand Opera, then spending his vacation in the neighborhood. That skillful instrumentist saw at once the vocation of the child, and he was sent to study at the Jesuits' college, working with an attorney of the town, David then nineteen years of age, directed the music in the Cathedral, and composed motets with full orchestra and hymns with organ accompaniment.

The next year he came to Paris and studied with Reber, Fetis and Benoit. In 1830 the young artist joined the Saint-Simonites. The new apostle now wrote for Menilmontant twenty choruses of which most are very remarkable. After the condemnation of Saint-Simonism, in 1833, David embarked at Marseilles for the Bosphorus. He anchored before Constantinople and was soon after cast into the dungeons of the Seraglio. After an exile in Smyrna he visited Jerusalem, Alexandria, Memphis, and afterwards started for Beyrout across the desert. To the strong impression made by this journey which was full of strange adventures the art owes the magnificent production of the "Ode-Symphony," which has placed David at a single step in the rank of creators in this line of art. "Le Desert" is in fact a work sui generis full of poetry and oriental color. Everything is expressed in it from the immensity of nature to the measured step of the camel. It is one of the most remarkable masterpieces of the nineteenth century.*

"Moïse au Sinai," "Christophe Colomb," "L'Éden," "la Perle du Brésil" are the great works of this master. We find in the flowing and transparent melodies, an orchestration elegant, sonorous and always clear. "Herculanum" a grand opera first given at the Theatre Lyrique under the title "la Fin du Monde," and afterwards represented at the Imperial Academy, has led to a due appreciation of the science of M. David both in the use of the voice and orchestra. We hope that the next seat of the Institute will be given to this illustrious man—this man of a genius peculiar and creative—something rare to all ages. We add that the world owes David two very beautiful symphonies, remarkable quintettes and a mass of delicious melodies.

* Other critics however speak of it in very different terms. Ta.

Adelina Patti.

The excitement about Mlle. Adelina Patti has not decreased. On the contrary, the young lady's friends seem to grow more enthusiastic with each performance, and the two operas, La Sonnambula and Lucia, in which she has appeared, alone draw crowded houses and engross public attention. Guillaume Tell, we are sorry to record, has been withdrawn from the bills, after the most triumphant success ever won by it in this country; the Barbier, with Mario and Ronconi, has lost its attractive powers; the splendors of the Prophète no longer allure; even Mad. Grisi's farewell performances cease to interest. All this has been brought about by a very young artist from America, about whom little or nothing had been previously known, and who has achieved a greater popularity in a briefer space of time than any singer since Jenny Lind, not even excepting Angiolina Bosio herself. We have already chronicled our opinions regarding Mlle. Patti, and have ventured on a prophecy about her future career. That she is destined—a great destiny—to be the legitimate successor of Bosio, we believe, although the two characters in which she has hitherto appeared would seem to indicate the possession of greater dramatic powers than her wonderful predecessor. Mad. Bosio never performed either Amina or Lucia at the Royal Italian Opera, her performances being restricted to characters of a less tragic stamp, and which depend upon singing rather than acting, for their effective realisation—such as Adina in L'Elisir d'Amore, Matilda in Matilda di Shabran, the Countess in Conte Ory, Gilda in Rigoletto, parts, indeed, the last excepted, which require little amount of energy, passion and instinct for their development but which put the vocal powers to the severest test. Mlle. Patti, it would seem, has a larger ambition than Mad. Bosio, and, judging from the operas she has selected, aspires to the repertory of Jenny Lind. The public, notwithstanding, has accepted the young "prima donna" as the successor of Bosio rather than of the Swedish Nightingale, although she has not assayed any character belonging to the former, and has appeared in two of the most popular of the latter. For this seeming paradox we do not pretend to account, but merely state the fact, and leave the reader to draw his own conclusions.

The part, however, which Mlle. Patti has selected for her third appearance, is one which will bring her into direct comparison with Bosio, and set the question at rest as to the relative vocal capabilities of the two artists. Violetta in La Traviata, was first recommended to the English public by Mlle. Piccolomini, who, though an indifferent singer with a faulty voice, had great natural instincts and an intensity of feeling not to be surpassed. Mad. Bosio, indeed, sang the music of Violetta indisputably better than Mlle. Piccolomini; but still it cannot be denied that the Traviata is more closely associated with the name of latter than of the former. Thus, it may readily be imagined, Mlle. Patti's appearance in the Traviata is looked forward to with unusual curiosity and interest—"Will she sing as brilliantly and as gracefully as Bosio?"—"Will she act with as much piquancy and verve as Piccolomini?"—are questions which cannot fail to be asked times out of number between this and next Thursday. Her friends and admirers rejoice that she has challenged general opinion in a character so well known to the public as Violetta, and await the issue with confidence. No doubt many who had preferred taking the judgment of others in respect of Mlle. Patti's efforts in the Sonnambula and Lucia will be enabled to form for themselves a notion of her singing and acting, after witnessing a performance of the Traviata. Violetta, indeed, appears to us a more trying character for the young artist than Amina or Lucia, if only because it has been more immediately before the public in the persons of two of the greatest favorites of our times. Jenny Lind's Amina is too far removed from our remembrance to be recalled with vividness, while Lucy of Lammormoor, however well played and sung, leaves but a faint impression; else, indeed, the recent performance of Mlle. Titiens must have seriously interfered with Mlle. Patti's success.

The performance of Violetta will certainly place Mlle. Adelina Patti's talents in a clearer light, and afford a surer estimate of her merits, vocal and histrionic, than either of previous attempts, because the audience will make direct comparisons and draw direct conclusions. Comparisons are momentous, for upon them the reputation of an artist may hang, and even so it may be with Mlle. Patti on Thursday next. For our own parts, however, we entertain little doubt as to the result, and fully expect to see the youthful "prima donna" come forth from the ordeal, not merely unscathed, but triumphant.—Musical World.

Cimarosa and Paisiello.

Some interesting anecdotes relating to Cimarosa and Paisiello have recently been communicated to the foreign journals by Pacini the elder, a music publisher in Paris, who is old enough to remember both those renowned Italians.

It is well known that Cimarosa, on his way home from Russia, whither he had been summoned by the Empress Catharine, passed through Vienna. The Emperor Joseph II. (Mozart's somewhat niggardly patron)—himself an amateur performer upon the double-bass—requested Cimarosa to leave some memento of his visit. Yielding to his Majesty's entreaties, Cimarosa composed Il Matrimonio Segreto. It is singular enough that the story of each of the three operas produced in that particular year turned upon marriage: 1st. Le Nozze di Dorina, music by Sarti; 2nd. Le Nozze di Figaro, by Mozart; and 3rd. Il Matrimonio Segreto, by Cimarosa. Mozart's opera partially failed, owing to the intrigues of Salieri and the Italian singers. That of Sarti (now forgotten) was popular for a time; that of Cimarosa achieved one of the most brilliant art-successes on record. Its charming melodies, and the vivacity of its action, produced so great an effect that, at the end of the performance, the Emperor, in his enthusiasm, ordered refreshments to be served to the musicians, and then expressed a wish that the opera should be repeated. In obedience to the Imperial humor, the audience, after a short repose, resumed their places, and the artists went through the whole performance a second time. The public did not leave the theatre till daybreak. Such an incident was without precedent, and (the length of our modern operas taken into consideration), is likely to occur again.

In Naples Il Matrimonio Segreto was brought out at the Teatro dei Fiorentini, where tragedy, comedy, and opera buffa used to be alternately represented. The "troop" of Florentine singers comprised so many artists of distinguished merit that the theatre was called after them, and henceforth always bore the name of "Teatro dei Fiorentini." Cimarosa's opera made a deep impression, and created, indeed, an extraordinary degree of excitement. At the air, "Pria che spunti in Ciel' Aurora," the whole audience spontaneously rose, and commenced applauding with enthusiasm. The singer was a tenor, named Benelli, brother of that Benelli who was known in Paris about seventy years ago. Although very young, Pacini the elder was present on this memorable occasion. An uncle of his rented a box at the Fiorentini, spacious enough (which was frequently the case with the boxes in Italian theatres) to accommodate as many as twelve persons. All the members of the Pacini family assisted at this performance, of which they retained a lively remembrance.

A few years previously at the same Teatro dei Fiorentini, Paisiello's universally admired opera, La Nina Pazza d'Amore, was first represented. About this work Pacini the elder has a story worth telling. La Nina, it appears, was in rehearsal, and the Neapolitans talked of nothing else. Prince Talleyrand, the French ambassador, not having the patience to wait for the first public performance, requested Paisiello to get up a soirée at his own residence, soliciting the honor of an invitation for himself and some of his friends. Paisiello consenting, readily obtained the co-operation of the singers and musicians at the theatre. He lived on the third floor of a house in the street of the Santo Spirito; and the Prince, burning with impatience to hear the new opera, was punctual in attendance. The first violinist at the Teatro Mercieri being Pacini's instructor, he was taken under his auspices to Paisiello's. Pacini was enchanted with the opera; as was no less so Prince Talleyrand, who regaled the performers with a sumptuous banquet.

When Il Matrimonio Segreto was played in Paris, Parlagagni, the Lablache of the period, was anxious to interpolate a duet composed for him by Farinelli, in the opera of Teresa e Claudio, which he sang admirably, and which had produced a marked sensation in Italy. Farinelli was the best pupil in the Conservatory, and was Pacini's master for Solfeggio. Pacini was at his studies when Farinelli composed the duet, "the violin obligato accompaniment to which," he declares, "is still ringing" in his ears. The duet, though wonderfully popular in Italy, created little effect in Paris. The cause of this was probably the substitution of new words "which gave the music a wholly different expression." No doubt. We should have preferred, however, more of Paisiello's opera and less of Farinelli's duet—fiddle solo, notwithstanding.

Pacini became acquainted, Cimarosa on leaving the Conservatory (about the same time as Spontini). He learned (or tried to learn) composition under "the famous Fenaroli," who was also originally Cimarosa's master. ("The famous Fenaroli" reminds us of "the great Tritto.") Whenever Fenaroli, deceased with a composition of Pacini's, he would show it to Cimarosa, who used to "advise" him with regard to the scoring. "The composer of Il Matrimonio Segreto," adds the venerable relator of anecdotes "is always present to my eyes, and his voice still vibrates in my ears." (M. Pacini's ears are impressionable. What, nevertheless, with the voice "vibrating," and the fiddle "ringing," they must be somewhat perplexed.) "Rossini," says M. Pacini the elder, "adores Cimarosa." Whenever I mention the name, he puts the most minute questions about the appearance and character of the old master. (Cimarosa died rather young by the way, for an "old" master.) All the existing portraits of Cimarosa are, it seems, in Rossini's possession, added to which, he has had the likeness of the celebrated Neapolitan composer painted on the ceiling of his villa.

There is some remarkably pleasant "chit-chat" in these Pacinian anecdotes—and this, in spite of occasional touches of drivelling senility. The "old man eloquent" at times verges upon the twaddle.

Editorial Correspondence.

No. XV.

LONDON, June 28.

On the way hither from Paris, on a fresh June day, past the sweet clover fields of northern France, over the smooth channel from Boulogne to Folkstone, and again through greener fields of Kent, where the hops grow and the sheep graze — fair afternoon's picture of the rural luxury of England — hastening, belated, to get what might remain of the London musical season, I looked into the Times, and fancy my chagrin at reading of an event just past, which had always stood high in the list of musical satisfactions anticipated in a visit here. The annual concert of the three or four thousand Charity Children in St. Paul's cathedral had taken place the day before! I enclose, however, the Times report of it. Other disappointments were of course inevitable in any plan of a year's travel. Several great things, which it had been my fate to miss all over Germany, I was again too late for here. For instance, the repeated performances of Rossini's really great opera, "William Tell," which are said to have been excellent in every way. So too, the two grandest works in the prospectus of the Sacred Harmonic Society, the "Israel in Egypt" of Handel, and the Missa Solennis in D of Beethoven, had gone by. There remained one more concert by that Society, and that was to be on the very evening of my arrival:—Costa's Oratorio of "Eli," conducted by the composer in person. The day's journey had been exhilarating, and the musical appetite was sharp after the two months' fast in Italy. So my first taste of London — after the Crystal Palace had stretched out its arms of greeting in the distance (how it shone against the setting sun!), and after being jostled over crowded London Bridge, and finding lodgings — was a hurried drive to Exeter Hall, to hear what might be heard of at least one London Oratorio.

I arrived in the middle of the first part. The exquisitely modulated and insinuating tenor of Sims Reeves was even then stealing through the passage ways. He was just finishing his principal air. The great gloomy hall was crowded to the utmost, and it was only possible to obtain a back seat in the balcony — not a bad place for listening to such great waves of tone as roll forth from a choir of 600 effective voices, supported by a band of about 100 instruments. I was in no mood to listen or remember critically; simple exposure to the invigorating and refreshing influence of great choral harmonies was all I sought, together with gratification of the natural curiosity to see and hear what one had so long read of. The choruses of Costa are not giant works of genius; he is no Handel, Bach, or Beethoven; only a clever follower of Mendelssohn. But he is a masterly musician, and has contrived some grand, and many beautiful, if not decidedly original, effects in "Eli," as we already know in Boston. There was great precision, positiveness and vigor in the rendering of the choruses. The voices blended finely, the parts were well balanced, the quality of tone was clear and musical. There was no faltering, and little screaming. All were up to the mark, and seemed quite at home in the music, and in such work generally. It was only in the finer contrasts and gradations of light and shade, in pianissimo, &c., that one was reminded of the superiority of the choral societies in Berlin, Leipzig and Dresden. It was right hearty, vigorous, unanimous, English work, however, and often told snperbly; once or twice sublimely; and always in a way to stir up much enthusiasm in the audience, who, with the singers, made the evening an ovation to England's favorite conductor, proud to recognize him also in the character of composer.

The solos were sung by Mme. Rudersdorff, a fine and flexible soprano, with good skill and expression; Mme. Sainton-Dolby, who gave the pretty contralto part of Samuel quite acceptably; Sims Reeves, whose sweet, expressive, finished tenor tantalized us with too little — it was only in a trio and a quartet that we heard him, and that with a rare satisfaction; Signor Belletti, our old friend of the Jenny Lind times, who used then to render the bass airs of Handel surprisingly well for an Italian, and who is still one of the main stays of a London oratorio: Mr. Santley, a comparatively new candidate for public favor, who has a rich and resonant bass, which he uses tastefully and with much effect; and Mr. Montem Smith. The orchestra was admirable. The unwearied responsiveness of the great audience was almost as interesting as the performance. Whether the English be a really musical race or not, there is no people that craves and sits out so much music.

Last evening — to jump the interval for the time being — I heard another oratorio in the same place: — the old "Messiah" by the "Yorkshire Choral Union." To hear the famous Yorkshire chorus singers, and in the well-known choruses, was a chance not to be neglected. Nor were my expectations disappointed. This time I had a front seat, in a rather thinly scattered, but delighted audience. There were perhaps four hundred singers, and they were wonderfully effective. The sounds leapt out with a startling elasticity and vigor. There is a heroic unanimity and certainty in the charge of these Yorkshiremen. Chorus singing seems to have been a lifelong patriotic exercise with them; a common cause, honored and carefully kept bright. There was an irresistible spirit about it; here too not much of fine shading, or of pianissimo, but a sort of dazzling splendor of delivery, a fervor that sweeps on to victory and takes you off your feet. Of course, the most satisfactory achievements were such pieces as the "Wonderful" chorus, "Lift up your hands," the "Hallelujah," &c. "He shall purify," "Behold the Lamb," and "All we like sheep" were exceedingly impressive. But one missed somewhat of the profound and almost Bach-like tenderness and inwardness of "And with his stripes." The proportion of female voices looked small, but by no means sounded so; they were all telling voices; each voice jump upon the instant in coming in. One peculiarity in the composition of the choir would look strangely in America. In the band of contraltos you see but a dozen or so of women scattered about and isolated among the men. The male contralto, or counter tenor, so exceptional with us, appears to be the rule among the Yorkshire voices. Some of them, of course, were boys, as were many of the sopranos; but the great majority were men. The solo singing was not remarkable, but reasonably fair. The best were Mr. Santley in the bass recitatives and airs, and Mr. Whitehead (so far as I could make out from the bills) in the tenor. Mrs. Sunderland sang mechanically well in the soprano arias, and Miss Freeman furnished little more than voice to "He was despised," &c. The orchestra, from the Philharmonic Society, was effective. So was the organ, played by Dr. Monk, of York Cathedral. The conductor was Mr. R. G. Burton.

In the morning (or, as we say, afternoon) after my arrival (Saturday), I attended the public rehearsal of the last of the "New Philharmonic" concerts, in St. James's Hall; and on Monday evening the concert itself. It was a large and fashionable audience, all in "evening dress," which is the rule here, where seas of glorious free music, with all the genial warmth thereof, do not avail to melt or wash away old icebergs of uncomfortable etiquette. The Hall, which is much smaller than the Boston Music Hall, is most beautiful and unique in its architecture, and especially in the way in which it is lighted, by single star-shaped jets depending from all parts of the arched ceiling, and at heights varying with the curve of the arch, so that it suggests the free feeling of being under the starry sky. The orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Wyld, is large and powerful, and played some movements capitally, though it is said to be not the best orchestra in London; but of course there are contrary opinions about that, now that London has three rival orchestral societies, where once the "Philharmonic" had the whole field. The overture to Coriolanus (Beethoven) was certainly rendered with great fire and precision, and made a smart beginning to the concert. Next came a masterly performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by Herr Wieniawski, a young Pole of the Hebrew stamp of features, who has taken his stand in the first class of virtuosos; there was fire and tender feeling, and technical mastery enough in it, if not decided evidence enough of individual genius. Then the dark familiar figure of Carl Formes presented itself, and sang with powerful effect a satanic sort of aria from Spohr's "Faust." Mrs. Lemmens Sherrington followed with a French air from Herold's Pré aux Clercs, and fine obligato violin accompaniment by Mr. Blagrove, first violin in the orchestra, and apparently in nearly all the orchestras here. She has a clear, sunshiny soprano, and fine florid execution. The "Eroica" Symphony closed the first part, much of it impressively rendered, but not up to the Leipzig or the Berlin standard by many degrees. Part II. began with the lovely, tranquilizing Chorus and Soprano solo: "Calm is the glassy ocean," from Mozart's Idomeneo, nicely rendered. Mr. John Francis Burnett, an élève of the Leipzig Conservatoire, played (in the illness of Miss Arabella Goddard) the perpetual Cheval de Bataille of young pianists, Weber's Concert-stück, and showed very clear and brilliant execution. A florid duet for voice and violin, by Pacini and Artot, was sung by Mrs. Sherrington and played by Wieniawski; and the concert ended with the "Men of Prometheus" overture, thus making it mainly "a Beethoven night." NEW YORK, JULY 15.—You have heard, ere this that poor Sig. Amodio died recently, at sea, of yellow fever. He will be regretted by many, to whose amusement and enjoyment he has contributed. Always ready to do his part, and the very personification of kindness and good nature, every one liked him, and his private life is said to have been such as to merit general esteem. Saturday a Requiem Mass was held at St. Stephen's church for the repose of his soul. The church was crowded; one would hardly have expected to see so large and elegant an audience assembled at this season. A number of the fellow artists of the deceased assisted in the musical performances, which were, in fact, very fine. Mad.

Isidora Clark sang the principal Soprano solos, and among the male singers were to be found Susini, Centemeri, Quinto, Arlavani, etc. Most of the pieces were composed by the organist of the church, Sig. Mora. The best of them were the Dies Iree, the Trio and Duets, and the Benedictus. This last, and Sig. Susini's solo were very finely sung. I subjoin the programme:—

Musical Chit-Chat.

CAMBRIDGE COMMENCEMENT.—The literary festivities of our Alma Mater, demand our attention only musically, of course, and we cannot fail to take notice of the constant progress of this. Art within her walls, of late years. At the Commencement dinner, on Wednesday last, the speeches were interspersed with some choice selections of vocal music sung by a body of graduates, (mostly of the last few years,) under the lead of Mr. L. P. HOMER, who has so successfully discharged the duties of Instructor of Music for several years. It would have been impossible ten years ago to have extemporized a club, at two days notice, able to sing, so creditably, the four-part songs of Mendelssohn and other composers, that were given that day, by these gentlemen, without books, and with but a single rehearsal. Of course the Star Spangled Banner followed the eloquent speech of His Excellency the Governor, and when could Integer Vite be more fitly sung than after the wonderful speech of the venerable patriot, the oldest surviving graduate, Ex-President of the University, the illustrious JOSIAH QUINCY, who at the age of over ninety years once more joined with his fellow students, as they sang, before leaving the table, the accustomed 78th Psalm, Give ear, ye Children, to my Law, to the tone of St. Martin's. "Serus in Cœlum redeat!"

Mr. G. A. SCHMITT, (whose contributions under the signature of *t have done such good service to this Journal, during the past year) has received from the Governor the commission of Captain in one of the new regiments. At the close of the annual examination at Cambridge, where he is instructor of German in Harvard College, he received from the members of the late Junior Class, an elegant and costly sword, as a testimonial of their respect to him as a teacher, and in recognition of the patriotic zeal which has led him to take up arms for the perpetuity of the free institutions of his adopted land. Our readers will heartily join with us in wishing him an opportunity to do good service, and a safe and speedy return.

MADemoiselle GABRIELLE DE LA MOTTE, as will be seen from her advertisement in another column, is still engaged in instructing pupils in piano playing. Her system of teaching in classes, has proved, (at least under her hands) to be productive of excellent results. Many of our Boston readers have witnessed the fruits of her instructions in the soirées occasionally given by her, which have been reported in these columns. We need not add that she is herself an accomplished pianiste, and deserving of the success that she has attained as a teacher in this city.

The first member of a new musical journal has recently been published at Berlin, under the title of the Deutscher-Männer-Gesang Zeitung. It is edited by M. Tschirch and of course, is devoted principally to the objects indicated by its title.

Ullman is (or was recently) in Paris, where we are told that he has engaged for the next season Mme. Charton Demeur and Mme. Medori. Mme. Charton is said to have sung very brilliantly in the rôle of Dinorah at St. Petersburg.

HAVANA.—The Gazette Musicale de Paris tells us that Gottschalk lately gave a monster concert in this city. Forty pianists and four hundred and fifty other instrumentalists took part in the performance. Among other novelties of the programme were a romantic symphony with tambourines and harmoniflutes; a march for eighty trumpets, and finally a fantasia by Gottschalk for forty pianos!

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Thursday, June 27, Verdi's Ballo in Maschera was produced, for the first time, at the Royal Italian Opera, with great completeness and efficiency in the costumes, scenery, and mise-en-scène. The management certainly did not indulge in the same lavish expenditure as in the Prophète and Guillaume Tell, but for obvious reasons. It could not make sure of being reimbursed for its outlay. The ball scene is very striking, but not to be compared for brilliancy and magnificence with the same scene in Auber's Gustave, when originally brought out at Covent Garden, under Mr. Bunn's direction. The distribution of parts is as follows: Amelia, Madame Penco; Oscar, Madame Miolan-Carvalho; Ulrica, Madame Nantier-Didiée; the Duke, Signor Mario; Renato, Signor Graziani; the Chief Conspirators, Signor Tagliafico and M. Zelger. This cast looks powerful on paper, but Verdi's music does not always suit itself to the means of the best singers. For instance, we have heard Madame Penco to greater advantage than in the character of Amelia, which demands, as almost all Verdi's heroines do, an amount of energy and strength of lungs found in few singers. Madame Penco sings Mozart's and Rossini's music admirably, as we need hardly say, and that is a far higher compliment than if praised in the most unqualified manner in Verdi's music. The singing of Madame Carvalho in the part of Oscar was extremely brilliant, and her acting vivacious and piquant. Madame Nantier-Didiée made quite a character of Ulrica, the sorceress, singing with great expression, and dressing the part with a true notion of the picturesque. The Renato of Signor Graziani was a praiseworthy performance, a little wanting, perhaps, in dramatic vigor and truth, but well endeavored and not deficient in vehemence. His splendid voice, with a real show of earnestness, obtained an encore for the romance in the fourth act. We cannot praise very highly Signor Tagliafico and M. Zelger for their singing; perhaps the music of the conspirators had not become sufficiently familiar to them. Signor Mario was inimitable as the Duke, acting and singing his very best, and carrying his whole audience with him in every scene. He made amends, indeed, for every deficiency in the other performers, and was encoored in the romance in the first act, as well as in the quintet in the second act, in which his singing and acting were both conspicuous. There was a large attendance, and the recalls being more numerous than the encores, the performance must be pronounced a decided success. Un Ballo in Maschera is announced for repetition to-night and Monday.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The Philharmonic Society has just terminated a series of performances (its 49th) almost unprecedented in success. At the eighth and final concert on Monday night, the programme was as follows:

PART I.—Sinfonia, Haydn; Aria, "Bel raggio," Semiramide (Rossini); Concerto, violin, Herr Strauss (Beethoven); Recit. and Aria, "Bella adorata incognita," Il Giuramento (Mercadante); Concerto in G minor, pianoforte, M. Moscheles (Moscheles).

PART II.—Sinfonia in C minor (Beethoven); Duetto, "La ci darem" (Mozart); Overture, Jubilee (Weber).

Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D. There was, moreover, a feature of more than common interest. That veteran to whom the modern art of pianoforte composition owes so much, who, besides being the real originator of the "bravura" style out of which so many celebrities have risen, is a classical musician of the genuine stamp, and author of concertos, sonatas, studies, and a multitude of works that the world (of music) will not readily let die—Herr Ignace Moscheles—who, after residing among us for more than a quarter of a century, and laying the basis of a solid and legitimate school, left England in 1846, to assume a post of equal honor and responsibility in his own country, was induced to appear once more, and for the last time, on the platform of the Philharmonic orchestra, where he had won so many laurels as composer, pianist, and conductor, and to perform one of his own splendid pieces for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniments, viz., the concerto in G minor, still (and likely to be always) regarded as a model easier to admire than to imitate. That every lover of the instrument, of which Herr Moscheles is one of the most justly famous representatives, amateurs and professors in an equal degree, should be eager to welcome and applaud the honored master, one of the very last of a race of musical Titans, who thus amicably consented to forget that he had abandoned public life, and to come once more among them, solicitor, as in the olden time, for the guerdon of public approbation, was natural; nor could any one have felt surprise at seeing the Hanover Square Rooms literally crammed to suffocation. To describe the reception awarded to Herr Moscheles as he ascended the steps that lead into the orchestra; or the repeated and hearty bursts of recognition that greeted each familiar passage of his concerto; or the rapturous plaudits that, from every corner of the room, bore witness to the real delight he had contributed by his performance, would be difficult, if not impossible. How he played—how, while the hand was frequently unnerved that once was so energetic, dexterous, and firm, the mind proved still vigorous and young, still lit up with the "divine spark," and in possession of absolute control over those subtleties of expression, those genuine touches, that distinguish the great musician from the mere virtuoso,—the skilled executant and volfa tout—must be left to the imagination of the reader. The incident was one of rare interest. It seemed almost as though, in the hour of its threatened dissolution, the spirit of one of the old giants of the Philharmonic had appeared to give the members courage, and lead them once again to victory. A more brilliant finale to the last season before the jubilee,—a more auspicious foreshadowing of the triumph of the jubilee itself,—than this apparition of Moscheles, who was thirty years ago the very soul of the institution, could hardly have been thought of. A word must suffice for the rest of the concert. The symphony of Haydn (La Reine de France) recalled the glories of the Philharmonic in its prime. The concerto of Beethoven was finely executed by Herr Strauss, whose success at a former concert fully justified his reëngagement at this; but we did not greatly admire his two cadences. The singers were Mlle. Guernbella, Signor Steller, and Mr. Tennant, who sang, and sang well, the selections from the operatic music of Rossini, Mercadante, and Mozart.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The increasing popularity of Mlle. Adelina Patti, more especially in the Sonnambula, and the repetitions of operas which have already been recorded as successes may be accepted as the reason why no novelty has been produced lately. Mario certainly resumed his original part of the duke in Rigoletto on Saturday, and gave a new interest to the performance. La Sonnambula was repeated on Monday; Don Giovanni on Tuesday; Le Prophète on Thursday; and last night Lucia di Lammermoor for the last time this season. Verdi's Ballo in Maschera, announced for Thursday, has been postponed until Thursday next.

ROYAL OPERA, LYCEUM.—Signor Verdi's Ballo in Maschera, produced on Saturday night, for the first time in this country, was a legitimate and triumphant success. The cast was admirable—irreproachable, indeed; the greatest pains had been expended on the rehearsals, and the execution throughout could hardly be surpassed.

The cast was as follows: Richard, Earl of Warwick, Signor Giuglini; Renato, Signor Delle Sedie; Samuel, M. Gassier; Oscar, Mad. Gassier; Amelia, Mlle. Titiens; Ulrica, Mad. Lemaire. As far as the music was concerned, Signor Giuglini was fitted to admiration. He sang in consequence, with infinite charm throughout, and never having to force his voice, was in his element from the first to the last. Signor Giuglini, moreover, manifested, in the first two acts, a talent for light comedy, for which we could have hardly given him credit. His success indeed was triumphant, and in all probability, Richard, Earl of Warwick, governor of Boston, will be repaid, after a short time, his most finished and admirable performance. Mlle. Titiens appears to extraordinary advantage in Verdi's energetic heroine. She sings, and acts the part magnificently, and is everywhere the grand artist. Her singing throughout the entire of the third act, is one of her greatest achievements and could not be surpassed, if indeed, equaled by any living vocalist. We shall take another opportunity of commenting upon this splendid performance, and can only say that Mlle. Titiens in Amelia has put in another claim to the many already advanced for the title of the reigning queen of tragic song. Mad. Gassier, who made her first appearance for some years in London, sang the music of the Page with great brilliancy. Signor Delle Sedie showed decided vocal talent, if not the best voice in the world, in the part of Renato, and was applauded to the skies and encoored in one of his songs. He seemed inclined, however, to exaggeration in his acting. M. Gassier sang and acted most admirably as the first conspirator, and constituted, certainly, one of the most striking figures in a grand picture. The band and chorus were excellent; the dresses new and appropriate; and the scenery, all things considered, effective. We object, nevertheless, to the size of the Boston moon, and, despite the manager of the lights and shades in the third act, believe that the side opposite the opera luminary is that which is thrown into shadow.

Paris.

The last week has produced no other event of importance in the operatic world than the revival at the Opera Comique of Halévy's Mousquetaires de la Reine, Jourdan appearing for the first time before a Parisian audience in the character of Olivier, and, be it said, with entire satisfaction to even the critical part of his hearers. A Mlle. Litschner made her debut the same evening in the part of Athenis. This young lady possesses considerable talent as a vocalist, but which unfortunately does not lie in the direction she has chosen for herself—namely, the florid style. There are two current reports which I am enabled to nail on the counter as false coinage. One is that Tamberlik has accepted an engagement at the Grand Opera here to sing with Fauro in La Muette de Portici. The distinguished artist in question, his campaign in London over, will simply sojourn in Paris as a fugueur until the trumpet sounds "boot and saddle" to summon him to St. Petersburg. The other spurious item of news is that Mad Pauline Viardot has been engaged at the same establishment for two months at some fabulous rate of emolument to sing in Gluck's Alceste. The truth is, that as the management at this time cannot foresee how many performances of Gluck's masterpiece will consist with the taste of its supporters, Mad. Viardot has been engaged to sing, as the technical phrase goes au cachet, or, as we should say, by the night. Apropos of these intended performances, it is now certain that M. Berlioz has declined the office of re-handling (remaniement) the score of Alceste, grounding his refusal on the reverence which is due to the work of a great master. A very proper scruple, and which any one capable of performing the task is sure to share; so that if he done at all, an incapable is sure to be intrusted with it. Why not Alary, the Macdamis-r of Mozart? So true is it ever, that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread." By the way, Aubert, who is now in his eightieth year, and saw Alceste when Gluck was in Paris, is to preside at the rehearsals and give the times. The astonishing and sustained vigor of Lord Brougham is the only parallel we have to the venerable and still verdant French composer. The great lion pianist—parent and progenitor of all pianist lions and whelps that now prowls the two hemispheres—Franz Liszt himself, has been in Paris, and has been, the papers here inform us, charming the retreat of another old lion—a lion of poetry and voluminous prose, a lion eke of politics—M. de Lamartine. For one entire evening the Hungarian pianist poured out the fullness of his great resources to delight the old republican poet and historian. It was a graceful act, and characteristic of Liszt. He has now returned to Weimar.

Mad. Marie Cabel has landed at Marseilles on her return from Algiers, and has been giving several performances in the former city.

Camille Sivori, a minor violinist compared to the above, incapable of charming grandes dames to the tune of fifty guineas, has been playing here, but more in private than in public. The other evening in a réunion intime he played a new quintet by M. C. Estrenio, a composer of high merit, of whom I have frequently spoken. A quatuor by this gentleman was played a short time since at Kossini's house. Signor Sivori proceeds forthwith to Italy, where he will remain till August, when he is expected, according to annual custom, at Baden, Wiesbaden, and other Teutonic places of delight. Another inferior confère of the grande-dame—captivating Bartelloni, Henri Vieuxtemps, has, I hear, returned to Brussels, where he is reposeing after his fatigues of his English campaign. He was, however, prevailed on the other evening to play one or two of his more recent compositions in the salons of M. Brunel, among them his last concerto.

Prague.

One of the most meritorious musical societies in this city is the one known as the "Cecilian-Verein," or Cecilia Union, now established twenty years, during which period it has exerted a most beneficial effect upon the public taste. The great object distinguishing the Cecilia Union has invariably been to perform such works as would otherwise—from idleness, insufficient artistic resources, or intrigue—have never been known. This principle applies particularly to the works of modern composers. Thus, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and, more recently, Richard Wagner, owe a deep debt of gratitude to the Union. Indeed, Wagner, of all composers, ought to feel profoundly grateful to it, for it was through its exertions that his operas were brought out at the theatre. In fact, it is beyond all doubt, that the success achieved on the stage here by Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Der Fliegende Holländer, and Rienzi, first directed the attention of German operatic managers to the "Music of the Future."

True to the principle it has adopted from its foundation, the directors of the Union introduced, at the second concert of the season, on the 6th of January, a work which is here a novelty, however well known it may be elsewhere. I allude to Rossini's Stabat Mater. When the directors announced their intention, public expectation was excited to the highest pitch. The eventful day at length arrived. The exultants took their places, and the audience filled every available seat in the concert-room. But the Praguers have always prided themselves on having an opinion of their own, and being courageous enough to express it, as becomes sons of the Holy Roman Empire, even supposing that opinion runs counter to pre-conceived ideas and the decision arrived at elsewhere. Accordingly, they heard the Stabat Mater, and, despite the favorable reports they had received of it from Paris, London, and other great cities, where it is so popular, condemned it, and exalted still higher than ever the banners of Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn. The general feeling with regard to this work of the Swan of Pesaro is characteristically summed up in the following words of a local critic, who compares "all the ear-tickling melodies of the Stabat to those pious beauties who kneel with veiled countenances before the altar of the Madonna, but, through the folds of their picturesquely draped veils, observe with a worldly eye everything that is going on around them." You must not suppose, however, that no parts of the work were favorably received, for such was not the case. The pieces which struck the public as conceived in a spirit of religious dignity worthy of the subject, were greatly applauded. Among these pieces I may mention the introduction, the cavatina (No. 7), "Fac ut portem Christi mortem;" the quartet (No. 9), "Quando Corpus morietur," and the final fugue. The performance was, on the whole, a successful one; the chorus and orchestra being particularly good. The solo parts were entrusted to Mmes. Brenner, Procházka-Schmidt, Herren Fekter, and Eilers, all members of the operatic company at the theatre.

The third concert of the series, held on the 28th February, was a highly interesting one, being devoted entirely to the compositions of the great John Sebastian Bach, and those of the most talented of his descendants, namely Philip Emanuel Bach. It might fairly have been entitled a Bach Festival, so deep a commotion did it excite among all the admirers of sterling classical music. The following was the programme: Overture in C major, from the Suite des Pièces, No. 1, for orchestra; Recitative and Air, for soprano, from the Passionsmusik, according to the Gospel of St. Matthew; and the "Credo" from the high mass in B minor, by John Sebastian Bach, Philip Emanuel's contribution was his symphony in D major. All these pieces were new to a Prague audience.

MILAN.—According to the Trovatore, a periodical published here, Verdi is about to compose a new opera. The libretto is by M. Piave, the same gentleman who transformed Victor Hugo's Le Roi s'amuse into Rigoletto, and young Dumas' Dame aux Camélias into La Traviata. This new production of the composer of young Italy is said to be intended for the Italian Opera-house in St. Petersburg.

VIENNA.—According to report, the season at the Imperial Opera-house will commence on the 15th July with Verdi's Macbeth. This makes the sixth novelty promised, the other five being the Glücklein des Eremiten, comic opera by Maillach; Gräfin Egmont, ballet by Rotta; Cherubini's Medea; R. Wagner's Tristan und Isolde; and M. Gounod's Faust. Verdi's music was performed last season at the Imperial Opera-house twenty-five times, being just two performances more than those accorded to Mozart, Beethoven, and Gluck combined, and there is every reason for believing that the balance in his favor will be even greater next season. The Bouffes Parisiens opened on the 8th, with M. Offenbach's Orphée aux Enfers. After concluding their engagement here, they proceed to Berlin.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

All hail to the Stars and Stripes, or The dying Volunteer. L. O. Emerson. 25

This poem is founded on one of the most touching incidents of the war, as far as known, an incident which history will make familiar to coming generations. Mr. Emerson has written to it one of his best melodies, and the piece deserves to be popular among patriotic singers.

Our good ship sails to-night, my Love.

Emile Berger. 25

An uncommonly pretty song, the words of which have a more than ordinary significance in the present times. This will no doubt contribute to make it popular; but the music itself is sufficiently striking to direct attention to it.

Up with the Flag of the Stars and Stripes. War Song. Words by W. W. Story. Music by N. Ravnskilde. 25

A song which a patriotic son of Massachusetts, travelling in Italy, wrote, when he heard the news of the glorious uprising of the Freemen in his own country. A friend, a young Norwegian artist, inspired by the subject, composed music to it, such music as no composer would be ashamed of, and the manuscript, by the agency of a kind hand, found its way across the water to the publishers.

Instrumental Music.

Star Spangled Banner Quickstep. J. W. Turner. 25

Mr. Turner has arranged several of our national melodies, such to which public attention has been particularly attracted by the war for the Union, in the form of easy Quicksteps. Thus arranged they will be most welcome to young players. Besides the above, Quicksteps on the "Red, white and blue" and "The girl I left behind me" are now published by the same author.

La Reveille. Grand March Militaire.

Carl Meyer. 25

A very brilliant Concert March, rather difficult. It is quite indicative of the brisk step of the soldiery when marched to the battle-field, full of life and animation. The Trio has fine melodious strains. Altogether amateurs fond of a good show-piece will find much pleasure in the practice of this piece.

Darling Nelly Gray. Varied. R. Schroeder 25

Simple Variations on a very popular melody, pleasing and instructive. Teachers will recollect Schroeder as the author of the well-known Variations on the Swiss Boy and several others.

Books.

THALBERG'S L'ART DU CHANT. (The Art of Singing applied to the Piano.) Handsomely bound in Cloth. 3 00

The Piano cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, but the player may overcome this imperfection with address and skill. How this may be done, the great Player has shown in twelve Transcriptions. The melody is engraved in large notes, so as to stand out and be recognised easily. They are all fingered, and are as invaluable to the accomplished pianist as to the student, who could get at the root of the marvellous effects which Thalberg produced in his playing.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Celestial Army.

I stood by the open casement
And looked upon the night,
And saw the westward-going stars
Pass slowly out of sight.

Slowly the bright procession
Went down the gleaming arch,
And my soul discerned the music
Of their long triumphal march;

Till the great celestial army,
Stretching far beyond the poles,
Became the eternal symbol
Of the mighty march of souls.

Onward, forever onward,
Red Mars led down his clan;
And the moon, like a mailed maiden,
Was riding in the van.

And some were bright in beauty,
And some were faint and small,
But these might be in their greatest height,
The noblest of them all.

Downward, forever downward,
Behind earth's dusky shore,
They passed into the unknown night,
They passed—and were no more.

No more? O, say not so!
And downward is not just;
For the sight is weak and the sense is dim
That looks through heated dust.

The stars and the mailed moon,
Though they seem to fall and die,
Still sweep with their embattled lines,
An endless reach of sky.

And though the hills of death
May hide the bright array,
The marshalled brotherhood of souls
Still keeps its upward way.

Upward, forever upward,
I see their march sublime,
And hear the glorious music
Of the conquerors of time.

And long let me remember,
That the palest, faintest one,
May to diviner vision be
A bright and blessed sun.

J. S. Bach.

(TRANSLATED FOR THIS JOURNAL FROM THE "DEUTSCHE MUSIK-ZEITUNG" OF VIENNA.)

Arias from various Cantatas, with Piano-forte accompaniment, arranged by ROBERT FRANK. Four sets (9 Alto, 9 Bass, 9 Soprano, 9 Tenor Arias). Leipzig: F. Whistling; Boston:
O. Ditson & Co.

This collection of arias by BACH gives refreshing evidence of the earnest efforts made in all directions in our day, to drag to light again the rich, long forgotten treasures of a glorious Past, and to make them accessible to our taste. We hail it the more joyfully, because it promises a weighty contribution to a movement gradually commencing even in wider circles, out of which, it may be hoped, will finally proceed a full recognition and just appreciation of SEBASTIAN BACH. Just now indeed opinion wavers, even amongst competent judges; and still we cannot gain the proper stand point, from which a comprehensive view of Bach's nature and of his significance for the present and the future would be possible. A great part of the public sees in him mainly the specifically religious, or (to come more near to it) the Protestant church musician, whether the alone true and greatest, or the more or less antiquated. And there is no doubt, that the most and the greatest of Bach's compositions are designed for the church; that his whole being is rooted in the religious traditions of the Lutheran church; that he stands there as the richest flower of the pietistic movement which goes into the deepest inner life of man, as a last reformer, and as a living, loud speaking testimony of the divine spirit in the midst of an age of newly beginning revelation and expression of all deeper life. No one has ever set forth so exhaustively as he the mystical and inmost quality of the Protestant faith; no one has so symbolically incarnated its moral-personal character; no one has recognized the central significance of the divine as the source and vital foundation of this faith with such fullness of piety; no one has expounded it so spiritually, so exhaustively, and in so edifying a manner.

But this conception of him overlooks the fact, that Bach employed the same form of expression, which he used in his church compositions, and which we are accustomed to call specifically the church style, also for purely worldly subjects; that this form in fact was natural to him. Not a few of his church cantatas had originally altogether profane texts, and the most voluptuous love-songs move him in the same strict style as the most serious church arias. Moreover, he has written a multitude of purely instrumental works, to which no one would ascribe a church character. Hence it is all-important that we find a more comprehensive point of view, from which to judge of Bach collectively.

On the other hand, from the purely musical point of view, which is always taken by another not less numerous portion of our public, it is still less possible to form a complete estimate of Bach, since one is so liable to sink into a merely and technical formal apprehension. Unfortunately, there are still many, even among musicians, who are able to discern scarcely anything else in Bach, but the greatest harmonist and contrapuntist; and to whom the symbolical and æsthetical significance of his Art methods is a sealed book, even supposing them competent to understand the ideality and the spiritual nobility of his thoughts and feelings. It is true indeed that no one before or after him has equalled him in dexterity in all arts of counterpoint, in the even flow of his parts and the smoothness of his modulation, in purity of polyphonic setting and fineness of distribution and division in single motives as well as in larger sections, and in all else that may be adduced. It is true that Bach himself attached great weight to his mastery of forms; that he preferred to spend his time on works in which he could display this in its fullest splendor (the art of Fugue). But how unsatisfactory is such a recognition, so long as there are musicians, who, while they praise all this, are still in doubt about the euphony, the sonorous beauty of Bach's works! Nay, supposing even that Bach—which is not impossible—judged himself chiefly as a contrapuntist:—what genius yet dreamed of the full reach of its own prophetic spirit?

Alas! historical research has not yet gone so far as even to attempt a satisfactory answer to the burning question. For as yet there exists no Biography of Bach, which in the remotest degree satisfies what one demands of such a book in our day. While extremely valuable monuments, biographical and other, have been raised to nearly all the other great composers, from Handel down to Schumann, it almost seems as if this honor would remain long denied to the greatest among them all—perhaps for the very reason of his unapproachable elevation. About his outward life, and the shaping influence which it exerted on the inner man, there may be comparatively little to be said, inasmuch as the sources are but scanty, and the life he led was a very quiet one. His works, so far as yet known, furnish, besides quite superficial notices about the period of their production, only a few slight data for a historico-biographical construction. For they bear extremely few traces in them of a development; on the contrary they all show such an astonishing maturity, such rounding off and completeness, that such significant phrases of development, as we find in Handel and Beethoven, are scarcely distinguishable in them. Accordingly every biography of Bach must necessarily assume a far more æsthetic than historico-pragmatic character. The difficulties involved in this mode of consideration are most strikingly shown by the pedantic and uncertain conduct of the current musical criticism upon Bach's works; especially by its almost total silence, thus far, about the publication of Bach's works, which has already been going on for ten years. It is shown not less, however, by the utterly unworthy and uncritical dispute, whether Bach is obsolete and out of date, whether Handel is greater and more universal than he, whether one ought to be enthusiastic for him or not, whether it is possible to execute his things, &c. Whoever has got stuck in such questions, and therefore imagines himself critical, only shows how little he has been stirred inwardly by the touching humility, childlikeness and simplicity, which speak to us in every tone of the master; by that elevation above all narrowness and littleness, that irresistible fervor and inwardness, that tenderness and depth of feeling, that enchanting grace and loveliness of form, that uncontainable fullness and might of ideas! How can we wonder, that the conduct of most of our music-lovers corresponds to this conduct of musical criticism, which is in a certain sense the gauge and measure of the public taste? Who does not know the dismal ignorance, mystification and obstinacy, and the multitude of most adventurous prejudices, with which Sebastian Bach has to contend? But who would take upon himself the really urgent, but yet thankless task of holding up before the eyes of our good Germany her irresponsible sins against her noblest sons? Rather be it our endeavor, in noticing the work which now lies before us, and which meets us like a refreshing spring in a barren, unproductive Present, to signalize some traits of Bach's creative greatness; not with the hope of saying anything new or exhaustive of the subject, but simply to direct attention to the work itself, and thereby offer a small contribution to a less one-sided judgment of the man, and to a fuller and more wide-spread recognition of him.

In truth—let us not deceive ourselves about this—BACH can never become the common property of mankind in the same manner, hardly in the same degree, as HANDEL. This is simply owing to the entire difference both in the objects and the manner of their creation. Handel's look is always turned to the world without; the grand forms of biblical and profane history arouse his imagination; everything with him shapes itself to some dramatic action and development. Hence dramatic liveliness and truth of character are with him the paramount aim. His greatness consists not so much in his having greatly increased the tone-material out of an overflowing depth of musical creative power; but far more, as CHRYSANDER has strikingly shown, in his understanding better than anybody else, how to make a comparatively limited tone-material serviceable to his artistic intentions. Hence it is so characteristic for him, to leave no practicable means unused, even the simplest volks-lied; to look about him in the world, to live through as it were the different styles, and allow the significant nationalities, with their musical traditions, to exert their influence upon him. The free and original assimilation of all these moments is a main feature of his mastery. Concrete historical truthfulness, grand dramatic power in the delineation of character as well as in the development of the action, wonderful economy and simplicity distinguish him.

It is entirely otherwise with BACH. He does not stretch his hand back into the Past of history; not the outward, visible world of fact is with him the object of representation; he does not show and describe foreign, outlying persons, events and relations; but he is a Prophet, who, while he constantly reproduces himself, his present, inmost experiences, thoughts and moods, at the same time forms an organ for the inmost soul's life of all men, as filled out and transfigured through the living christian faith. This, by the most wonderful means, with all his ever changing, ever new, yet always homogeneous forms, he moulds to solid Art. Therefore his music has a far more more personal character, that goes immediately from heart, than Handel's while it is in nowise less concrete and universal. If we are not continually transported by it to the great arena of the world's history, yet it leads into the no less stirring, sublime and exhaustless depths of the human heart, which is indeed governed by the same God, and is bound to Him, who rules the history of the world.

The Diarist in London.

LIGHT READING FOR HOT WEATHER.

If one could spend a hundred years in one long mental feast upon the good things provided by the wit and science of men since the invention of letters, then half a century in ruminating and inwardly digesting the meal so made, visiting various climes and races of men by way of exercise, and then devote another hundred years to the task of writing the results, then—provided one could remain all this time still in the vigor of manhood—something might be written worth the reading. When I find the Elixir of Life and the fountain of youth, it shall be tried. It is hardly worth while to speculate upon the topics which shall fill this juvenile longevity, whether to devote it to squaring the circle, the invention of perpetual motion machines, the study of Greek, Latin, Sanscrit, edible and other roots, or the like, but certainly one art shall have a place, if only as a relief to the more serious studies, and that art shall be music. An ever young Timotheus (of two and a half centuries) might certainly think out something! This idea, which which was carried out to great extent in imagination, occurred to me one evening, as I was walking along the promenade, which borders the channel at Brighton, and invigorating myself after a hard day's work in writing, and arose from the reflection that the experience of the last half year proves that, when one is expected to become a writer, he is in fact just in the state of intellectual culture to be a student. Oh, for an uninterrupted half a life just now for study! So that vapid commonplaces, mere notes of passing events might give place to something of sterling, lasting value!

In London! of all cities the most interesting to most New England men of literary culture—the city of our fathers' history—the centre of the literature of our language—the stage on which Chaucer, Shakspeare, Milton, Johnson—how many more! played and are playing their parts—where every old street and building has some association, which gives it interest in our eyes!

I have often, when speaking of the musical advantages of Berlin, as being so preëminent, excepted London as the city where one could have the opportunity of hearing the most music. The trouble with London, however, is that most concerts are so costly that none but the rich can enjoy them and the student who comes abroad to study the art of music is debarred from hearing much music, as he is from enjoying the instructions of the best teachers from the same cause. Having now spent part of the season there, and through the kind offices of the leading critics having had many doors, otherwise inaccessible to me, thrown open, I can now affirm the statement of the surpassing richness of London in musical entertainments, from experience. And this, too, both in quantity and quality, the latter of course for the sums spent upon music are incredible to one who only knows America, Germany and Italy.

Another general remark, and that is, that the notices of the performances and performers by the leading critics are to my feelings more fair and candid than those I have found elsewhere, with here and there an exception. The writers are men of such wide experience, have had such ample opportunities of forming a standard of excellence, and are of such high culture, that certainly their more elaborate writings are worthy of all praise. My respect for London criticism has risen to the highest point. Their zeal, too, is to be remarked; think of a man going five or six hundred miles to the Rhine or even Berlin simply to hear for himself some new work of importance. To run over to Paris for such a purpose is an everyday affair. How often on the Continent have I heard English writers sneered at and their praise of English singers made a subject of ridicule. Now setting aside the few great singers of a world-wide reputation and those who are fixed for life in the principal opera houses of the Continent, I venture the assertion, that more good singing is to be heard in London, from performers of English birth, than in any foreign capital from natives. The average excellence of concert singers is far above that in any city in which I have ever been. As to the great exceptional vocalists, they, we know, no sooner have gained a great name than they all come to London to gather their harvest of guineas during "the season," and this has been so since the days of Handel. With performers upon instruments it is much the same. I imagine, however, that as a rule we are not to expect is great solo players of English birth,—certainly not in such numbers, because so few have such inducements to make music a profession, where so many paths of enterprise are open and because it is not so easy to keep a young pupil exclusively employed with an instrument year after year, as in Bohemia, Austria or the German States. I do not believe after what I have seen and heard that England is in any degree short of any other country in musical taste or talent,—that the taste is not so widely cultivated, except by the rich, this cannot be denied. How can it be when as a rule the ticket to a good concert costs more than the earnings of a poor man for a week? The value of cheap concerts in educating the people is, however beginning to be understood, and in one part of St. James' Hall, the finest quartets may be heard at the Monday concerts for a shilling. Good music may also often be heard at the Crystal Palace on shilling days. But as yet nothing for orchestral music exists in London like Liebig's concerts in Berlin. At the very few places, which I entered, where music accompanied beer, the pieces were trashy, the performance very mediocre. Whether good orchestral music can be given cheaply is perhaps doubtful, it is a pity not to try it. Jullien did; but as it seems not with pecuniary success. My pleasure in the cathedral service I wrote you about in the autumn of 1858, there is nothing to be added.

And now to my "Notes."

When I left the Victoria station upon my arrival in London, January 29, the fog was so dense as to cut off all view of more than ten or twelve houses at once, and the new language, English, was often put to use before I found the gentleman, by whose advice and kindness, I had been brought thither.

In the evening he took me to a concert in aid of the Hullah Fund, a mode of paying in some degree the debt which England owes that man for his untiring efforts to make the English people singers. The concert was given in St. James'

Hall in Piccadilly, a room about two-thirds as large as our Music Hall, but so vaulted as to injure in many parts the effect of the music. The theory says that the ceiling of a music room in order to attain the greatest number of good seats for the music should be flat. Does not experience prove the theory to be correct? Compare our Music Hall, that of the Sing-Akademie in Berlin and the Royal Opera house in the same city with any vaulted rooms in the world, similar in size, and the answer must be yes. I have been in seats in St. James' Hall, where every note was beautifully clear and distinct, and in others where all was confused and one could make little or nothing of the performance. At a concert in which Beethoven's Ninth symphony was given, I was forced to go to another and distant part of the room to escape the confusion worse confounded caused by the reverberation and echo of the beautiful-looking vaulted ceiling. The grand object to be attained in halls as in other things is the greatest good of the greatest number without infringing on the rights of the minority. Give us, therefore, music rooms in which all can hear distinctly, such may be constructed. The concert was orchestral and vocal, three overtures, divers scenas, songs, &c, a fantasia appassionata, composed and (solo) played by Vieuxtemps for violin and orchestra, and, as Part II., a cantata, text by Oxenford, music by Benedict. The title is "Undine" and I noticed that to be fully intelligible it requires a precious knowledge of Fouqué's delicious story; Characters, four, Undine, Bartalda, Hildebrand, Kubleborn; choruses of spirits and of men and women. Programme; Overture, Chorus and bass solo, Recitative and song with female chorus, Terzetto, Scena and aria, tenor, March, Wedding chorus, Air, (Bertalda), Duetto, Quartet, Scena and chorus, Solo and chorus, and Undine's closing solo, "Bright green earth, farewell." After the shockingly bad singing of which I had heard so much on the Continent, and to the horridly harsh concatenations of words called poetry, so often heard in Germany, there was something indescribably fresh and delighting in hearing English sung once more and by such nice singers as Miss Banks, a young favorite soprano, and Miss Palmer, mezzo soprano or contralto, or whatever they call her, and Mr. Wilbye Cooper, tenor. Benedict's music struck me as exceedingly graceful and pleasing, and the Cantata is well worth the notice of our singing societies at home, when war shall give way again to the arts.

Jan. 31. To Her Majesty's theatre. Balfe's Bohemian Girl and the Christmas pantomime, "Tom Thumb." Not very much struck by either says my note book. I enjoyed it specially because it was all English.

Feb. 4. Monday popular concert the tenth concert of the third season. And here was a sight I never saw before, and only possible, as I believe, in London. These concerts are given in St. James's Hall; price five shillings in the best half of the main floor, three shillings in the balcony, and other seats, among them those on the stage, one shilling. The music performed is the best chamber music, and as a specimen of the programme read the following:

PART I.

Quartett in D minor by Schubert, played by Vieuxtemps, Ries, 1st and 2d violin, Schreurs, viola, and Piatti, 'cellist, a most exquisite performer.
Song, "In questa tomba oscura," Beethoven; sung by Miss Lascelles.

Song, "Now summer has departed," Dussek; sung by Madame Louisa Vinning.
Sonata, C minor, Op. 111, (!) Beethoven, Mrs. Davison (Arabella Goddard).

PART II.

"Devil Sonata," for violin, Tartini, played by Vieuxtemps.
Song, "Come back to me," Henry Smart, sung by Miss Lascelles.

Song, "The mermaid's song," Haydn; Mrs. Vinning.
Trio, C minor, piano, violin and 'cello, Mendelssohn, by Mrs. Davison, Vieuxtemps and Piatti.

You see the character of the music. Now, think of an audience of at least 1500 assembled to hear it! The shilling seats, I was particularly pleased to see, were full, as I always found them, and those who occupied them were the stillest and clearly as a class, the most appreciative of the music. My sympathies are always with this class, for I have known too well by experience and observation how many of the truest lovers of music are debarred from it by its cost. It was very interesting to see that so long considered incomprehensible work, Beethoven's Sonata, was listened to with the greatest attention, save by the black sheep, and that the clear playing of Mrs. Davison, as though not a difficulty is to be found in it, gave it coherence and meaning to so large a number, especially to the shilling people. In the high priced seats, there was always less attention, and clearly less understanding of the best music, and many more of those annoyances, girls, who come to show themselves, young fellows who come because it is "the right thing," would be critics who discuss the players and singers with marvellous wisdom, and the like. In Berlin or Vienna there would have been from two hundred to twice that number of auditors perhaps; but if England is so far behind in musical culture and taste, as is often represented, is it not curious that an English city of five times the population of either of those should furnish an audience of full five times the number of one in them?

Feb. 11. Another Monday Evening Concert. This time all the pieces, by Beethoven, and the house was crowded—there must have been, I think, 2,000 auditors! Quartet, op. 57, No. 3; Prelude and Gavotte, Bach, Piatti; Trio in C minor; Quartette in D, by Mendelssohn. Vocal, the "Liederkreis" and the ariette, "The kiss," both sung by Sims Reeves, in an English translation of the texts.

At these concerts are sold, as at many others—indeed it is quite a necessary thing now—books of words with analytical and historical descriptions of the pieces performed; price usually sixpence. Those for the Monday Concerts are prepared by Mr. Davison of the Times and Musical World, and I was rather gratified to find Dwight's Journal frequently affording matter for them, as in the case of the Liederkreis "To the distant loved one." A notice by Dwight of this is copied and then the remark appended, "This is doubtless the language of enthusiasm; but considering the beauty of the music apostrophized, by no means unjustified."

Feb. 12. Having attended the rehearsal the day before of Stoepel's "Hiawatha" I was well prepared to attend its performance this evening. It ought not to have been produced in a theatre, certainly not in the immense one of Covent Garden, so far as the success of this particular work is concerned. At the same time, there may be other reasons why it was well for Stoepel to bring it out there. I was not in America when it was given in Boston and New York, and was exceedingly curious to hear it. Several pieces were "cut" to my disappointment, which had pleased me much in the rehearsal. How do I like it? Very much. There is, to me at least, a freshness and originality about it, very delightful. I have been for months at Lake Superior, have read all I could find in Schoolcraft and other writers of the Ojibway tales and traditions, and have perhaps greatly admired Longfellow's poem. (I could wish that he had spent a summer there, however, before writing it, it would have given it more life and picturesqueness). Now Stoepel seems to have caught not only the spirit of the poems but of the everlasting forest and cool bright waters of the lake. His music gave me an inexpressible longing to be there again. It touched my feelings, entered into my heart, gave me true musical enjoyment. Miss Heron's voice was not sufficient for the great house, and the audience was small in numbers. These circumstances were unfavorable to the enjoyment of the music, but still I have for a long time heard no work of this species, which gratified me so much.

It was followed by Balfe's "Satanella" which fell upon my ears "stale, flat, and unprofitable."

Feb. 14. To Her Majesty's theatre. "Robin Hood;" music by Macfarren. (The Queen kept the audience waiting an hour—three thousand persons waiting for one). The feeling upon the whole at hearing this was one of disappointment, but it was a first and only hearing, and from what I know of the composer, I am convinced that the reasons for it are to be found in myself, and my state of mind on that evening. The story is one which unless barbarously mutilated, must be interesting, and it was not ruined here, and, upon the whole, I believe should we ever have a good English operatic company at home, that "Robin Hood" will be found popular, as well as excellent to the musician. ("Ned" must not be surprised at my speaking thus of it).

Feb. 15. At a lecture by Mr. Chorley at the Royal Institution, on "English Lyric Poets and Poetry." I had hoped that the substance of the essay would have been upon the English language as adapted to music. But this was only touched upon. Still he confirmed me in the opinion long since advanced in Dwight's Journal, that of the three languages, German, French, and English, the latter is by far the best adapted for "a wedding to music." The lecture was so elegant in style, and interesting in matter that I hope some time to read it in print. I was too busy at that time to make notes the next day, and am unable now to "report" it.

Feb. 18. Monday concert again. Mendelssohn's Octet for string instruments, Beethoven's Waldstein sonata, played by Charles Halle, Bach's Chaconne, played by Vieuxtemps, Quartette in G minor, Mozart; vocal, two songs, one by Henry Smart, one by Sterndale Bennett, sung by Miss Laura Baxter, in an immense contralto voice.

By a note in the "programme book," it appears that Mendelssohn composed the octett at the age of fifteen! While it is not to me particularly pleasing music it is a most wonderful production of such a boy, and worthy of the Midsummer Night's Dream overture.

Feb. 25. Monday concert. Quartet, B flat, Mozart; Partita (for piano), Bach, played by Mr. Halle; Double quartet, Spohr; Sonata, piano and violin, Dussek, played by Halle and Vieuxtemps. Vocal, two songs, Dussek and Mendelssohn, sung by Miss Banks. Dussek ought to be more known in America. His music is delicious, and the Londoners owe much to Davison for reviving it. I am not up to such works as the double quartett, by Spohr, but how beautiful the Mozart quartett! The song by Dussek of whom I hope to send some particulars to the Journal so soon as I am again with my books. Says the analytical programme to one of a set of canzonets in the style of Haydn: "A contemporary of Mozart, although he died more than twenty years later than the composer of Don Giovanni, it is not surprising that a musician of such feeling and sensibility as Dussek should, in a great measure have caught the spirit of that incomparable genius. This is far more remarkable in Dussek's vocal words," &c. Mr. Davison supposes that this canzonet may have been suggested to the composer by hearing one of Petrarch's sonnets to Laura, the one beginning,

"Le Stelle, o' l'eleo e gli elementi a prova," &c.

"The reader was that Polish princess, who, (according to some authorities and among them Fétis) became so enamored of the celebrated pianist and composer, that she carried him off to a secluded retreat, situated near the frontier of Denmark, where they resided together nearly two years." The original words are, however, so uncommonly tame and inspired, that Mr. Oxenford has written a song to the music,

"Name the glad day, dear
Oh, I implore thee," &c.

The entr'acte in this programme contains "Mozart the Artist" (pp. 2 1-2), a short minuet by Bach, sketch of Spohr's life (pp. 3), a sketch for pianoforte by Dussek, and several notices of these Monday Concerts, from periodical publications. There is also appended to the notice of Dussek's Sonata, a sketch of his life.

Remarks on the Present State of Music.

The consideration of what is the true end and aim of musical instruction, and the surest path to its attainment, must be very interesting to an author, anxious to be serviceable to those whose early steps he guided, and desirous, also, of imparting a few hints and remembrances to his more advanced scholars, now perhaps teachers and guides themselves. For these objects no place is perhaps better suited than the present.

We therefore add these remarks, which partly belong immediately to our subject, and are at all events nearly related to it, on the object and method of musical education for the people, and for the profession.

Such observations, however, can be founded only on a clear view of the nature and tendency of music, and on a free and unprejudiced inspection into its present condition; and in the first place, in our own country, if indeed any one can flatter himself with the hope of possessing sufficient knowledge and freedom of opinion. Each individual commands only a limited circle of vision; and he who has looked around with lively interest, and has perceived the necessity of seeing with his own eyes and from his own point of view, knows how insufficient and uncertain are the communications of others in comparison with his own experience. Every individual must further confess, that he himself is influenced more or less by the circumstances of the moment, and that posterity alone can pronounce judgment upon all.

But if we are obliged to leave the decision to our successors, it is also our duty to consider what we are, and what they may become. We are bound, therefore, to examine and weigh our times, and we are content that our judgment on them be converted into evidence on ourselves before a higher tribunal.

If we cast a glance at the present state of music amongst us, we behold an all-pervading musical activity, unexampled in any former period; unless, perhaps, in the golden days of Italy and Spain. Then from vast cathedrals, and from hills crowned with pilgrims, streamed the wave of sacred song; then the festive trumpets clanged from glittering balconies, at rejoicings of princes and nobles; then the balmy nights were musical with harp and guitar in lovely hands. Then, also, our own country-revered in Luther's great days with his mighty melodies, which rolling from the holy choir, awakening, confirming, and inspiring, swept through the crowded market, and busy streets, into the domestic circle and private chamber.

What in those days gushed from excited nature and internal emotion, has been transmitted to us, closely allied as it is, to the deep poetical nature of our countrymen, and now seems to exercise an unlimited dominion over us.

So our public gardens, our domestic circles, our festivals teem with music; numerous and continually increasing bands march with our armies; and our tremulous ball-rooms are sinking under the oppression of pleasure.* What town is there so small as not to have at least winter concerts? What numberless amateurs, what quartet associations, what concerts of all descriptions crowd our larger cities? What period has ever seen in all places, and the whole year throughout, so many operas performed? and can anything at any period be compared to our immense gatherings of cities with cities in our musical festivals? In fine, what period has ever acknowledged, as ours has done, by word and deed, and with such sacrifices of time and gold, the indispensable and salutary effect of music in human education?

This spread of music, this universal sympathy in the concourse of sweet sounds, corresponds with the means which have been applied to it. However expensive instruction, instruments, and musical matters may be, all families of the middle classes, as well as of the higher, seek to procure them. Nowhere is there a deficiency of masters. In all schools singing is practised, seminaries, universities, and especial music schools continue the instruction to a higher grade. Everywhere singing academies, instrumental classes, and musical societies for private and public performance are established. City and state officials provide means, and assist in the performances in chapels and choirs, and in public instruction. Our book trade supplies works of art of all times, more numerous, commodiously, and cheaply than ever; and the construction of musical instruments is improved with the advance of the mechanical arts.

Such is the wonderful power of music to open all hearts, to gain sympathy and support from those even, who by deficient education or organization, are unable to participate in its joys, who bring their offerings to her fane, and then pleased, but unendowed retire.

How has music acquired this influence, and how does she requite our love and devotion?

She has the power, she is all-powerful in man, because she grasps him in all his fibres and nerves, corporeally and spiritually, the whole body and soul, sensibilities and thoughts. The roughest natures tremble at her dread clangor, while none resist her soft and captivating tones. Her corporeal effect is irresistible, magical, for the simply corporeal sensation suggests already that these tremblings of the nerves reach the inmost depths of the soul; that this corporeal charm is rendered holy and consecrated by its connexion with the foundation of our existence. He who has drawn from his soul its most delicate, most powerful, most secret feelings, who has commanded them at will, who has cast a light into the unknown depths of the mind, and there passed a dreamy consciousness; he who has seen in this undulating play of the soul, aspirations, visions, and the deepest ideas, erect as the commanding spirits,—who knows that our existence would be incomplete without the world of sounds, such a one comprehends that the spiritually sensitive pleasure in music leads on only to make our sensibilities more delicate and more excitable, to civilize and fructify the inmost foundations of the mind, and to manifest to our souls the highest expectations, a new invisible world of ideas, a new aspect of existence.

But its nature is two-fold, like that of man—it is corporeal from matter, and spiritual from the mind. Its influence may elevate us from a rough, hard, and useless condition, to humanity, sentiment, and action—it can soften and correct our sensibilities, awaken our expectations, enable us to soar above the purest humanity into the region of the god-like; and, in this inward elevation, fill us with the real working power of goodness. But this same influence of sounds may bury us in the seductive waves of corporeal sensation, always existing, though concealed; it may efface all noble feelings and sustaining power from the soul, and abandon us to thoughtlessness, infirmity of purpose, and the ever-destroying attractions of the senses, in whose train follow the strange twins—satety and inactivity; and, lastly, the fearful loss of interest in everything.

How does the dangerous and well-loved art repay our love and gifts?

Everything in art is pure, and noble, and good. Our weakness is to blame if her gifts turn to poison; if we, being arrived at the threshold of her temple, lie sinking there; if we hear her voice in our souls, but forsake her consecrated halls, and lose ourselves in the outer courts, destined only for the ofal of the beasts of sacrifice.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

The National Hymn.

WHAT IT OUGHT TO BE.

It has been recently stated that the tone of most of the productions sent in to the committee on the National Hymn is religious, and also that none of the distinguished poets of the country have entered the lists. The former statement we know to be at variance with the facts, as far as the committee themselves are acquainted with them. Many, but by no means "most," or even half, or one-third, of the verses thus far examined, are written to sacred hymn tunes, such as "Old Hundred," "Mear," "Coronation," and the like; but even of this part the greater number are not religious in tone. Whether any of the best known poets of the country have competed, we are authorized to say that the committee themselves do not know; for we are informed that they have yet to examine about one-third of the manuscripts in their hands; and as to the authorship of the few out of the 1,175 sent in, which they have thus far laid aside for further consideration, they are ignorant, the names of the writers in question being yet undisturbed in their sealed envelopes. We are credibly informed, however, from other quarters, that several of those who may be regarded as standing high in the second rank of our popular poets have sent in manuscripts.

It is to be feared that the public and the committee will both err in the establishment of too high a poetic standard for the hymn. Something "equal to the occasion" will be looked for; an unusual degree of lyric merit will be insisted on; and the hymns will be tried by their capability to produce a "striking" effect. Such a standard as this is a false one for any song. "Music married to immortal verse" is a very fine thing for a poet to write about; but it doesn't exist. Apollo seems to have forbidden the banners of that much-desired union. The words of the most popular songs are as poetry rarely above mediocrity; sometimes far below it. But they will be almost invariably found to express or suggest some strong sentiment common to the people by whom they are sung, if not to all humanity, or to bring up vividly some cherished association. If a high lyric standard is false for songs in general, written for music, especially is it so for a national song. Lyric excellence is not necessary for these songs. For instance, many fine national lyrics have been written by British authors; but what is the British national hymn? "God save the King;" which your true Briton sings with equal gusto before a big battle and after a big dinner. And yet as a lyric song that is very poor. The second part of the second stanza about the king's enemies is almost ridiculous:

"Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,
On thee our hopes we fix—
God save the King!"

In fact it is hardly burlesqued, but only made homogeneous by the profane Yankee parody;

"Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,
Get them into a fix—
— their souls."

But, in spite of this defect, it expresses in strong terms the British national feeling—and so, being set to a fine, vigorous, well-harmonized air, it has finally come to be, by mingled fitness and association, the most absolute expression of John Bullism. And, by the way, as it was written, or rather adapted, by John Bull, a doctor of music in King James the First's time, in whose reign the British nation was formed, though the true Briton is a formation of the last century, it would be curious to discover whether the use of John Bull as a nickname is traceable to the composer of the national air, or whether we have here a mere coincidence.

As to a hymn for Americans, it must of all things proclaim, assert, and exult in freedom. Let this be its expression; let it be brimful of loyalty to the flag, which is our only national symbol, and for that all the dearer; let its allusions embody our distinctive traits of nationality; let it have a fine rhythmical flow; and these points secured as to the words, the air is the most important matter. If that be such a one as all who sing can sing, and as the majority will like, association and habit will accomplish the rest. The public mind is in a condition now to accept with enthusiasm a hymn which fulfils these conditions. Much imagination they will not insist upon; on the contrary, it would be rather an objection in words intended for all lips. And let not the music be brilliant like an Italian cavatina, or curiously harmonized like a German choral. In a word, gentlemen of the committee, don't fire high, or you will miss your aim, but point blank at the people's hearts and then you may hit both head and heart.—N. Y. World.

Conducting;

A FEW PRACTICAL COUNSELS HOW TO LEARN IT.
BY HERMANN ZOPFF.

The feeling for rhythmic has to be strengthened by strict adherence to rests; at least, in case a part does not fall in at the right time, it is well to make the choir repeatedly count aloud during the rests; the conductor himself even may occasionally do the same, and explain how to count and how to fall in. Great difficulties are caused by accelerandos and rallentandos, for instance, by preparing the fermatas; these must be often studied separately. The singers have to be cautioned to take fresh breath for the fermatas; also to acquire equality in holding the same, (swelling and decreasing the tone,) and at last to bring it to an even and exact end. Let the conductor also explain to them the signs which we mentioned in the introduction. Nothing seems to be so difficult as to cause amateurs to be constantly attentive to the doings of the conductor. The singers must be made to look at him in the same way as good orchestra players are used to do.

If the conductor plays himself the accompaniment of the piano, he must try and make it a special practice to play, if possible, every thing with the left hand, in order to have the right hand disengaged for the purpose of conducting. He must also be placed in such a position that everybody can see him. A good distribution of the singers adds greatly to the general effect; it is for this reason that careless standing about or sitting apart in one and the same row of singers ought never to be tolerated.

After having looked to all these particulars and a good many more, which depend upon the individuality of the singers, it is time for the conductor to speak about delivery, that is to say, about distinct pronunciation, observance of the dynamics, and warmth and expression.

With regard to distinct pronunciation, let the conductor insist upon plainly-written words; badly-written parts are often the cause of a poor performance. The singers ought, therefore, always to be familiar with the text. The conductor is further to call attention to all such words which have to be accentuated; he must insist upon a clear pronunciation of the vowels, also of certain consonants, and must never allow a breaking of a word by way of taking breath.

As to the observance of the dynamic signs, it is well to call, beforehand, the attention of the choir to all the fortes and pianos in the piece to be performed, also, caution, already mentioned, to take fresh breath upon all high tones. But especially an equal strength in all the four voices must be aimed at, as, very often tenor and soprano are apt to scream, while bass and alto bellow, and the latter sometimes can scarcely be heard. If a solo voice is added to the choir, let the conductor take care that it is not drowned by the latter. Let him never lose an opportunity to educate the choir in the art of singing mezza voce. The pianissimo of a great mass of voices produces a charming effect, which, on account of its soul-breathing nature, cannot be equalled by any instrumental effect.

Great difficulty is often caused by those in the choir who are also solo singers. It is chiefly with regard to them that the conductor ought repeatedly to explain to the choir, that a good chorus singer should never hear his own voice in the choir. Who sings so loud that he hears himself in spite of the singing around him, will surely outcry the others, and thus spoil the general effect.

Only on such basis can it be expected to hear a choir deliver with warmth and expression. To this effect it is necessary to call the attention of the choir to the character and the sentiments which are contained in the piece to be performed, and never lose an opportunity to insist upon a refined and expressive delivery.

The conducting of the solo-parts in a chorus is based upon the same principles, only with this modification, that the signs ought to be less broad. Sure soloists are sometimes disturbed and hurt by a constant time-beating of the conductor. But in the ensemble these somewhat spoiled people have to conform to the rules applied to the whole choir.—Mus. World.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of the Opera of "Martha." Piano Solo.

Editorial Correspondence.

No. XVI.

LONDON, July 4.

If the chorus singing of the Yorkshiremen in the "Messiah" excelled rather in the heroic quality, than in any especial delicacy or fineness, I certainly can praise their glee singing without any such deduction. This was instanced in a miscellaneous concert which they gave St. James's Hall on the evening after the Oratorio. It was of those long London programmes, whose chief sin is their length. There were perhaps three hundred voices—the male counter-tenor taking for the most part the place of the female contralto, as is too commonly the case here. The conductor, Mr. R. S. Burton, seemed to have the entire confidence and control of his forces. They sang with unsurpassable precision, spirit, euphony and delicacy some of those old well-worn glees by Bishop, making them seem like new things, and yet the same, so that one wondered to find them after all so beautiful. "Sleep, gentle lady," "When wearied wretches sink to sleep," &c., were rendered with the utmost nicety. Spofforth's "Hail! smiling morn" took everybody off their feet, there was such a sonorous spring to it. Mendelssohn's "Nightingale" (part-song) was exquisite; no one could complain that "she has not learned another lay." Her old song delights us. So too a couple more of his; and Müller's "May Day" made a great impression particularly by the rich and solid mass of big bass on the phrase; "But my honest heart receiving," &c. Bishop's Quintet: "Blow, gentle gales" was artistically given by Mrs. Sunderland and the other soloists who sang in the "Messiah." (By the way, the tenor on that occasion was Mr. Inkersall, and not Mr. Whitehead; the bill left one to guess which was which.) Sims Reeves, of course, was the crown of the solo-singing; though he might have found better field for his fine abilities than sweetish sentimental airs by Balfe and Kücken. But such a singer can make any song enchanting; he handles every task so artist-like. His voice is sweetness and purity itself, and yet has manly ring and mettle. A more perfect sostenuto, a more ductile continuity of tone—the liquid long drawn out quality—it would be hard to find. His is the honest pure cantabile, which wins upon the ear by the admirable gravitation of tone, by the exquisite rounding of the phrase, by just proportion and fine shading, in a word, by bringing out just what is in a melody, and not by the addition of common-place, superfluous ornaments. In a song with chorus, which closed the concert, a quaint old thing by Purcell:

"Come, if you dare, our trumpets sound;
Come, if you dare, our foes rebound.
We come, we come, we come, we come,
Says the double, double, double beat of the thundering drum, &c.

we had a touch of the trumpet quality of his full voice and could understand why he is so famous in the oratorios. Such a greeting as Reeves got from both orchestra and audience would be enough to turn the brain of one less used to it.

He seems to be the hero of the singing democracy. For instrumental music, the pride of British pianism, Miss Arabella Goddard, the young lady who has won so many laurels by her easy mastery of Beethoven's great Sonata, op. 106 (till recently repeated insurmountably difficult), of Dussek's "ne plus ultra" Sonata, &c., treated us, not to examples of such high emprise, to be sure, but to a couple of very beautiful fantasias, to the delight both of the popular and of the classically nice ear. These were, Stephen Heller's transcription of Mendelssohn's melodious "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," and a capital fantasia by Benedict on Dr. Arne's jack-o'-lantern little Puck song: "Where the bee sucks." A happy instinct led Mr. B. to such a flower for honey. The old tune lent itself admirably to his graceful and artistic treatment; in his hands it makes a really characteristic fantasia, charmingly fresh after the Thalberg things have grown common-place. The performer left nothing to be desired—in the matter of quality—but of quantity the people did desire more, and so she gave "The last rose," as not "left blooming alone" by Thalberg.

In this connection I may recall a similar feast of vocalism, which took place in the same hall a few evenings before. It was the last subscription concert of the "Vocal Association," a fine choir of amateurs of both sexes, who enjoy the privilege of such a teacher and conductor as JULES BENEDICT, than whom there is hardly a more clever or accomplished musician in England. This programme was even longer than the other—so long that nerves fatigued with sight-seeing in this great bewildering city could not endure the whole of it, even with angelic harps relieving the excess of sweets; and so weak human nature was compelled to leave just as our old friend Aptomas made his bow. Of the beginning, too, we lost a sacred part-song by Haydn, and a "Hark, the lark" song by Curschmann. Our ears, on entering, were greeted by a clear, full flood of harmony, which proved to be a "Christmas Carol" part-song by Otto Goldschmidt and which did honor to the choir and composer. Sig. Guglielmi sang an air from Handel's Ezio, and another by Gounod to words by Lamartine. Miss Stabbach sang a solo with charms from Bennett's "May Queen," and "My mother bids me bind my hair;" Miss Whitty (an English lady, from Italian theatres) Non piu mesta, and an aria by Coppola; Miss Messent, "Kathleen Mavourneen" and the solo in the Ave Maria from Mendelssohn's Loreley; Miss Koch, one of the great airs from Clemenza di Tito. All respectably well, I dare say, but leaving no distant remembrance on the fatigued brain. The chorus pieces did impress themselves, and were right edifying; a chorale by Bach especially; and another, by Graun, and Mendelssohn's part-song "O, hills, O vales," all finely sung. Nor can one forget the masterly manner in which Rossini's humorous "Papalacci" trio was sung by the Signori Belart, Garcia and Belletti; or the duet from "the Barber:" "All'idea di quel metallo," by Belart and Belletti. Belart has a capital light tenor, which he displayed artistically in an aria from Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto. Belletti, for solo, gave the Duke's aria in Lucrezia Borgia. One of the best of baritones is he—grown stouter since the Jenny Lind times in America. A very young pianist, Miss Alice Mangold, played a prelude by Bach, and some of the more difficult of Henself's graceful pieces, with the tasteful ease of a mature artist. And this was not all; but enough for a specimen of scores of such miscellaneous concerts in London, of which this was probably one of the best.

We turn now to a greater theme—too great to enter fully into in a letter. Mr. CHARLES HALLE, of world-wide repute as one of the first classical pianists and musicians of the day, is a German by birth, who first made an available name for himself in Paris, and has since lived for many years in Manchester, England, where a great activity in the highest classical direction has received its constant impulse and control from him. Manchester at any price retains its hold upon him; but to the London season his presence is also indispensable. This season he has been putting the crown upon his many musical good works by giving a series of eight "Beethoven Recitals," in which he is performing in course, in the order of their opus members, all the (thirty-two) Sonatas which Beethoven wrote for the piano-forte unaccompanied. It will have been my rare good fortune to attend the last three of these. Of two I can already speak. They are "morning concerts," held on successive Fridays from three till five o'clock P. M., in St. James's Hall. The scene itself is interesting. Imagine an audience of five or six hundred persons, ladies mostly in the majority, but including most of the earnest amateurs and artists of the city, an eminently refined, severe, and therefore the most flattering audience, listening in earnest silence, many of them with copies of the score in hand, for two hours at a time, to such interpretations of all the Beethoven Sonatas as one is seldom privileged to hear of three or four of them! And the attention does not give out with the few well-known specimens, with those that are esteemed the clearest, those which have something popular and taking about them, or which lie nearest to the common plane of moods and sympathies; they follow him, or at least reverently try to follow him, the wonderful tone-poet, into the remoter reaches of his inspiration, into long and arduous passages reputed transcendental and obscure, into the depths where his great soul wrestled with unseen enemies, with Fate itself, and won sweet victory forever. They follow, undismayed by technical difficulties and what seemed labyrinthine or insane anomalies of form, led by the sure hand of this interpreter, who holds the thread of it all, and find and feel that on the inside all is poesy and light, the clearest spiritual meaning, high, distinct, triumphant purpose, the happiest vision and reward of fancy, the directest, warmest utterance of a man's heart, a great one, greatly tried and greatly persevering and believing, plucking an eternal rose of Beauty out of every nettle danger. More or less, we mean, of course, according to the musical and moral fitness of the listener; and no one dares say that he appreciates Beethoven fully. But it was something to see an audience so bent on understanding all it could, and for the most part so manifestly gratified. A few restless symptoms in here or there a group or couple caught beyond their depth, were only the exceptions which prove the rule. "Analytical programmes," prepared with tact and understanding by Mr. J. W. Davison, put the listener without a score in possession of the historical origin, the general design and characteristics of each Sonata, together with the notes of leading themes and striking points of treatment. Such aid is worth the shilling.

In his sixth "Recital," June 21st, Mr. Halle opened with the Sonata in F, op. 54, which consists of only two movements (Tempo di minuetto, and Allegretto), one of the least elaborate or striking perhaps of the series, but still unmistakably Beethoven's, and interesting in the course. Then came a song (in English) from Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris—worthy relief for such a programme, worthily presented by Sims Reeves. Next the grand "Sonata Appassionata," in F minor, op. 57, one of the great ones, full of fire, original and moody fancy, and of wondrous art. Mr. Halle gave an unimpeachably clean, tasteful, forcible and and finished reading of it. We could have wished a little more fire, more nervous abandon in his playing. Every other excellence it had; but it seemed (like most of his renderings) like a masterly and faultless reading by one of a much cooler brain than that from which the composition sprang; it lacked the Beethoven temperament. The third lesson of the day was the lovely Sonata in the difficult key of F sharp major, op. 78, commencing with a brief, questioning adagio, answered at length by an allegro ma non troppo, and followed by only a second movement Allegro vivace, in the same key; both developed out of most melodies and unique themes, a work of the finest beauty, but too baffling to most fingers to have become widely known. It will be admired in London after this. An indifferent ballad by Sims Reeves, and then, fourthly and finally, that lively, happy, sunshiny little Sonata, sometimes called the "Queen of Sonatas," in G major, op. 79, which opens with a rapid waltz-like measure (Presto alla Tedesco) inimitably fine and unique in its phrasings and its modulations, and yet as spontaneous as it is singular. This is followed by an Andante espressivo in G minor, nine-eighths measure, which sounds like some old volkslied. The happiest and play-fullest of Vivace, one might say Scherzo movements, but for the 2-4 time, concludes it. He played this to a charm. We have heard the old Moscheles also play it con amore in his hospitable home in Leipzig. Here we must break off in the middle. D.

Sixty-Eighth Annual Festival of the Public Schools.

The Sixty-Eighth Annual Festival of the Public Schools of the city of Boston, was celebrated at the Music Hall, on Tuesday last, July 23, at 4 o'clock, P. M. The following was the Order of Exercises:

1. Voluntary on the Organ, by J. C. D. Parker.
2. Prayer.
3. Address, by the Chairman of the Festival Committee.
4. The Lord's Prayer, a Gregorian Chant, sung in unison by twelve hundred children of the public schools.
5. Choral, St. Ann's. Attributed to Sebastian Bach. With Organ Accompaniment.
6. Address.
7. Three-Part Song, by Abt. Sung by the Girls' High and Normal School.
8. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," from "Elijah," Mendelssohn. Sung by the Children, with organ and orchestral accompaniment.
9. Address.
10. Hallelujah Chorus, from the Messiah, Handel.
11. Choral, The Judgment Hymn, Martin Luther.
12. Address and Presentation of Bouquets to the Medal Scholars, by the Mayor. During the presentation, music was performed by the Germania Band.
13. The Old Hundredth Psalm.
From all that dwell below the skies,
Let the Creator's praise arise;
Let the Redeemer's name be sung
Through every land, by every tongue.

Eternal are thy mercies, Lord;
Eternal truth attends thy word;
Thy praise shall sound from shore to shore,
Till suns shall rise and set no more.

14. Benediction.

The arrangements for this beautiful festival were almost identical with those of former similar occasions which have been often described in these columns. The decorations this time, of course, were more than usually, emblematic of the feeling of the day, and the country's sacred flag was everywhere conspicuously displayed. There was the same bouquet of youthful beauty rising in a vast amphitheatre from floor almost to ceiling, and encroaching a little more than formerly upon the seats of the balconies. The young choristers, at the sound of the trumpet, came in orderly procession and quickly filled the seats assigned them, presenting a charming spectacle to the eyes of the spectators.

The addresses by His Honor the Mayor, the Hon. JOSIAH QUINCY, Jr., and the Rev. Dr. RANDALL, were judiciously brief and appropriate, all colored by the feelings of patriotism that were uppermost in the hearts of all, that day.

The singing was even an advance upon the admirable performances of former years. We have never heard half the number of voices sing so absolutely with but one voice, as did these twelve hundred children in some of the pieces of this programme. It was but one voice, precise even to a syllable or a letter, in the words, and accurate to perfection in the duration of the notes, obeying implicitly the baton of Mr. ZERRAHN. The crescendos and diminuendos were admirably given, and the performance reflected the highest credit upon the conductor, for his success in training so large and unmanageable a body, as so many persons of tender years must of necessity be. The most successful performance, as well as the most difficult, was that of the Hallelujah Chorus from the MESSIAH, which was given with excellent and novel effect.

We doubt whether the charity children at St. Paul's (whose performance is described in another column) can have given it better than the children of our public schools did in the Music Hall last Tuesday. We especially recall the fine effect of the passage "The Kingdom of this World" as we then heard it, and likewise, "And He shall reign forever and ever." It would have been difficult to imagine that this sublime chorus could have been so effectively rendered without the male parts which seem to give some of its grandest effects, in its original form.

The pretty ceremony of presenting the bouquets to the medal scholars, by the Mayor, followed the singing and addresses, when the whole audience joined in singing the Old Hundredth Psalm and after the Benediction, speedily dispersed to allow the children to partake of the collation prepared for them.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB are about to start on a little summer tour; going to Brunswick and Middleboro, to attend the College Commencements in those places, and giving a few concerts there and in the neighboring towns. To our readers in those places, we need hardly say any more of the rich treat that is in store for them, for our columns have often reported the excellencies of their performances, and we should be at a loss to find new terms in which to commend them to the audiences that are yet to listen to them. The best of music played as this Club play it, will be no small enjoyment in these times when pleasures are few.

Musical Correspondence.

BROOKLYN JULY 22, 1861.—If ever a man made a promise to himself (and did not keep it says you)—it was myself—that I would occasionally jot down the musical doings that take place in this neighborhood. War times have frightened the singing birds away or into silence. Concerts are things that were. Of course there is no opera unless we take a steamer to hear our dear little Patti in London. Ullman, however has returned from his annual trip to Europe, and having a lease of the New York and Brooklyn Academies promises a full season (?) Muzio is still in town and will probably make an effort in Boston and Philadelphia. (So he says.) What can I do better than to give you our "Philharmonic" programmes of last season, hoping in my next, not to be obliged to speak of the musical past, to make up an article?

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society has finished its fourth season with great eclat. All bills are paid and the treasurer shows a balance of two thousand dollars. The orchestra is most capital and is composed of fifty of the elite in their profession. Mr. Theo. Eisfeld conductor.

First Concert, Nov. 17, 1860.

Second Symphony, D major. Beethoven
Overture, "Byron's Manfred". Schumann
Overture "A Night's Sojourn in Granada". Kreutzer
Soloists—Madame Fabbri, Signor Stigelli and Mr. F. Bergner (Violoncello).

Second Concert, Jan. 19, 1861.

Third Symphony, A minor (Recollections of Scotland). ... Mendelssohn
Overture, "The Bride of Kynast". Liszt
Overture "Euryanthe". Von Weber
Soloists—Madame Colson, Signor Ferri and Mr. L. Schreiber (Cornet-a-piston).

Third Concert, Feb. 16th.

Symphony in B flat. Gade
Overture, "Magic Flute". Mozart
Overture, Tannhäuser. Wagner
Soloists—Miss Hinkley, Signora Elena, Signor Susini and a quartette of French Horns (H. Schmits, Prahl, Lacroix and G. Schmits.)

Fourth Concert, March 23d.

Eighth Symphony in B flat. Beethoven
Overture, "King Lear". Berlioz
Selections, "Midsummer Night's Dream". Mendelssohn
(1 Scherzo—2 Intermezzo Allegro—3 Nocturne—4 Wedding March).
Soloists—Miss Carlotta Patti, Mad. Strakosch, Mr. Robert Goldbeck (Pianoforte).

Fifth Concert, April 27.

Symphony in F major, (Consecration of Sound). Spohr
Overture, "Elisire". Beethoven
Overture, "Olympa". Spontini
Soloists—Miss Kellogg and Mr. C. Kopplitz (Flute).

Extra concert in aid of the Patriot Fund, May 18. Popular programme—Overtures "William Tell," "Massaniello," "War Gallop," by E. Mollenhauer. New National Song, words by Gen. George P. Morris, music by Signor Muzio. Soloists, Misses Hinkley and Kellogg, Signori Brignoli, Susini, Centemeri, Mr. L. Schreiber (Cornet-a-piston) Mr. Geo. Wm. Warren (Pianoforte and Alexandro Organ). Also the chorus from the Italian opera conductors, Mr. Eisfeld and Signor Muzio.

This extra concert gave the Patriotic Fund $900 after paying all expenses. The "Academy" was beautifully decorated with flags and flowers, and the occasion was delightful in every way. The artists all volunteered of course and so sang and played con amore. The attendance during the whole season has been excellent—(that two thousand dollars over and above being the proof) and our new and very handsome Opera House presented on each occasion a gay appearance, for Brooklyn is replete with beauties, who dress charmingly and although they chat over much (no thanks to those fascinating young men) at all rehearsals and even in a less degree at concerts—still they love music, make the papers support the "Philharmonics," and the Opera, and give zest to all musical undertakings among us. Yes, verily.

JEM BACOS.

The Boston Post asks, "Who wants a better 'National Him' than Gen. Scott?" Hartford Courant answers, "Nobody, Mr. Post. We can get along with that and 'Uncle Psalm.'"

Musical Chit-Chat.

CHICAGO. — In the last letter from our correspondent from this city, Mr. CADY was the conductor of the concert reported, and not "nobody." Mr. Cady is surely entitled to an apology which is herewith tendered.

Mr. J. K. PAINE, who left this city two or three years ago, for the purpose of studying music in Europe, has returned, after acquiring much fame as an organist in Germany, where he has received the highest commendation from the best musical critics in the old world. He is soon to give a concert in this, his native city: and he must receive the most substantial tokens of our appreciation of his successful efforts to obtain a musical education.—Portland Transcript.

The organ in the Episcopal Church in Hampton, Va., was found to be out of order on a recent Sabbath, whereupon a skilful private in a Massachusetts set to work and repaired it.

DEATH OF MRS. BROWNING.—Late foreign papers bring us the intelligence of the death of Mrs. Browning, an event which occurred on the 29th of June, at Florence. She was born in London in 1809, and was educated with great care in a masculine range of studies, and with a masculine strictness of intellectual discipline. Beginning to write at a very early age, in 1826 there appeared from her pen a volume entitled "An Essay on Mind, with other Poems." In 1833, she again appeared before the appeared before the public in a volume entitled "Prometheus Bound, and other Poems." In 1838 appeared "The Seraphim, and other Poems." About the time of the publication of this volume, Mrs. Browning's health became impaired by the rupture of a blood-vessel, and her state was rendered even more critical by the subsequent sad death of a much-loved brother. For many years her life was that of a confirmed invalid. In the retirement of her sick chamber she sought refreshment in the gravest studies, and from her pen there appeared in the London Athenæum, a series of articles on the Greek Christian Poets. In 1844, the first collected edition of her works was published, and this was soon followed by her introduction, to Mr. Browning, whose wife she became in the autumn of 1846, being then restored to a good degree of health. Since their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Browning have resided for the most part in Florence, where, in 1849, a son was born to them. "Casa Guidi Windows" was published in 1851. "Aurora Leigh," her most important work, was published in 1856.

The Phil. Evening Bulletin gives some extracts from Scudo's musical article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, for May:

He says "after the three stormy representations of Tannhäuser, the theatre has returned to its ordinary solemn calmness. The German tenor, M. Niemann, has thrown up his engagement, and retraced his steps to his own country, which he should never have left. The two sisters Marchesio, have also gone from the Opera. They are two sisters of talent, who cannot be separated without losing much of the charm which results from the fusion of their soprano and contralto voices. Endowed with little natural grace, wanting in style, the Marchesio sisters have not enough élan and dramatic originality to satisfy all the exigencies of the operatic répertoire. Taking it all in all, the Marchesios have done well in returning to leurs premiers amours."

"Mlle. Trebelli is a young person of about twenty-four years of age, middle height and intelligent face. Her voice is a mezzo soprano of good high compass, perfect equality and tinted towards the low part with a certain contralto sonorousness, but it is not a contralto properly said. The voice of Mlle. Trebelli recalls Pasta's to me a little, and she is about Pasta's height. Mlle. Trebelli vocalizes with great mechanical perfection, but this mechanism is without accent, and her voice, which is so equal and well managed wants radiance and liquid lightness; in other words, Mlle. Trebelli is cold; she is a pretty Parisienne, who sings with more intelligence than sentiment, with more bravura than style. Her pronunciation, too, is quite defective; she sometimes displaces the prosodic accent and breaks of the termination of phrases in a disagreeable way. The Parisian public received Mlle. Trebelli with kindness, but without the slightest enthusiasm, as she produced on them only the effect of a good scholar who has yet many things to learn, if it is only modesty. Mlle. Trebelli must not forget that at Paris we are not so easily pleased as people are at Berlin and Madrid."

Then follows this notice of an American singer. "As for Mme. Lorini, who comes also from Brussels and Berlin, she is a large and beautiful person, who sings like —, an American, which she is. Her voice is an extensive and flexible soprano, which ought to have been something remarkable in the first period of her career. She is, however, a singer of talent."

ORGAN EXHIBITION.—The exhibition of the large church organ, built by the Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook, for St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich., took place at their manufactory on Saturday afternoon, according to previous notice. The organ, though not one of the largest manufactured at this establishment, gave evidence of thorough and careful workmanship, and was remarkable for its power and brilliancy as a full organ, as well as great purity of tone, and the smooth and even voicing of its individual stops. The case is in the Gothic style, to correspond with the architecture of the church, built of solid chestnut, and displays a front of massive gilded pipes, which form a part of the Great Diapason. As we listened to the instrument, which, under the skilful hands of J. H. Willcox, Esq., gave such convincing evidence of its capabilities in its solo and orchestral effects, together with its powerful resources for chorale and Fugue, we could but wish to congratulate our Detroit friends upon the accession of so valuable a musical aid, and at the same time so successful a specimen of New England skill and ingenuity.—Transcript.

A POET AMONG THE SOLDIERS.—N. P. Willis, who has been visiting the city of "magnificent" encampments, thus writes to the Home Journal concerning—

VESPER SERVICE AMONG THE RHODE ISLANDERS

Washington is all one stirring drama; but the "thing to see," among the daily sights, is the evening parade and vespers of the Rhode Island Regiment. My friend Lieut. Wise drove me to the spot, amid one of the most beautiful of sunsets, and we found a large representation of the society of the capitol already on the ground—the band playing and the men under review by their Colonel.

The locality of the encampment—(Eckington, the country seat of the late Joseph Gales)—will be remembered by many as the scene of never-ending hospitalities. The house stands just as in the life time of the eminent and beloved man whose home it was, (Mrs. Gales still resident there), and the barracks of the regiment are just visible through the trees across the lawn. A lap of green meadow lying in the lap of a curved ridge, beyond the grove, forms the parade; and this, as the spectator looks down upon it from the terrace above, is the foreground of a landscape in itself absolutely delicious; but the regiments with their Kossuth hats, and glittering arms, and with the quiet tone of their uniforms, complete the picture with wonderful effect. The poetic part of it is its prayer. The grounding of arms, the sudden stillness of the drums, the stepping forward of the chaplain, and the well-chosen words of the invocation and blessing, left scarce a dry eye among the spectators; and how salutary and elevating must be such influence to the soldiers themselves, needs but little skill for the divining.

I can scarcely imagine a righteous battle better prepared for, than by the closing hymn that was sung after the prayer, accompanied with the music of the military band. The voices of the men swelled up like the trained tumult of an advancing host, through an atmosphere that was all aglow with the red and gold of a magnificent sunset, and the smoke of the camp-fires among the trees seemed to pause and tremble with the reverberation—the whole scene appearing like a sublime service that had been consecrated by the sudden kindling of earth and sky with an "unavailing of the shekinah." The Rhode Island Regiment should be congratulated, too, I think, on the chance that has given them a leader who looks fully up to it, Col. Burnside's uncovering of his head for the benediction as he stands before them, being such a show of intellectual pre-eminence (phrenologically and physiognomically speaking) as may well invest it with an authority like that of a sacred altar that is to be borne before them to victory.

The Charity Children in St. Paul's Cathedral.

After their temporary emigration to Sydenham it was pleasant to find the charity children once again assembled under the magnificent dome of that cathedral which, time out of mind has been the scene of their anniversary festival. It was at one period believed in many quarters that the doors of St. Paul's were closed forever to these interesting gatherings, but the sequel has proved that this was entirely a misapprehension, and that the removal last summer to the Crystal Palace was necessitated by the changes and repairs within the walls of the sacred edifice, in connection with the evening services under the dome, and other important innovations—the removal of the old organ of Father Smith, and the erection of the (all but) new one of Mr. Hill, among the rest. At any rate, the anniversary was celebrated yesterday to the edification and delight of thousands upon thousands of people, who came not merely to join in the service, but to welcome the juvenile choristers back again to their proper domain. Never was the meeting held under more auspicious circumstances; nor could it possibly have afforded more unalloyed satisfaction to those who enjoyed the privilege of witnessing it. Mr. Arthur S. Newman, the able and zealous architect of the Society of Patrons, had a double task of preparation. Everything was to be done again,—the scaffolding to be entirely remodelled, improved accommodation to be furnished, as well for the children as for the public, and a new pulpit to be erected for the conductor, besides other provisions rendered indispensable by the recent alterations in the interior of the cathedral. All this has been accomplished with the very best results; and not only are the children now heard better, but they are seen better in the bargain—a circumstance not likely to be regretted. The "coup d'œil," which has been so often described in enthusiastic terms, was, perhaps, more imposing now than on any previous occasion; and, as the singing not of the children solely but of the gentlemen and boys of the united choirs in an equal degree—was, for various reasons, much more steady and effective than formerly, the gratification of all who take an interest in this important feature of the Cathedral service was complete. The new conductor, Mr. Buckland (one of the vicars-choral), who, in conjunction with Mr. George Cooper, the talented sub-organist, has been training the children in the interim, is evidently well fitted for his post. His method of beating time is more precise and intelligible than that of his respected predecessor, Mr. Bates, of Woodford, and he exhibits, moreover, equal promptness and decision wherever those qualities are most needed—as, for example, in beginning and in leaving off.

The whole of the musical arrangements were, as usual, under the superintendence of Mr. Goss, organist of St. Paul's, who has so often entitled himself to honorable mention at these anniversaries, and who was never more successful in obtaining an efficient execution of the responses, psalms and anthems on the present occasion. The magnificent new organ, at which—with the able co-operation of Mr. George Cooper—Mr. Goss presided, was, as may be readily believed, an important auxiliary; while the trumpets and drums—stationed, according to custom, in the immediate vicinity of the organ, and represented by those thoroughly experienced performers, Messrs. T. Harper, Irwin, Stanton, Jones, Macfarlane, and Chipp, were as useful as ever in promoting vigour and precision of the "attack." The order of the service, so far as the musical part was concerned, presented no change. Before prayers the children gave the (old) 100th Psalm—"All people that on earth do dwell"—with marvellous purity of tone. Such a choral unison is, indeed, unparalleled as it is peculiar. The contrast between the solo verses—for instance, the second and third, the former of which was delivered by the boys, the latter by the girls alone,—and those, like the first and last, upon which the whole body of voices (close upon five thousand) were engaged with a sonority that baffles description, was of the remarkable features of this remarkable performance. "Before the sermon," the 113th Psalm (new version)—"Ye saints and servants of the Lord"—set to a tune by J. Grantham, which, composed nearly a century since (1774), has, nevertheless, little that is venerable about it, was chiefly worth notice on account of the "Hallelujah" at the end, which, though in the same key, does not seem to belong to it. "After the sermon" was quite another affair. Dr. Croft's tune to the 104th psalm (old version), "My soul praise the Lord; speak good of His name," written as far back as 1702, is one of the finest psalm tunes extant. It was well and powerfully sung by the children, a sort of antiphonal effect (really "effective") being obtained by allotting the second verse to the girls on one side, and the third to the girls on the other side of the organ, which, moreover, afforded a grateful and delicate relief to the first and fourth verses, upon which all the voices, boys and girls, was simultaneously employed. The exertions of the united choirs were all that could be wished, although the result of their singing would, we think, be even yet more impressive if the scaffolding was arranged as to place the choir of adults a little higher above the troubles (boys), by which a more thorough assimilation of tone would undoubtedly be obtained. Their programme was blameless, if by no means novel. Dr. Crotch's double chant "in C," for the "Venite," substituted a second time for the familiar "Jones in D," substituted a second time for the familiar "Jones in D," with deference to Haydn, who admired (and is said to have patched up) this "composition" of the then organist of St. Paul's, and with deference to His Majesty George III., who also entertained for it a signal predilection, probably because it was very easy to sing—is superior in every sense to its long established predecessor. Even this, however, might be improved upon, if Mr. Goss would set about it. "Boyce in A," for "Te Deum" and "Jubilate" (rendered to perfection by the choir), though originally composed for that excellent amateur, George III., might also be exchanged with advantage; and if there is any foundation for a rumor that, before next anniversary, something new (from Mr. Goss's own pen?) will be in readiness—something, too, in which the children can take part—we may have at length an opportunity of judging what the experience of modern art is able to contrive with such an exceptional combination of resources. Nothing could possibly be more appropriate, nothing more welcome. The children who yesterday gave the responses of old Tallis (organist to no less famous a potentate than "Good Queen Bess") so well, joined with such unanimity in the "Gloria Patri" to the Psalms, and—most difficult of all—were favorably conspicuous, by the side of the practised musicians of the choir, in Handel's Coronation Anthem, "Zadok the priest," and in the magnificent "Hallelujah" (Messiah) of the same immortal composer (the time of which was most judiciously moderated by the organist) would, surely not sink under the burden of this fresh task, which could easily be accommodated to their recognized means. Failure is possible, doubtless; but, even with that untoward eventuality in the background, the experiment at least should be tried. The fact that contemporary art, native or foreign, has attempted nothing whatever for such a ceremony, is not very creditable to either. It seems scarcely probable that the effect of this multitude of young, fresh, and telling voices, heard, for example, in the unison—"The kingdom of this world is become the kingdom of our Lord, and of His Christ,"—and other points of the "Hallelujah," should not have inspired some composer with an idea worthy of the occasion. Why, moreover (to quit the subject), should not the children as well as the members of the choir, join audibly in the Confession, Creed, and Lord's Prayer? The result could only enhance the solemnity of these impressive parts of the service. The prayers were "entonned" by the Rev. Mr. J. V. Povah, and the lessons read by the Rev. Mr. W. J. Hall (Minor canons). The sermon, delivered by the Bishop of Bath and Wells (Lord Auckland)—who selected for his text a significant passage in St. Matthew—"The poor have the Gospel preached unto them"—(chap. 11, verse 5)—was unusually brief but excited marked attention on the part of all those who were near enough to the preacher to catch the words that flowed with unimpeded eloquence from his lips.

One word about the organ, which among the recent acquisitions of the Cathedral is certainly one of the most eminently serviceable, and for that reason if for no other, ought not to be left the most incomplete and unsightly. It is beyond question one of the finest instruments of modern English manufacture, but although it contains 60 sounding stops, much more is wanted to make it all that is desirable and all that is capable of becoming, larger bellows, for example, and a steam engine (water-power being perhaps the most costly), as a substitute for eight men, whose united and arduous exertions are now required to supply the necessary wind. Other improvements (to specify which would be trenching too closely on professional technicalities) are no less indispensable, if the organ is to be worthy of its original design, and of the place it occupies. How these are to be brought about, however, with nearly £600 still owing to the mere charge for removing it (from the Panopticon) and re-erecting it where it stands, remains to be seen. The friends to the charities, the advocates of the evening services, and well-wishers in general to our noble Cathedral (to say nothing of the lovers of music, and especially of sacred music, to which the organ is so powerful an adjunct) might do much to promote this object, and to assist the children's anniversary as well, much more, in fact, than—rather, perhaps, from ignorance than indifference—they have hitherto shown any inclination to do. The unprecedented success of yesterday's meeting may, it is true, be the means of drawing public attention to the matter.—London Times, June 14.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Glory! Hallelujah! Popular refrain, as sung by the Federal Volunteers. 25

A people's tune said to have originated with the Massachusetts Volunteers at Fortress Monroe. The tune has spread more rapidly than even "Dixie," and at this time one can hardly walk on the streets for five minutes without hearing it whistled or hummed. As it is a capital marching tune, our soldiers will carry it with them where they go. There are added to the popular words some verses written expressly for the Fourth Battalion of Rifles (13th Reg.) now at Fort Independence.

Our Banner shall wave forever. Song and Chorus. T. H. Howe. 25

A stirring Song which notwithstanding the great number of patriotic airs coming forth from all quarters, will make its mark.

All hail to the Stars and Stripes, or The dying Volunteer. L. O. Emerson. 25

This poem is founded on one of the most touching incidents of the war, as far as known, an incident which history will make familiar to coming generations. Mr. Emerson has written to it one of his best melodies, and the piece deserves to be popular among patriotic singers.

Our good ship sails to-night, my Love. Emily Berger. 25

An uncommonly pretty song, the words of which have a more than ordinary significance in the present times. This will no doubt contribute to make it popular; but the music itself is sufficiently striking to direct attention to it.

Instrumental Music.

Castles in the Air. Valse brill. R. Fitzgerald. 25

Quite a pleasing, lively waltz, which can be dashed off with considerable eclat, without being at all difficult.

Star Spangled Banner Quickstep. J. W. Turner. 25

Mr. Turner has arranged several of our national melodies, such to which public attention has been particularly attracted by the war for the Union, in the form of easy Quicksteps. Thus arranged they will be most welcome to young players. Besides the above, Quicksteps on the "Red, white and blue" and "The girl I left behind me" are now published by the same author.

La Reveille. Grand March Militaire. Carl Meyer. 40

A very brilliant Concert March, rather difficult. It is quite indicative of the brisk step of the soldiery when marched to the battle-field, full of life and animation. The Trio has fine melodious strains. Altogether amateurs fond of a good show-piece will find much pleasure in the practice of this piece.

Books.

ONE HUNDRED OPERATIC MELODIES FOR THE FLUTE. 50

This new collection of Flute Music will commend itself to the favor of Flutists both from the great variety of its contents and from their intrinsic merits. Fifty cents is certainly a very moderate price for so valuable a repertoire of choice music. Amateurs will find in it all that can be desired in a work of the kind.

Our River.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

(For a Summer Festival at "The Laurels" on the Merrimack.)

Once more on yonder laurelled height
The summer flowers have budded;
Once more with summer's golden light
The vales at home are flooded;
And once more, by the grace of Him
Of every good the Giver,
We sing upon its wooded rim
The praises of our river.

Its pines above, its waves below,
The west wind down it blowing,
As fair as when the young Brissot
Beheld it seaward flowing—
And bore its memory o'er the deep
To soothe a martyr's sadness,
And fresco, in his troubled sleep,
His prison walls with gladness.

We know the world is rich with streams
Renowned in song and story,
Whose music murmurs through our dreams
Of human love and glory:
We know that Arno's banks are fair,
And Rhine has castled shadows,
And, poet-tuned, the Doon and Ayr
Go singing down their meadows.

But while unpictured and unsung
By painter or by poet,
Our river waits the tuneful tongue
And cunning hand to show it,—
We only know the fond skies lean
Above it, warm with blessing,
And the sweet soul of our Undine
Awakes to our caressing.

No fickle Sun-god holds the flocks
That graze its shores in keeping;
No icy kias of Dian mocks
The youth beside it sleeping:
Our Christian river loveth most
The beautiful and human;
The heathen streams of Naiads boast,
But ours of man and woman.

The miner in his cabin hears
The ripple we are hearing;
It whispers soft to homesick ears
Around the settler's clearing:
In Sacramento's vales of corn,
Or Santee's bloom of cotton,
Our river by its valley-born
Was never yet forgotten.

The drum rolls loud—the bugle fills
The summer air with clangor;
The war-storm shakes the solid hills
Beneath its tread of anger;
Young eyes that last year smiled in ours
Now point the rifle's barrel,
And hands then stained with fruits and flowers
Bear redder stains of quarrel.

But blue skies smile, and flowers bloom on,
And rivers still keep flowing,
The dear God still his rain and sun
On good and ill bestowing.
His pine-trees whisper, "Trust and wait!"
His flowers are prophesying

That all we dread of change or fate
His love is underlying.

And thou, O, mountain-born!—no more
We ask the Wise Allotter
Than for the firmness of thy shore,
The calmness of thy water,
The cheerful lights that overlay
Thy rugged slopes with beauty,
To match our spirits to our day,
And make a joy of duty.

LE DOMINO NOIR.

LIGHT READING FOR HOT WEATHER.

Feb. 26.—This was one of the most enjoyable musical evenings during my stay in London. The performance was an opera of which I used to hear the overture with great delight in the Boston Academy Concerts some eighteen years ago—which was all I knew of it. It was—but last as have the short, explicit, title of the text book.

"The Black Domino, a comic opera in three acts, the music by M. Auber, words by M. Scribe, arranged for the English stage by Henry F. Chorley. First produced at the Royal English Operas Covent Garden, under the management of Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison, sole lessees, Wednesday, Feb. 20th February 20th, 1861. Copyright. London, published and sold in the Theatre."

The music is in Auber's best vein, light, sparkling, melodious, deliciously beautiful and as to appropriateness—it is perfect. When that English Opera company is formed, compel it to produce the Black Domino. But what a queer subject for an opera in a Roman Catholic country! Wait a moment, until I have collected my thoughts and I will tell you the story, in a somewhat rickety manner, though.

LE DOMINO NOIR—OR THE BLACK DOMINO.

Once upon a time in Madrid, during the reign of a certain Spanish queen (for whose names, please consult the—authorities, and also for the "once upon a time") Senora Angela, niece of the great Duke Olivares, not having a fortune equal to her birth, was placed in a convent and destined in due time to become its head as Abbess. Not having been in Spain, nor possessing that knowledge of nunneries and convents, which Scribe doubtless had, I am unable to explain, how it was that the lady Angela, could have had the freedom and power of an Abbess for a long time before she took the vows, and irrevocably decided her vocation. Nevertheless so it was—for is it not so written in the chronicle of Mr. Scribe? Now, having this freedom and power, and feeling no doubt a rational desire to know something of the follies and perhaps wickedness of the world that she might in the future be better able to give sweet and pious counsel to tender soul of nun and maiden, on Christmas eve, Anno Domini—for the date consult the authorities again—she clad herself in a black domino and hid her face in a mask and taking Brigitta, her friend and confidant, like wise masked, as her companion, left the convent secretly and calling a hackney coach drove to the ball in the Queen's palace. It was naturally a great occasion—there were present the Joblillies, the Garyulies, the Pickinies, in fact all the Grandees, Hidalgos (sons of somebody, you know), Señors, Señoras and Señoritas, and the Grand Panjandrum himself—with a little round button at top, as Foote said. This latter personage was no less than the great Prince Grumbaff, whose wife was a born Olivares, with royal blood in her veins, and a cousin of the future Lady Abbess, Señora Angela.

A Count Horace Massarena—who was half affianced to the daughter of Count San Lucar—and his friend Don Julian who keeps bachelor's hall in a splendid house, with old Jacinta as housekeeper, and who is a roistering roving blade, fond of deep play—were also at the ball.

They danced and among Count Horace's partners was a lady in a black domino. Once when her mask happened to fall he caught sight of her face, and this in addition to the charms of her conversation, drove the daughter of Count Lucia, (niece of an ambassador) quite from his thoughts, save when he dwelt in honor upon the marriage. He told the unknown all about himself but just as his fancy began to flatter him with the idea that he was becoming an object of interest to the lady, her companion passed suddenly, whispering "twelve o'clock, madame!" "So soon," exclaimed she, and left Count Horace's arm trembling. He followed them to their carriage, a very common one indeed—but they did not drive off at once—reason, they had forgotten their purses—and the Count threw them his, and away they went. A day or two afterwards there came a package to him—a purse not his own, but one embroidered with real pearls, containing his money, and a note saying, "You are Secretary of the Embassy; which I think at the ball I understood you wished to be." This broke that camel's back. The lady was one of high birth, of influence in powerful quarters, and conveniently rich. The Count was Secretary of the Embassy, affianced to one woman and now desperately in love with another, and one unknown to him, a sad complication. (Dear reader, drop a tear.)

The chronicle of Scribe makes no account of the time, which lapsed in minutes, hours, days, weeks, months—each doubtless longer and more tedious than its predecessor, until the year is round again, and the Queen's ball assembles the Joblillies, Garyulies and all once more in her palace, and, lo! the two black Dominos again. But wait a bit.

Prince Grumbaff did not love Count Horace Massarena. He lost two hundred Napoleons at whist to him in half an hour, and moreover the Count was a favorite of the ladies and Princess G. was both young and a beauty. "The women adore him!" said the Prince to Don Julian, "I hate the coxcomb!"

"Punish him then Prince," said the Don; "After the ball, come to supper and cigars in my house, and win your money back. No Christian man or woman thinks of going to bed on Christmas eve."

"Save my wife," returned the prince—and she chose to go to bed instead of coming here."

The Grand Panjandrum had some suspicions of Count Horace, over which Count Julian made merry to his friend as they met in a drawing room at the palace. Count Horace's assurances, that he did not know the feminine Grumboff and had never seen her, together with his admission, that he knew nothing of the name or station of the lady with the domino, did not tend to persuade Don Julian that the Prince's suspicions were unfounded. Leaving the Count to his fancies, Don Julian went to the ball-room. It was then that the two black dominos entered the drawing-room where Count Horace sat upon the sofa, and not seeing him, discussed the great question of meeting there at twelve to return,—for failing in this would be ruin. The trouble was simply this; at a certain hour old Gil Perez, the convent porter, locked the doors and there was no possibility of ingress after that—and if the two Señoras, were once shut out, then—well, the Inquisition—that was all!

What could Count Horace do, thus hearing their private conversation? What but go to sleep, or pretend it, as the two ladies walking up the room became aware of his presence. The lady Angela recognized him at once, and, what is more, felt that she, who tomorrow was to take the vows and be consecrated lady abbess of the convent, returned his love to the full. (Was it not a pathetic situation? Reader, did you ever love?—then drop another tear).

And now what could she do? She looked at him; admired him; drank in love, as it were; and could not be drawn away from "the sleeping beauty" by Brigitta. At last Don Julian came in again, and hearing from Count Horace—who awoke with singular suddenness—that the lady was the unknown, kindly relieved him from the presence of Brigitta by taking her in to dance. And here let me extract a little of the conversation of Count Horace and Señora Angela, as recorded by the chronicler.

Angela. Ah, then you were not asleep?

Horace. I did my best but could not; you were there, my good angel, whose never forgotten face—

Ang. (unmasking). Learn to forget it for my sake, for your own sake, for your bride's sake.

Hor. Bride! no bride for me.

Ang. You are to marry the daughter of the Count of San Lucar. It has been my idea to assure you fortune.

Hor. Fortune! I will not marry except where I love, and I can, will love but one, and that one yourself.

Ang. And can you be sure that I am free to receive your love? I am not.

Hor. Great heaven! are you married?

Ang. Why should I not be?

They were at length interrupted by the appearance of Prince Grumboff, who could swear from the figure—for the lady had donned her mask again, that his wife stood before him, had he not left her laid up with a racking headache. Still he had his suspicions. To gain opportunity to confirm or allay them he invited the unknown to dance. He accepted the invitation promising her hand to the Count for the next set.

When Don Julian met his friend again, the latter poured out his delight at the prospect of dancing once more with the lady of his love and his despair that at midnight, he must part with her forever. Julian was quickwitted—he would aid his friend by sending off Brigitta, and by detaining her companion. He did this by moving the clock forward to four minutes to twelve, which drove Brigitta to her coach almost in despair at leaving her mistress, and after her disappearance by putting it back an hour behind the time.

Prince Grumboff recognized his wife, as he supposed, in the masked lady and in an interview with Julian uttered furious threats against the Count, which Don conveyed to his friend upon his re-appearance after the quadrille with the lady.

And now upon Horace's urgent entreaties for her to fly, it came out that she was not Princess Grumboff at all, and she certainly, would not leave the ball—glancing at the clock—three quarters of an hour before her time.

With dancing and lover's talk time passes rapidly—as the present writer does not know—for he never danced—and the Count's pleadings were interrupted by the striking of the clock. No Brigitta was to be found, and the lover's trick was acknowledged. Oh, the despair of the fair lady Angela! (Tear drop No. 3, comes in here.)

Now you must know, that old Gil Perez had a rather intimate acquaintance with old Jacinta, Don Julian's housekeeper, and used occasionally, after locking up the convent, to go there for a little quiet chat and supper. He was expected on the night of the ball, and the old woman was in a sad taking both because at one o'clock in the morning he had not come, and because her master was although so late, to give a supper to his harum-scarum friends—a circumstance fitted to interfere rather, with any quiet lovemaking in her own apartment.

"Black enough the night is," said Jacinta looking from the window into the deserted street, "Poor dear Gil Perez; suppose he gets lost in the dark. Ay, ay, yonder he is; don't I know his black cloak; scudding here at such a rate, too. I must smuggle him away somewhere though; and get my rakish young master to bed as fast as I can."

Tap, tap, tap, at the door, which Jacinta opened and in came the lady Angela in black domino and mask!

When she learned the deception practised upon her, there was nothing to do but fly from the palace. No coach, no key to the convent, had she known the way, she could but hurry through the streets, hopeless and forlorn. At one time she hid in the dark corner of a doorway to escape the night patrol; at another she was forced to bear the familiarities of a student, who let her escape with a kiss or two; and so at last weary, worn, distracted, seeing Jacinta's light, she came thither to beseech protection. Gold, a ring with real diamonds and her noble air and manner proved to the old woman the respectability of the fugitive, and she took her to her own room and clad her in the peasant dress of her niece who was daily expected from the country. Leaving her in her own room, Jacinta now admitted Gil Perez, whom she bestowed in another chamber, in spite of his protestations against it.

And now came Don Julian with his guests, to whom Jacinta introduced her protégée as her niece. Her beauty surprised, and as they became heated with wine, inflamed the young men, who crowding round her for a kiss, she rushed into the arms of Count Horace for protection. Her assumption of the language and manners of a peasant girl deceived all but him. He penetrated her disguise and, to save her from insult, returned from the supper-room and putting her in Jacinta's apartment locked her in and took the keys with him. The coast being now clear Gil Perez determined to go to his favorite quarters by Jacinta's fireside and having unlocked the door with a key of his own, was appalled by a sepulchral voice from a figure clad in black and masked, which addressed him:

"Vile blasphemer and thief, what would'st thou?"

Poor Gil trembling with fear poured out a torrent of exclamations, but the voice interrupting him at intervals, demanded of him the convent keys of which he "thief, steward, and spy, was not worthy," and he was only too glad to escape by their surrender. Waving him into the room the Lady Angela was upon the point of departing when Jacinta again entered. As the room was unlighted the lady was unobserved and when Jacinta entered her own room, Angela turned the key upon her and fled. There was great fun, as may readily be imagined, when Horace returning, followed unknown to him by Julian, Grumboff, and others—Grumboff by the way no longer jealous having found his wife at home sound asleep in bed—entered the room and led out a woman, who proved to be old Jacinta, and entering again brought out another person, no other than Gil Perez. Count Horace had the worst of the joke. Meantime poor Brigitta was sad enough in the convent—her friend and mistress lost, the hour of consecration approaching, scandal and the Inquisition in the background. She could do nothing but guard Angela's room from the intrusion at break of day of Ursula, the other candidate for the peace of Abbess, under pretence that her lady was ill. That something was wrong Ursula more than suspected—the absence of the porter and the loss of the convent keys proved this. Brigitta however succeeded in persuading her to go with her to the chapel to prepare it for the ceremony, and at this moment happily Angela entered and reached her room unobserved, weary, terrified, torn by the pangs of hopeless love, and by her horror at the vows she has so soon to take.

But the moments were fleeting and soon were heard the bells ringing, the sweet voices of nuns in the chapel, the gathering of crowds to witness the ceremony. The Lady Angela appeared dressed in her official robes and the procession was formed to move into the chapel. At this moment one of the nuns brought word to the abbess that a gentleman would take no denial, but must see her upon business of importance alone. Permission being given, Count Horace was introduced, the lady thickly veiled remaining of course unrecognized. He came to acquaint her that he found it impossible to marry the young lady, niece of Count San Lucar, then living in the convent as a novice, and besought the holy mother to inform the young lady of the fact—one which could hardly break her heart, as she had never seen him. A messenger from court interrupted the conversation by bringing a letter from the Queen informing the Lady Angela that the Duke of Olivares had left her his immense fortune and that as her vocation was not yet irrevocably fixed, she of course could accept and enjoy that fortune. Turning to Count Horace unveiled, he saw his black domino, and the pretty servant girl in the lady abbess! Despair! (Tear No. 4).

Well, how do you suppose these adventures of a night ended! How but by Lady Angela appearing at the altar in bridal instead of an abbess' robes, with Count Massarena as bridegroom, and Ursula in the place which she had so nearly been forced to fill.

How they lived long and happily; how they died and were deposited in marble tombs, and what children succeeded to their possessions and honors—are not all those things to be read in the chronicles of the houses of Olivares and Massarena? Rest their souls in peace, let all good Christians pray!

The plot is absurd enough, but it is full of situations, some of which are irresistibly comic—while the music, as before said, is of the very first order in comic opera.

(TRANSLATED FOR THIS JOURNAL FROM THE "DEUTSCHE MUSIK-ZEITUNG" OF VIENNA.)

Arias from various Cantatas, with Piano-forte accompaniment, arranged by ROBERT FRANK. Four sets (9 Alto, 9 Bass, 9 Soprano, 9 Tenor Arias). Leipzig: F. Whistling; Boston: O. Ditson & Co.

From what we have said of the spiritual and introspective character of Bach's music, it follows that with him the artistic aim and the fixed limit of economy must be less obvious to common apprehension. A concrete historical situation and the corresponding feeling, whether of the single individual or of participating masses, has a much more definite measure in itself, than the ever fluctuating mood, forever floating off into the Infinite, which is begotten of a thought, a heart experience of the immediate and still recurring Present. Hence with Handel those unshakeably determined forms, fast as the rock; while with Bach all is flux and motion:—the truest symbol of his thoughts. For the peculiarity of the objects, to which Bach felt himself drawn by his whole nature, must naturally also have determined his manner of production. The difficult problem, of indicating this in all its special and almost innumerable materials, must be left to a future biography to solve. Suffice it here to remind ourselves, that Bach, as a consequence of what has been stated, must have cultivated with particularity the contrapuntal mode of writing handed down to him, and all the forms connected with it. For that alone could represent and imitate the infinitely rich relations of the inner life with any satisfactory correspondence. That art he has carried, as we all know, to a height never reached again; it may be seen most clearly in his vocal compositions. For here it is indisputably clear, how much more perfectly than any other this Art-form mirrors the wonderful organism of the human soul's life filled with spiritual influence; how it represents the innermost nature of music, out of which it originally sprang with almost mathematical consistency, and at the same time solves its most ideal problem, that of symbolizing the soul's life, in the most natural and most legitimate manner.

Now the reason, why Bach with his way of treating counterpoint has reached the highest point, lies on the one hand in his inexhaustible invention of the most pregnant leading motives—this mystery of the most immediate act of genius; and on the other, in the astonishing plastic energy, with which he handles and develops these. His text clothes itself in a motive, which conceals in itself, in embryo, the entire musical development that follows, and with it too the meaning of the text. Plastic clearness and roundness, elastic many-sidedness, harmonic fullness, and a characterization which never fails to hit, distinguish every one of the Bach motives. The working up and unfolding of these motives is done, as is well known, not so much by artificial dismemberment, dispersion, conjunction, &c., which all rather belongs rather to the domain of rhythm,—but, so to say, by modulatory shading, that is, by harmony, in that the same motive, for the most part through its whole extent, is placed under the manifold lights which sprang as if spontaneously out of the different voices in which it enters, out of the related keys through which it must move, out of the counter-motives which germinate from it and combine with it, out of the inversions, contractions, expansions, and so on. Now so far as mere technical skill is of any avail here, Bach uses it never as such, but always as a means to the highest ends. Else how comes it, that the working out of his movements with the greatest simplicity of outline, with the most faultless symmetry, with the seemingly ever charming regularity and constancy of the fundamental relations, still all the time exceeds the limits of our power of comprehension; that frequently we cannot comprehend the inward necessity and intentional arrangement, the climax and conclusion of a passage, and that still the most instantaneous conviction forces itself upon us, how necessary all is, since in the whole and in each detail the most intimate interpenetration of the word-thought and the music manifests itself? We involuntarily ask, whether certain technical mysteries have not become lost to us, which were perhaps born with Bach and buried with him; or if it is only that we lack the inward depth, simplicity and humility to feel and comprehend all the loftiness of thoughts and combinations which were natural and necessary to the deep soul of the master. The answer is for the most, no doubt, reserved to a future and maturer generation, even if much is to be set down to the account of the taste of the time in which he lived; although we cannot, of course, in the remotest degree assent to the idea of his being altogether "antiquated" or "foreign to our religious consciousness."

A second leading characteristic, which distinguishes Bach's manner of production very clearly from that of Handel, is the Choral. Through it Bach plants himself most distinctly on the ground of German nationality and universal intelligibility. It is far from our purpose to describe even cursorily his position as a reformer towards the Choral; these remarks aim merely to cast a little light upon the most all-important questions in regard to Bach. Hence we content ourselves with showing how he, faithful to his nature, takes this most immediate product of the evangelical communion, this simplest possible lyrical expression of the Protestant Christian soul's life, and by large combinations raises it to the most pregnant universality. For this is undoubtedly his purpose when he either clothes it as a cantus firmus with all sorts of symbolical figured work, or works it up as a theme into fugued movement, or carries every single strophe of it through in canon form. What results he has reached by these means, is shown by a multitude of his Cantatas. For example, the first choral movement of "Aus tiefer Noth schrei ich zu dir" (In deep distress I cry to thee"), is so wonderfully mystical, that one no longer merely hears the sin-struck agony of the Christian congregation, but also feels somewhat of that wrestling and "sighing of the creature," which only the most deep-souled men have shared with the apostle.

The proper focus, therefore, of Bach's creative activity lies in the endeavor to fathom the universal soul's life of humanity in its deepest depths; to seize it in its collective and its individual relation to the living God, as well as to the sinful world—a trait of speculative mysticism, if you will—and to incarnate it in a comprehensive tone-symbolism. No wonder that for such a task he seems peculiarly prepared, before all others: with the most inexhaustible imagination, with the mightiest productive energy, with the most prophetic depth of feeling. Hence if we justly call Handel universal, in so far as he has freely assimilated to himself all the musical elements existing in his time, it may be permitted after what has been said, as an offset to this more quantitative universality, to ascribe to Bach an equally great, intensive, spiritual universality; so that the two men mutually complete one another, and so render all question about the greater or less worth of the one or the other wholly superfluous.

Remarks on the Present State of Music.

Much has happened which is calculated to disturb and distress, in our time, the pure enjoyment and the legitimate progress of art. The waves of political events beat awfully in the minds of men, and into all forms of social and inward life; but still there is wanting in the masses a uniting, elevating, and spiritually exciting idea. Overwhelming circumstances and recollections have called forth on the one side, vehemence of desires, and the habit of impetuously-changing impressions; and, on the other, their opposite conditions—relaxation and a deep want of quietude of mind, and of a cessation of mental struggle. In both relations, materiality—as as the element of more powerful excitations and effects, or as the soft tranquilizer of mind by lulling the senses—has obtained a height of command unknown to art; and the spectacle more than once witnessed before is now repeated—that in such moments, when the tension of the German mind and character of their own peculiar feelings becomes relaxed, and collapse in the masses of the people, a foreign hand, especially the frivolity and fluttering prosaicalness of France, or the enervating sensuality of Italy, assumes the sceptre. Then it is, so far as regards music, at the opera, that the foreign productions gain an easy and sure victory by display and exaggeration. How many wiles are employed to charm the senses in those exhibitions, to distract and intoxicate the mind of the spectator, and to cloud his judgment as to the real matter before him; and how can all the other branches and departments of art remain uninfected by such an influence, when they proceed from the theatre—the highest and most commanding position of the arts.

If, on the one hand, we must confess the degrading direction to materialities of the foreign operas, a direction which in these times derives so much influence from our being accustomed, and, indeed, forced, as it were, by the public and political circumstances of the West, to keep our eyes on that quarter, as to the dial-plate of disturbance in Europe; so, on the other hand, we will recognize the positive advantages we have from them (which have been but too much neglected by our musicians and poets) in the more urgent endeavor to produce dramatic, or, at least, scenic animation and effect from combined personal situations in more common relations, and in the public and ordinary events of life. Only when, through the real poverty, degradation and error of the foreign opera, our musicians shall have recognized this element, and have adopted it with dignity and truth in the German opera, will our art herein also celebrate its inevitable triumph.

Until that period the foreign style will be predominant, will be loved; it will draw after it the artistic requirements of the multitude, and will satisfy them. The inevitable consequences of this dominion are, outward attractions and excitements of the senses, external magnificence with internal poverty, superficial contentment in lieu of soundness and depth, a yielding to unworthiness, and a base condescension of dignity position to a mere parade of effect. Degraded music, a mere matter of amusement, is dragged everywhere; it pursues us into our gardens and at our meals; and, in endeavoring to fill up the void in desolated social intercourse, it alike deafens our ears to all rational converse, and deadens our feelings to the true powers of art. Loss of character and significance pervades all its branches, and is followed by increasing loss of interest. The more we depart from the idea of the whole, from the meaning, from the conception of art and the unity of artistic works, the more decided is the progress of that disorder,—that inward death of art occasioned by considering the means as the principal, and neglecting the end. Thus, those foreign seductive operas have been able to attain their influence over us. We have been blinded by the authority of their origin, and by the fame of their highly-gifted singers; by the extraordinary means employed to produce effect; by the very ridiculousness of some of these incidents, such as a sale by auction a tender, sentimental post-boy, not to mention more recent instances, which, from their utter novelty on the opera boards, are absolutely startling. On the other hand, we are ourselves reproached, and not without some reason, with not being sufficiently attentive to our means, a bad habit of which we trust bitter experience will correct us.

Hence, music assumes to us at present an aspect which is by no means satisfactory.

We have abundance of music, but little pleasure from it. We obtain from it distraction and amusement, where we might derive thought and elevation. Thus it is with our fashionable opera, where its frequenters are swooning with giddiness for a moment, and then are left empty, and in another moment forget it. So in our concerts, whose utmost effort is to display an extraordinary artist, creating astonishment, the most fruitless of all states of the mind. So in our public music, which, without giving our sympathy, destroys our conversation. So it is, in fine, in our social parties, where confined to heartless school exercises, or ill-judged repetitions of fashionable airs, instead of producing the enjoyments of art, it causes more embarrassment, envy and tediousness than we are willing to confess to each other, or even to ourselves.

We willingly avert our eyes from the unpleasant spectacle. It is not, however, here the place nor our object, to pronounce a judgment; but we should certainly wish to call the attention of those to the subject, who feel an interest in art, and in popular education. And, indeed, notwithstanding the corruptions and weaknesses which we have lamented, we must be total strangers to the feelings of our kind, not to acknowledge and honor the most earnest and promising exertions and struggles, the strong adhesion to the works of the elder masters, from Beethoven back to Gluck and Seb. Bach, the most extraordinary, although perhaps technical industry of executants, the zealous competition of youth for scholastic and universal cultivation, so indispensable to artists, all of which has never been so conspicuous as in our times. There is to be observed, however, in all this very praiseworthy labor and exertion, a considerable degree of unconsciousness or indifference as to matter and object, which must be overcome before the proper fruits can be expected; and which presents to our view, occasionally, depth and superficialness, genuine and spurious art, in equal estimation; while the undistinguishing pursuit of good and bad is honored by the name of impartiality, and discrimination is denounced as illiberality.

A widely-spread activity, of great promise if well conducted, prevails in the track and propagation both of the good and of the spurious, but the individualizing, animating idea, the leading consciousness, the highest power of art, have still to be drawn out from their deep recesses.

Many noble-minded and earnestly-thinking people have viewed in this confused whirlpool of struggling powers, the death of that art which has been the bright sunny ray of their lives, in Bach, or Gluck, or Mozart, or Beethoven; but we will hold fast to the conviction that art is a necessity of human nature, and is therefore equally imperishable. On the same ground, we conclude that, in any particular nation, music cannot be destroyed and lost but with the nation itself; although both together may undergo moments of error, delusion, or failure. A well-pondered review of the history of music teaches us this; and an elevated contemplation of what our nation is, and of what music requires and can expect from it upholds, in times of undeniable retrogression, those hearts which beat for something beyond the fleeting moment.—Dr. Marx's General Musical Instruction.

Amina and the Mill-wheel.

When some one asked Byron whether he did not find the acting of Miss Kelly in The Maid and the Magpie deeply true to nature, Child Harold replied: "I don't know. I was never innocent of stealing a silver spoon." But, in spite of the sharp saying, the story of the girl of Palaiseau, falsely accused of theft, and saved by an extraordinary accident, still lives on the European stage, so, in this country, does the memory of the cordial and pathetic actress with whom the drama is associated.

More powerful still to move, more universal to charm, is the story of the peasant girl who saved her good fame by walking in her sleep over the mill-wheel. Some such exploit, no doubt, has been really told and believed somewhere as a thing which once happened; and the tale has spread from one country to another, even as the tale of the traveller who fainted dead on seeing by morning light the broken bridge he had safely ridden over in the dark—what shall we say?—as all real stories do. Let the true origin and locality of the transaction be suggested as a matter of shrewd investigation and amicable quarrel to those who make "Notes" on "Queries," seeing that, now-a-days, the business of criticism is to prove that everything must have been something else. The Marseillaise Hymn, one Herr Hamma assures us, is a barefaced plagiarism by the Dihilin of France, Rouget de Lisle, from the "Credo" of a dry German mass, written for an obscure village town in a corner of the Lake of Constance, with which town on the lake, of course, and with its manuscript mass-music, the Parisian vagabond man of letters could not fail to be as familiar as if Meersburg was Montmartre, or Montmorency!

Be these things as they may, our anecdote of the Sleep-walker was dressed up in the form of ballet, some thirty-five years ago, by M. Scribe. As a French ballet, La Sonnambula had not a long success. The Italians prefer for their ballets incidents which admit of strong and mute action. The French are not thus constructed. There is small space to dance upon in the story of the peasant girl, who, by perilling her neck over the old mill-wheel, cleared herself from her lover's jealous suspicions. But there is room in it for passionate and pathetic gesture; and the incidents are not crowded so closely together as they are in other dramatized ballets, such as the Sylph and the Gipsy, both of which (no offence to the music of Mr. Barnett and of Mr. Balfe)

made had opera books. Thus it fell out that in 1829, or thereabouts, a gentle and graceful young Sicilian composer, Bellini, chose this subject for music. From his first outset in art—unable to compete with Rossini in versatile richness of melody, he conceived the idea of devoting himself to dramas of greater pathos, force, and feeling, than those which had been taken hold of, with a carelessness savoring of arrogance, by his predecessor. Further, Bellini had to write for the greatest actress who had yet trodden the opera stage. For Pasta, when in the prime of her power, was La Sonnambula written. But the noble and gifted woman, whose Norma, Semiramide, Medea, Anne Boleyn, were creations each differing from each in its regal pomp and majesty, could hardly look the part of Amina; and though Pasta acted it, as she did everything she touched, consummately; the delicacy of the music, and the compass of its melodies, were calculated to betray the peculiar defects of her voice, which, never agreeable by nature, was always liable to be out of tune. Amina, then, was one of Pasta's less fortunate impersonations. She placed it on the stage, however; and with it, as with all her other characters, a host of those traditions and suggestions which have been invaluable to all destined to succeed her. The influence of Pasta, to name one instance distinctly to be traced, throughout the long and glorious career of Madame Gristi, has never died out, in spite of the notoriously ephemeral duration of singers' influences.

If Pasta brought La Sonnambula to the Italian stage, Malibran popularized the music and the legend in England. The critics of Pasta's day, who had not even then thoroughly recognized Rossini, being strong in the national and convenient mania of liking as few things in art as possible, would not hear the pleasant freshness and simplicity of Bellini's music; they denounced it as weak and trifling. But how astonishingly were the Italian words "done into English!" Of many similar versions, the book of La Sonnambula is the most absurd perversion. That wonderful explanatory complot which occurs just before the closing scene,

And this sir, you must know, though remarkable it seems,
That sonnambulists they're called, because of walking in their dreams, is only a sample of the entire book. Then, Malibran was badly supported on the English stage. Peace to the memory of her ungainly middle-aged opera-lover, with a poor voice through his nose, whom she drove about the stage like a whirlwind, and whom, by her vehemence of action she absolutely made seem to act! No matter. A pathetic drama, wholly conducted in music and acted with energy, was new to English playgoers; and there were an exuberance of fire and of feeling in Malibran's acting, a daring and a passion in her singing, which, while she was before us, entirely carried off her extravagances. Never has opera-queen, singing English transported her subjects as she did. Here, however, was no Swiss Amina, but a Southern peasant with a brilliancy in her delight, and a rockless abandonment in her hour of distress, that gave the part an intensity of color, and a sharpness of contrast, neither "calm nor classical" which seized us with a resistless fascination. In the chamber scene, where the sleeping girl unconsciously enters with the light, Malibran was not equal to other Aminas, who have held us fast to the situation by their ghostly quietness. Her despair, in the instant of her detection and abandonment by her deceived lover, was terrible. She would not let him leave her; clung to him, pursued him, twined herself round him, and could only be flung loose to endure her agony when the strength of her misery would avail her no more, and she was left and broken (it seemed) for ever. Then the walk over the mill-wheel, which vindicates the heroine's virtue, was protracted by her with almost a cruel relish. She did her best to terrify her faithless lover into the keenest spasm of fear and remorse; as though sleep had brought with it the counsel of heartily punishing him for his suspicions. All this was to lead to that burst of ecstasy with which she flung herself into his arms in the "frantic certainty of waking bliss." The final rondo (one of the happiest expressions of joy ever poured forth in music) was not so much sung by Malibran, though in it she heaped vocal change on change, triumph on triumph as thrown out in the irresistible abundance of a new buoyant delight and relief. London was never tired of Malibran's Amina; nor even when she had grasped "the town" by another remarkable personation totally different, that of the devoted Prisoner's Wife in Beethoven's Fidelio, could the one success efface the other. There must have been something true and permanent in the peasant story and the despised Italian music after all.

The next Amina on the long list who is worth remembering, for qualities entirely different from those of the gifted and fervid Spanish woman of genius—was Persiani; Grisi having, in the interval, attempted the opera and laid it aside. She was never beautiful she can have never looked young, she in no respect showed herself a great actress: as a singer, she had been born with an ungracious though ready voice (a "bitter" voice, Mendelssohn called it), a voice always more or less false; nevertheless, considering the part musically, Persiani was the best Amina among all the Aminas who have been heard here. This, not only because she was accomplished to the power of working every phrase and note of the music to its remotest corner, leaving nothing for the apprehension to desire in point of skill, not only because her command over the graces and resources of ornament was limitless, but from a certain conception of the sentiment of the situations in the story, which stood her in stead of apparent freshness or originality, whether studied or instinctive. Great singers among her comrades, tired, and in their great-coats, ready to go home or to go out to supper, might be seen waiting in "the wing" till she had sung the final rondo. Persiani's version of that air lives among the most complete of musical satisfactions recollected. Its fascination was strong enough to enthral even such opera-goers (their name is Legion) as care only for a pretty voice or a pretty woman. The conquest told much to "the score" of Persiani, something, not less real, to the story on which was built the score of Bellini.

Next came an English Amina, not merely an Amina in English, competent in right of natural dramatic genius, powers acquired for its expression, to compete with any of the Italian singers at any time, the last of the great Kemble race. Here again, however as in Pasta's case, Nature had set her face against the Maid on the Mill-wheel. Form and features were opposed to the attempt. There was a certain heaviness in the quality of Miss Kemble's voice which has nothing to do with dramatic versatility. Those laugh the best on the stage who can cry the best. Pasta's smile was as glorious and natural as her sorrow was subduing, as her wrath was appalling; but the smile was on the noble and serious features of the Muse of Tragedy; and the many are apt to read such smiles as mere grimaces. Miss Kemble's Amina, admirable in many respects, was the least admirable among the few parts played by her during her bright and brief career on the English opera stage.

Writers of musical history will find a wondrous theme in the story of the next Amina, the Swedish lady, who, on our Italian stage, made play-going London, whether grave or gay, madder than London has been made mad since the opera-days when (as Byron said in his stinging lines) crowds jammed into the pit, country ladies fainted and were carried out, and dandies were civilly rude to the same provincial females, in the eagerness of their worship of (sic in Byron) "Catalini's pantaloons." How the Lind-fever was begotten, how nourished, on what basis the excitement rested, are so many facts of no importance to this sketch. That it lured scrupulous divines out of their churches, that it threatened, for a nine month's wonder, the whole rival dynasty of opera with revolution, shame, and overthrow, are truths which have nothing to do with the real musical genius of an artist, even of genius as singular, as successful as she was. Without doubt, Mlle. Jenny Lind, with her large and speaking eyes and her clustering fair hair, will be remembered as the type of the Swiss peasant-girl, real and rustic, in all her simplicity and sincerity. Her northern voice, too, was admirably suited to Bellini's music; the power which she possessed of drawing out its tones to any required strength and softness, made her more fit to present what may be called the ventriloquism of the sleep-walking scenes than any one before her or since. She could act further, just to the point of sorrow and gentle woe which the situations of the tale demand. She could take, moreover (this was less fair), what was not her own, in the fullness of her determination to "have and to hold" her audience. In the chamber scene of her detection, by way of showing the splendor of her upper notes, she quietly appropriated the music of her lover's part, choosing to dominate in the moment of her disgrace and suspense, rather than to be struck down by them. This usurpation passed undiscovered. It was in some measure redeemed by the extreme and touching beauty of her second sleep-walking scene; just ere Amina awakens. Nothing more carefully devised than this, nothing in the art which conceals art is seconded by congenial Nature, could be conceived. The soft, sad, slow notes seemed to flow from lips as totally unconscious as were the fingers which let slip the flowers, that poor battered treasured token-nose-gay, last forlorn relic of Amina's betrothal (her token ring having been reft from her). There was a wondrous fascination in that musical scene, not wholly belonging to the singer, nor to her looks, nor to her voice, but in part, too, to the story and to the music. In the last joyous outbreak which follows this dream Mlle. Jenny Lind was inferior as a singer to Persiani, and as an actress-and-singer-in-one to Malibran.

Next came Malibran's younger sister, one of the greatest artists of any time, happily still living to show the world how Genius can be lord of all, when the expression of a dramatist's thought, or the representation of a musician's ideas, are in question. Her Amina was remarkable, not for its musical treatment (because consummate art is, in music synonymous with the name of Viardot), not for her voice, not for her pleasant demeanor (infinitely simpler and less feverish than her sister's) but because of the wondrous deadness of the sleep thrown by her into the scenes of the girl who had to walk over the mill-wheel to clear herself. Without Lind's long respiration, without rare beauty of tone—with something by nature quick and impulsive in her Southern Composition—Viardot worked out another corner (till then unexplored) of Bellini's opera.

There may be twenty (for aught the Sybils know) new renderings of the hopes and fears of the Singing Sleep-walkers to come. Ere we name the last and youngest, it should be told that Sontag, too, after breaking her twenty years' silence, was tempted by the tale and the music on her return to the stage; too late, as it proved, though her excellent tact always bore her above failure—that the genial Albani was fascinated into forgetting every disqualification of voice and figure, in the hope of making so favorite a part her prize. A vain fancy! Not even her beautiful, full, languid contralto tones, and her faultless execution, could carry the enterprise through. It was more curious than exciting to see with what solid and demur carefulness she braved the ordeal of the perilous walk above the wheel, holding steadily on to the protecting rail of wire which no eyes are expected to recognise, and relieved apparently when the terra firma of the stage was once more under her feet. Amina was no more possible for her to conquer than the Sylph who distracted her lover by her aerial exits up the chimney, or her gambols from flower to flower, would have been. What spell is there that will defend singing women and playing men against the disappointment of such mistakes? When will the Listons cease from wearying to be Orlandos and Romeos?

And now—at this time present, though it might have been fancied that all the changes conceivable and have been rung on on Bellini's present opera—when half a dozen musical dramas, fifteen years more recent, prodigious and terrifying, have become stale, past the power of the most wondrous genius to revive them—has come the youngest Amina of all, though assuredly not the most gifted—and at once, and without a single note of prelude or preliminary trumpet, has stirred up the tired town to an enthusiasm recalling the days when Malibran tottered across the stage in haste and frantic grief, and when Lind (with an Ophelia touch in the thought) breathed out her whole soul of sadness over the flowers, as leaf by leaf, they mournfully dropped on the stage. Born in Madrid, Italian by parentage, trained exclusively in America, Mademoiselle Adeline Patti, on her first evening's appearance at our Italian Opera—nay, in her first song—possessed herself of her audience with a sudden victory which has scarcely a parallel, the circumstances considered. Old and young are now treating as conspiracy and treason any looking-back to past Aminas—any comparisons. This new singer, in her early girlhood, is (for them) already a perfect artist—one who is to set Europe on fire during the many years to which it may be hoped her career will extend. Nor is their delight altogether baseless. Mademoiselle Patti's voice has been carefully and completely trained. Those who fail to find it as fresh in tone as a voice aged nineteen should be, must be struck by its compass, by the certainty in its delivery, by some quality in it (not to be reasoned out or defined) which has of the artist than the automaton. She has a rare amount of brilliancy and flexibility. She has some "notions" (as the Americans have it) of ornament and fancy which are her own, if they be not unimpeachable, say the Dryasdants, in point of taste. If not beautiful, she is pleasing to see; if not at a Pasta, a Malibran, or a Lind in action, she is possessed with her story. There is nothing to displease, if not much to move, in her version of the sorrow so mysteriously caused—of the joy which poetical justice has laid out so incomparably for a felicity-rondo to close a sentimental opera. For the moment, the newest Amina has the ear of London; in the future, Mademoiselle Patti may become worthy of having her name written in the Golden Book of great singers. Meanwhile, what a tale is here told, not merely of her great and welcome promise, not merely of her possessing that talent for success—charm—which is born into few persons, and which cannot be bought or taught, but of the lasting truth and attraction of the music to which Bellini set the story of the innocent girl who walked across the mill-wheel in her sleep! The moral should not be lost on composers of music to come, nor on those who dream of stories for stage-musicians to compose.—All the Year Round.

Editorial Correspondence.

No. XVII.

LONDON, July 11.

Did I say six hundred people listened to CHARLES HALLÉ'S "Beethoven's Recitals?" That was a far too timid estimate; those who know best tell me that there were at least a thousand. Very close, attentive listeners they were, with few exceptions; many with book in hand, as I have said; mother and daughter perhaps looking over the same copy of the score, husband and wife, or pair of friends, or lovers—is their love as deep, we wonder, as the language which now vibrates through them? Have they in them that which answers to the tone-poet's wonderful, most human, most heartfelt confessions? If so, they will know few better hours than that in which they followed, with Hallé for interpreter, that tenderly impassioned Sonata, op. 81, whose three moments bear the titles: "Les Adieux," "l'Absence," and "le Retour;" or to the next in order, op. 90, in E minor, with which (according to Schindler) there also goes a story, that it was written for the Count Lichnowski, when in love and hesitating, and that the first movement (Vivace e sempre con espressione) was to have been called "Contest between head and heart," and the second and last (Allergretto, E major) "Conversation with the Beloved." Lonely indeed is that last movement—tranquil and deep and full of bliss as Mozart. Two more perfect love poems, true to the heart's experience forever, do not exist even in music; and it will always be among the worthiest ambitions of first-class pianists, such as Hallé, to perform them worthily, as it is with colors of true genius to keep fresh the inexhaustible significance of Shakespeare.

These two Sonatas formed the first part of Hallé's seventh recital. Their treatment under his hands was masterly and delicate. If one could have wished a little more nervous fire in the first one,—more of the restless and impatient Beethoven temperament—the second was all that could be desired; it seemed not only tastefully and finely, but also sympathetically played; most clearly, delicately outlined, warmly, rich colored, softly, exquisitely shaded. And yet the admirable pianist has not once impressed me as having the live spark of genius in him. I could name a player or two, who give me that, while they could never trust themselves to do what he does. The two Sonatas were separated by that beautiful song of Schubert's: "Du bist die Ruh" (Thou art the rest), sung in French, under the title of "L'Attente," by M. Tennant, who has a delicate and expressive tenor. They song afforded just the right relief, harmonizing well with the mood of the Sonatas; but it would have been better not in French.

The second part contained two great ones—two of the so long dreaded Sonatas of Beethoven's "last period," about which there has been so much mystification, until some of the more genial and earnest of our new school pianists (Prestiligitateurs), have turned their attention from the ground and lofty tumbling feats of senseless show fantasias, to these real poems, long locked up in difficulty, and have mastered them and made them clear to every listener with brains of music in his soul. The first, op. 101, in A major, which also has its love story, and dates from about the same time with the Lieder-kreis, I had heard admirably played by Clara Schumann. I am not sure Hallé did not play it even better at least so far as the masculine and moody vigor of the second movement (Vivace alla marcia), and the wild impetuosity, self-constrained into a fugato form, of the brilliant finale allegro, are concerned. Passing a rather common place "Evening Song" by Blumenthal, what shall we say of the famous Grand Sonata (sometimes called "Double Sonata," because on account of its length it is sometimes published as two), in B flat major, op. 106? It is indeed a "Titanic" work; and of all things ever written for the instrument it offers perhaps the severest test of all the faculties, technical and genial, of the executive pianist. We have all read, and so too some of the best authorities have told me here—Mr. Benedict, for instance—that no one hitherto has achieved this task so triumphantly as Miss Arabella Goddard. Unfortunately I have not heard her. Of the composition, as such, it would be too much to try to give any account here; but in the performance Mr. Hallé certainly astonished and delighted everybody. It was his crowning feat. If he did not bring out all that possibly could be brought out from a work so crowded with ideas and inspirations, he at least made it all so clear, so consistent, so beautiful and grand and happily varied, so fascinating from first to last that the charm seemed as short as it was perfect. One wondered when he found the great hill of difficulty actually behind him, lying there so soft and picturesque on the horizon. It certainly required a masterly rendering to make that very long, sombre deeply brooding Adagio sostenuto (in F sharp minor) interesting to the end, to nearly all the audience, as he did; or to thrice the mazes of that wondrous fugue, "a tre voce, senza alcune licenzie," of the finale, with such unerring vividness of outline.

The last "Recital" was on Friday, July 5th, when Mr. Hallé fulfilled his arduous design to the last letter, by masterly readings of the last three Sonatas. First, that in E major, op. 109, with its fitful alternation of Vivace and Adagio espressivo fragments in the first movement, its prestissimo in the minor of the key, and finally its Andante molto Cantabile (never had the deaf giant been so profoundly, sweetly melodious, so apt to melt into the pure cantabile, as in these last days), which has been "justly called" "one of the most genial and exquisite of those original melodies which he has treated in the variation form." Then, — after a pause filled by the Adelaida, finely sang by Sig. Gardoni — the Sonata, op. 110, in A flat major, also abounding in fitful alternations of tempo, fugued passages, subtle and suggestive variations, singular rhythmical divisions, warm, throbbing melody, and all the characteristics of his last period, while the logical consistency and unity of origin and purpose are never once lost sight of. Finally—after Gardoni had sung Auf Flügeln des Gesanges, in Italian—the last of all the Sonatas, the great one in C minor, op. 111, ending with another wonderful Adagio cantabile, after an Allegro whose fiery, restless mood seems to revert to that of the C minor symphony, and the Sonata Pathétique, also in the same key. Wonderfully crisp and clear, but perhaps too rapidly did Hallé take the bold continuous Allegro con brio, which sets out in unison. The Adagio was beautifully done. And everybody involuntarily lingered, as if unwilling to believe that these rare feasts of music were indeed all over. But to every one who listened truly, it still lives! If ever concert-giver could congratulate himself on a good work done, and with complete success, that pleasure must be Mr. Hallé's.

To look at him, you would not think him such an artist. There is something almost methodical in his serious, homely, long face, and the straight sandy hair well smoothed over the shining head. But there is a beautiful clearness in his look, as of a stream never sluggish, and a quiet self-possession in his manner, which denotes artistic fidelity and character. — Such a concert was riches upon riches, following, as it did for me, the unexpected revival (on the day before, the 4th) of a rare experience of brighter days, which was no less than hearing the LIND sing again — and with nothing of the old charm, on her part, wanting! Of this I have yet to tell; as well as of many interesting concerts heard in these last weeks; and admirably performed operas, besides, including (after all) the "William Tell," and Don Giovanni, with the wonderful debut of "little PATTI" as Zerlina. Meanwhile, just to show the wealth of London — alas! that it takes so much of the meaner kind of wealth to go to operas and concerts here; yet thousands do contrive to pay their guinea every night — look at this list of really distinguished singers, every one of whom has been here and could be heard here during the last few weeks:

Soprani.

Mme. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, (only once).
"Giulia Grisi, (still taking farewells!).
Mlle. Tietjens.
Mme. Penco.
"Gassier.
Mlle. Adelina Patti.
"Czillag.
Miss Anne Banks.
Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington.
"Rüdersdorf.
"Miolan-Carvalho.
Mrs. Sunderland.
Mlle. Anna Whitty.

Contralti.

Mme. Alboni (gone to Paris).
"Nantier-Didiée.
"Lemaire.
"Sainton-Dolby.
Miss Adelaide Phillips (has not sung).
"Freeman.
Mlle. Parepa.

Tenors.

Sig. Mario (still in his prime).
"Giuglini.
"Gardoni.
"Tamberlik.
M. Belart.
Mr. Sims Reeves.
"Inkersall.
"Tennant.

Baritones.

M. Faure.
"Gassier.
Sig. Belletti.
"Delle Sedie.
"Guglielmi.
"Garcia.
"Ronconi (as Masetto!).
Mr. Santley.
"Montem Smith.

Bassi.

Herr Carl Formes.
"Zelger.
Mr. Weiss.

And more, whose names escape me; while one or two of these, perhaps, I have not rightly classed, not having heard them all. Of what I have heard I hope to recall enough to lend interest to another letter. D.

Musical Chit-Chat.

There are some of the most widely-known compositions for the Pianoforte which their real authors never get the credit for. To be sure they are but of trifling value; but why not let them be known by their proper names? There is for instance, a charming little Waltz of C. G. Reissiger's which people persist in calling "Von Weber's last Waltz" or, in elegant French phrase, "Le dernier pensée musicale de Weber." All that Weber ever had to do with it, was that Reissiger once played it to him; Weber liked the strain and improvised a few lines of text to fit the music. After that the subject passed probably immediately from his memory. But a French publisher heard of this anecdote and on the strength of it issued Reissiger's Waltz as Weber's last musical idea. Another widely-known little Waltz, called the Sehnsuchts or Desire Waltz is commonly attributed to Beethoven, when in fact it was composed by Franz Schubert and published with about a dozen others, all without any particular names attached to them, by this composer in the earliest part of his career. The Viennese must have liked it better than the others, because Czerny singled it out as a theme to set variations to and published it as his twelfth work under the title of "Variations on the favorite Vienna Trauer-Walzer." These variations, which are very well made had a large sale and helped much to establish a reputation for its author. Another case is the song called "Adieu" or "Last greeting," passing throughout the musical world as one of Schubert's best songs. It was really written by an amateur in Vienna, Weihrauch by name, and after the young ladies there had pronounced it very beautiful, it was issued by an enterprising firm under Schubert's name. B.

FRANZ LISZT has been in Paris. Very few have heard him play. He played at the Tuilleries, at Count Walewski's, Mme. Erard's, Halévy's and Charles Gounod's. At the Tuilleries the Empress asked for Chopin's Funeral March, the favorite piece of her deceased sister, the Duchess of Alba. Liszt acceded to the request, when her Majesty's tears came thick and fast and she left the apartment overcome by emotion. At table the Emperor observed incidentally: "It seems to me sometime that I have lived a hundred years." Whereupon Liszt quickly rejoined, "That does not astonish me, because—vous êtes le siècle." The Emperor forthwith decorated the smart Pianist with the Cross of the Legion of Honor. Rossini is reported to have said: "Liszt dit toujours qu'il ne joue plus, moi je trouve qu'il joue trop. However as everything of this kind is attributed to Rossini, the authorship of the "bonmot" is doubtful. SIGNALE.

The Utica Telegraph contains the following notice of the late O. J. Shaw, who was well known here as a teacher and composer of popular music.

The intelligence of the death of Prof. Oliver J.

Shaw will fall sadly on the ears of his large circle of friends in this city. He came here from Albany, some ten years since. In that time he had acquired an acquaintance and friendship with our best citizens which was justly a source of heartfelt gratulation to himself and to them. While his presence was always welcomed by the mature in age, it was a source of unceasing delight to children. Probably no man living knew better, or practised more gracefully, the little winning arts that so captivate the young. To see him surrounded by a bevy of his fair young proteges, as was often our privilege, one could not but admire the rare adaptability of his nature; in ordinary society, the courteous, well-bred gentleman, but among his much-loved children, the perfect child himself.

His musical compositions, published, numbering several hundred, were universally successful. But, with all his varied talents, we shall chiefly miss him as the warm, earnest friend—the cheerful companion. Many a little face will look wistfully for his coming, as the season for the summer recreation draws near; and many a little form that moved so blithely to the music from his hands of a winter evening, grow sad with waiting for him to come.

His death was truly in keeping with his life. Like a little child, he went home to his mother to die! After "life's fitful fever," let us hope "he sleeps well."

MOZART AND THE ORCHESTRA.—Mozart, being once on a visit at Marseilles, went to the opera incognito, to hear the performance of his "Villanella Kapita." He had reason to be tolerably well satisfied, till, in the midst of the principal aria, the orchestra, through some error in the copying of the score, sounded a D natural where the composer had written D sharp. This substitution did not injure the harmony, but gave a commonplace character to the phrase, and obscured the sentiment of the composer. Mozart no sooner heard it than he started up vehemently, and, from the middle of the pit, cried out in a voice of thunder, "Will you play D sharp, you wretches?" The sensation produced in the theatre may be imagined. The actors were astonished, the lady who was singing stopped short, the orchestra followed her example, and the audience, with loud exclamations, demanded the expulsion of the offender. He was accordingly seized, and required to name himself. He did so, and at the name of Mozart the clamor suddenly subsided into a silence of respectful awe, and which was soon succeeded by reiterated shouts of applause from all sides. It was insisted that the opera should be recommenced. Mozart was installed in the orchestra, and directed the whole performance. This time the D sharp was played in its proper place, and the musicians themselves were surprised at the effect produced. After the opera Mozart was conducted in triumph to his hotel.

Don Giovanni in London.

GRISI, PATTI, TAMBERLIK, RONCONI, FORMES, FAURE, TAGLIAFICO, &c., IN THE CAST.

The London Times, of July 5th, contains the following interesting account of one of Mme. Grisi's farewell performances at the Royal Italian opera:

"The curtain has descended upon the fourth act, to rise again, by the way, and fall again this evening, when Donna Anna's recital of her wrongs will be heard for the last time from the lips of Madame Grisi; when, for the last time, in passionate accents, she will mourn over the dead body of the murdered Commandant; for the last time reproach the inert Don Ottavio, who talks so much and does so little; for the last time confront the unprincipled Giovanni (of whom Hoffmann insists that Donna Anna is secretly enamored) with the glance of that penetrating eye, the uplifted menace of that sculptured arm, the swelling disdain of that once magnificent though youthful, still magnificent though matured and maternally form. Perhaps there is no character in which the admirers of high-class lyric drama will remember Grisi with more pleasurable emotions than Donna Anna. No one ever looked the part so nobly; no one ever acted it so forcibly; no one ever exhibited such passionate vehemence, amid a classic severity of pose (posture will not do) in the scene after the murder, and in the reproachful duet with Ottavio, "Fuggi, crudele, fuggi!" What if she transposes, and has for many years been in the habit of transposing, the grand air, "Or sai che L'indigno?" does she not throw her whole soul into it all the same?—is not the recitative, in which she narrates to her vacillating lover (who draws the sword at his next interview with Don Giovanni, to sheathe it again unstained) the outrage that had been put upon her, unparalleled in its impetuous and agitated eloquence? and is not the exclamation, "O Dei! O Dei! quegli e il carnefice del padre mio," enough to rouse Hamlet from his lethargy, and precipitate him from reverie to action, from soliloquy to revenge? What, too if she holds on the high notes of the trio in masks,

"Proteggia. Il giusto cielo.
Lo zelo del mio cor;"— longer than was Mozart's intention? Are they not still grand notes? does not the innovation spring from an earnest desire to please, and a fixed resolution to "bring down" the house with applause (witness its result in the "encore" of Saturday night)? Lastly, what if she almost invariably omits the air, "Non mi dir?" is it not because, with her fine conception of scenic propriety, she cannot abide singing in the absence of Ottavio, to whom, like the recitative that precedes it, the air is directly addressed, in answer to his unreflecting importunity, and who, for all that, however charming the Donna Anna—imagining, we presume, that by singing "Il mio tesoro" twice, he has fairly earned his honorarium, and may leave his mistress to her solitary woes for the remainder of the opera—never, by any chance, comes to hear it? Whatever, indeed, may be criticized in Grisi's Donna Anna—and there is not much open to criticism even at this last stage of her career—is redeemed by so many beauties that the impression left is one of having witnessed a performance no less faultless than striking. On Saturday night she was more than grand. She seemed to have summoned up all her energies to present such a delineation of one of the finest characters in the operatic drama as, after her retirement, might in vain be looked for. Not to tire by recapitulation, we may notice a passage in her performance which has never been sufficiently dwelt on. This occurs in the quartet:

"Non ti fidar, o misera!
Di quel ribaldo cor!"—

where the abandoned Elvira denounces Giovanni to Anna and Ottavio. The suspicion evidently engendered in the bosom of Anna at the first sight of Giovanni, whose features during the progress of the quartet she is perpetually scanning, while his words seem to fall listlessly on her; the gradual and steady growth of suspicion into certainty, until as the libertine slowly takes his departure, she watches his receding form with ever-increasing interest, dogging his steps, as though impelled by fate to worm out some secret of which he alone is the possessor; and lastly, the look and gesture of despair, when, the whole truth flashing across her mind, she utters the exclamation, "Don Ottavio—son morta!" form part and parcel of a scene which, both in idea and performance, may be compared with the very highest exhibitions of dramatic art.

The occasion was rendered further interesting by a new Zerlina, and such a Zerlina as, all things considered, the stage has not witnessed for many years. So far, indeed, as the mere impersonation goes, we are inclined to think that only they who are old enough to have seen Malibran in the part can remember anything to match it. We may as well premise that the music has been rendered with greater finish by experienced singers—Persiani, Alboni, and Bosio, for instance—but never with more eminently musical expression. The audience were taken at once by the youthful and prepossessing appearance of Mlle. Patti, and by the vivacity of her "Gioviette che fate l'amore." With "La ci darem" they were thoroughly charmed. The hesitation conveyed in the solo of Zerlina, "Vorrei e non vorrei" (I would and I would not); the archness she threw into the line, "Ma puo burlarmi ancor" (But still he may be joking with me); and the passing thought, while still her mind is not entirely made up, bestowed on poor Masetto, "Mi fa pietà Masetto," were one and all perfect. The encore that followed was unanimous. Still more striking, however, was "Batti, batti," a little drama in itself. Besides being exquisitely sung, the by-play by which Mademoiselle Patti accompanied this was inimitable. When she says, "Batti, batti, O bel Masetto," it is with an evident conviction that, were Masetto a thousand times as jealous, he would not (could not) do it on any account. When she adds she will stand like a lamb to await his blows;

"Staro qui come agnellino Le tue botte ad aspettar," and simply take his hands in hers, to kiss them, in return, the consciousness that she had gained her point and softened her sullen avain, while at the same time playfully taunting him with having no heart, ("Ah! lo vedo, non hai cor.") is conveyed with indescribable piquancy. Receding a few steps away from Masetto, as if the better to satisfy herself of her victory, and then, seeing the complete metamorphosis her endearments have achieved, running back to embrace him, like a wayward child—with the words, "Pace, pace, o vita mia!"—the whole picture is filled up, the sentiment of the duet expressed to the life, and just as complete a conquest made of the audience as of the Masetto. In the ball scene the astonishment of the peasant girl at the grandeur that surrounds her, the restraint with which she listens to the insinuating advances of Don Giovanni, her awkwardness in the dance, and many other happy and delicate touches, show that—like her incomparable Masetto, Signor Ronconi—she never for an instant loses sight of the character she is sustaining. The "Vedrai carino" was less spontaneous, less finished, too, in its vocal phrasing, and somewhat damaged at the end by a trivial ornament, which altered the text of Mozart while very far from improving it. The acting, however, in this, as in "Batti batti," was irreproachable; and, like "Batti batti," it was encored, though hardly with the same unanimity. But, every short coming allowed for Mademoiselle Patti's Zerlina was a genuine artistic triumph, and made an unmistakable impression upon the most crowded house of the season.

Of M. Faure's very admirable impersonation of Don Giovanni; Madame Czillag's intelligent and thoroughly well studied Elvira; the Don Ottavio of Signor Tamberlik, who obtained a tremendous encore in "Il mio tesoro," and, what is more, deserved it; the Leporello of Herr Fornes, who presents us with the accepted German reading of the part; M. Tagliafico's Commandant, the most sonorous and imposing on record; and the Masetto of Signor Ronconi, who, by pure force of genius, raises what has been treated as an insignificant part of the dignity of a great one, we have spoken in a former notice. It is only required to add that the orchestra and chorus, under Mr. Costa, were entirely "up to the mark," and that the performance generally was one of the finest ever heard—even at the Royal Italian Opera.

EXHIBITION OF 1862.—You are doubtless aware that Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1862 at South Kensington addressed letters to MM. Auber, Meyerbeer, and Rossini with a view to obtain three new musical compositions which should represent France, Germany, and Italy, and be associated with a fourth composition standing for England, the representative of which is not yet known.

The commissioners make no demand for the copyright, but merely request the right of performing these compositions on the opening of the Exhibition in a manner befitting the occasion.

With regard to the class of composition required, these are the four pieces proposed:

1. An anthem about equal in extension to the Coronation Anthem of Handel.
2. A chorale without instrumental accompaniment.
3. A triumphal march.
4. March for wind instruments.

I believe I am right in stating that the triumphal march was the piece for which Rossini was solicited. The maestro has declined the honor in the following letter addressed to the secretary of the commission:

"I regret I cannot accept the honor which Her Majesty's Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1862 are good enough to do me.

"Were I still a member of the musical world I should make it a duty and pleasure to prove on this occasion that I am not forgetful of the noble hospitality of England.

"Permit me to hope, sir, that you will kindly receive, and transmit with all my regrets to your colleagues, the expression of my high consideration.

"G. ROSSINI."

Amsterdam.

A new Symphony, with chorus, entitled The Emperor Charles V., is now creating some sensation in musical circles in this country, and, consequently, an account of it may be interesting to your readers. It was first performed at a concert given some little time since, in Amsterdam, by the local section of the Society for the Promotion of Musical Art. The programme on the occasion consisted of the above-mentioned symphony, followed by Spohr's oratorio, Der Fall Babylons, neither of which works had ever previously been performed. The composer of the symphony is Herr W. F. Thooft. It was written in consequence of a prize being offered, by the Society for the Promotion of Musical Art, for a work in which the vocal portion should be symphonically combined with the instrumental. One of the conditions imposed on all competitors for the prize was, therefore, that there should be no separate instrumental portions, as in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony or Mendelssohn's Lobgesang; but that the vocal and instrumental music should, in every instance, go hand in hand. Of course, under such circumstances, an especial book was necessary. Dr. Heye wrote a libretto, entitled Immortality, but only one person set it to music, and his composition was far below the requisite standard of excellence, so that the prize was not awarded at all. In 1857, another libretto was selected. It was entitled The Emperor Charles V., the author being Dr. Wap. Two competitors set it to music, and one of these, W. F. Thooff, carried off the prize of 200 florins.

Although the libretto is, in many instances, admirably adapted for treatment as a symphony, the composer's task was no easy one; since, as a rule, the poem is worked out dramatically, and the music had, therefore, to be as dramatic as possible, and yet to partake of the nature of the symphony. The principal incident is the coronation of the Emperor Charles V., at Bologna, which was as remarkable from the circumstances under which it took place as from the mighty hero who was crowned. After having brought to a fortunate termination two wars, one against France and the other against Turkey, and having reduced Mexico and Peru to subjection to Spanish rule, Charles received at Bologna the Iron Crown, as King of Italy, and, two days subsequently, the Golden Imperial Crown, from the hands of Pope Clement VII. himself. Charles, at this period, was Emperor of Germany, King of Italy and Spain, Lord of the United Netherlands, and a large portion of America, and exercised a sway which, although of short duration, is perfectly unique in the history of modern times. In the first three parts, Charles is celebrated as Sovereign, Warrior and Protector of the Church as well as the Arts and Sciences. The first part consists of two choruses, namely, a chorus of Maltese knights, and a chorus of Dutch, German, and Italian women. The two choruses alternate with each other, and at last combine at the conclusion of this section of the work. The form is kept in strict conformity to the rules of the symphony.

The first principal motive is given to the male, and the second to the female, chorus. The two choruses combine in the coda. The orchestra plays a perfectly independent part of its own, and, both in the treatment and carrying out of the principal motive, takes the initiative. By this arrangement, the relation of the chorus to the orchestra is partially a completely novel one, though it does not in the least detract from the due effect of the chorus. Care must, however, be taken that the latter be not too weak. The second part consists of a chorus of Priests, who render their homage to Charles as the defender of the Church.

The orchestral introduction is shorter than that in the first part. The instrumentation is remarkable from the fact of the violin parts standing altogether by themselves, and, as far as the chorus and wind instruments are concerned, being treated as a solo. The effect is very good, although such a system should be employed very sparingly. The third part was the most difficult for the musicians. The author of the words presents us with two contrasting elements: Charles as a Warrior, and Charles as a Prince of Peace, the patron of the Arts and Sciences. A fine occasion is thus offered the composer for the symphonic form. The text, however, is very dry and—which is a great fault—too didactic; but the composer has overcome the difficulty, and made the most of the orchestra. The latter portrays, in the introduction, the two opposite elements mentioned above. Then comes a bass (solo)—a so-called "speaking part"—which the orchestra illustrates, freely using for the purpose the motives contained in the introduction. The second element, "The Prince of Peace," is represented first by a solo soprano, and afterwards by a quartette, the orchestra acting so to speak, as accompanist. In the fourth and last part, the libretto takes a strange turn. Nothing more is heard of the hero of the poem. Casting a prophetic glance into the Future, the author summons up the Genius of History, who announces the transient nature of all human greatness. Thereupon, we hear, in the final chorus, various nations of the earth, who, while rejecting outward unity gained by means of a single monarchy, embracing the whole globe, declare themselves to be children of one and the same eternal God, and exhort each other to inward unity, resulting from brotherly love. This part of the work is not composed in the form of a symphony, nor does the orchestra assert, to so great a degree as in the previous parts, its independent character. After a short choral-like prelude by the orchestra, we have the soprano solo (the Genius of History) with a recitative or arioso, followed by the final chorus (the Nations or "Peoples"), the ordinary form of a choral finale, namely, Andante maestoso, Allegro molto and Fugato, being adopted. The work was warmly applauded both by the public generally and the "professionals" in particular. The performance was under the personal direction of the composer, who had reason to feel deeply indebted to the orchestra for the admirable manner in which it carried out his intentions. The solos were excellently rendered by Mad. Offermans van Hove (soprano), Mad. Collin-Tobiasch (alto), and two clever amateurs. The chorus, on the contrary, although entitled to hearty commendations, was too weak.

Up to the spring of 1859, theatrical matters in Rotterdam were in a seemingly hopeless state, and the disunion which prevailed among the principal supporters of the theatre did not tend to improve them. In consequence, however, of the publication of several excellently written articles in the different papers, attention was gradually but surely directed to the subject, and the public became convinced that a complete orchestra and an operatic company were an absolute necessity for the city. In conjunction with Herr de Vries, manager of the theatre here (Amsterdam), certain spirited individuals formed a plan for the purpose of forming a German operatic and a Dutch dramatic company for Rotterdam and Utrecht. The plan did not meet with the requisite support, only 20,000 guildens being subscribed to carry it out. Its originators would not, however, allow themselves to be beaten. A fresh committee was appointed, but their efforts would hardly have been crowned with success, had not one of the members hit upon the idea of granting a free admission to each person taking a certain number of shares in the enterprise. By this means, subscriptions were obtained to the amount of 75,000 guildens, which was sufficient to enable the promoters of the scheme to commence active proceedings.

The direction of the opera was confided to a very excellent musician and conductor, Herr Skraup, formerly in Prague. This gentleman has fully justified all the expectations formed of him, and out of the chaotic medley of artists, vocal and instrumental, unknown to him and to each other, created an admirable working troupe and a first-rate orchestra. The season just past was brought to a triumphal close by a new opera, Meergesue, from the pen of the worthy conductor. The work was well sung, well played, and warmly applauded.—Lon. Mus. World.

The Diapason.

Our readers may, perhaps, take an interest in following, through its different phases, the ascending progress of the diapason during the last two centuries—a progress which has just been summed up in an ingenious piece of workmanship, by M. Emile Pfeiffer, of the firm of Pleyel, Wolf and Co.

Under the form of a vertical instrument, in front of which are nine keys corresponding to nine diapasons, M. Pfeiffer's invention exhibits in four synoptical tables the principal lyric works represented on the French stage from 1680 to 1859.

The first commences with Lully's Armide, sung to a diapason giving 810 vibrations, according to the first scientific experiment made by Sauveur, and quoted by M. Lissajous, in the notice he read before the Société d'Encouragement.

In a similar manner, if we strike all the keys in succession, we perceive, in an ascending progression, eight principal epochs, corresponding to the first representation of Les Danaïdes (1784—818 vibrations); Richard Cœur de Lion (1785—820 vibrations); Adolphe et Clara (1799—838 vibrations); La Vestale (1807—848 vibrations); Guillaume Tell (1829—860 vibrations); Robert le Diable (1831—865 vibrations); Le Pré aux Clercs (1833—868 vibrations); and lastly, Faust (1859—898 vibrations).

In the intervals between these epochs we find exhibited the other master-pieces which have added fresh glory to the French opera, and which were the productions of Rameau, Glück, Piccini, Berton, Lesueur, Méhul, Cherubini, Della-Maria, Nicolo, Boieldieu, Rossini, Carafa, Auber, Hérold, Halévy, Ambroise Thomas, Verdi, Félicien David, and Gounod, in the chronological order in which they were brought out.

We see that, from 1807 to 1859, the upward progression was greater than before. This necessarily required the reform which the French Commission properly adopted, when they restored the diapason to the elevation at which, within a few vibrations, it stood at the time of the production of Guillaume Tell and Robert le Diable.

We believe that M. Pfeiffer intends to send his work to his Excellency, M. Lvoff, Master of the Russian Court, and director of the Imperial private bands, an eminent composer and musician, to whom Russia owed the adoption of the normal diapason, even before it was generally introduced into France.—London Musical World.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

I am returning to thee Annie, Answer to "I'm leaving thee in sorrow Annie." Geo. Barker. 25

This song will no doubt share in the universal popularity of the first "Annie" Song. If it was difficult to invent another melody whose accents would fall upon the ear with like sweetness, the author has shown that still it could be done. Like the other song this is written for medium voices and accessible to singers of all classes.

Glory! Hallelujah! Popular refrain, as sung by the Federal Volunteers. 25

A people's tune said to have originated with the Massachusetts' Volunteers at Fortress Monroe. The tune has spread more rapidly than even "Dixie," and at this time one can hardly walk on the streets for five minutes without hearing it whistled or hummed. As it is a capital marching tune, our soldiers will carry it with them where they go. There are added to the popular words some verses written expressly for the Fourth Battalion of Rifles (18th Reg.) now at Fort Independence.

Our Banner shall wave forever. Song and Chorus. T. H. Howe. 25

A stirring Song which notwithstanding the great number of patriotic airs coming forth from all quarters, will make its mark.

Our good ship sails to-night, my Love. Emily Berger. 25

An uncommonly pretty song, the words of which have a more than ordinary significance in the present times. This will no doubt contribute to make it popular; but the music itself is sufficiently striking to direct attention to it.

Instrumental Music.

Castles in the Air. Valse brill. R. Fitzgerald. 25

Quite a pleasing, lively waltz, which can be dashed off with considerable eclat, without being at all difficult.

Star Spangled Banner Quickstep. J. W. Turner. 25

Mr. Turner has arranged several of our national melodies, such to which public attention has been particularly attracted by the war for the Union, in the form of easy Quicksteps. Thus arranged they will be most welcome to young players. Besides the above, Quicksteps on the "Red, white and blue" and "The girl I left behind me" are now published by the same author.

La Reveille. Grand March Militaire. Carl Meyer. 40

A very brilliant Concert March, rather difficult. It is quite indicative of the brisk step of the soldiery when marched to the battle-field, full of life and animation. The Trio has fine melodious strains. Altogether amateurs fond of a good show-piece will find much pleasure in the practice of this piece.

Books.

ONE HUNDRED OPERATIC MELODIES FOR THE FLUTE. 50

This new collection of Flute Music will commend itself to the favor of Flutists both from the great variety of its contents and from their intrinsic merits. Fifty cents is certainly a very moderate price for so valuable a repertoire of choice music. Amateurs will find in it all that can be desired in a work of the kind.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Two Armies.

[From Vanity Fair.]

Two armies toiling day and night
By bridge and barricade—
Or by the hearthstone—full of might,
Each working for the truth and right,
And neither one afraid.

Two armies:—one of noble men,
All strong and stern and brave;
Forward at duty's call, and then,
It matters not the how or when,
To glory—or the grave.

Their country's glory is their own,
Their common graves—her shame;
Their watchword Union, that alone,
Though on the field their hosts be strown,
Shall lead them yet to fame.

Two armies:—but the second one—
A fairer, sadder sight;
With steadfast purpose, all as one,
With sickening labor never done—
Toils fearless for the fight.

Daughters of men! we know ye now,
For what ye ever were;
Angels with calm unclouded brow,
Before whom every man should bow
In penitence of prayer.

Though death should come, and come full soon,
We fear him nevermore;
We ask of Heaven one only boon,
And pray beneath the placid moon,
Who never prayed before:

"Oh, Lord! within the coming strife—
Sad war of kindred blood—
Grant strength to every soldier's wife,
Teach her to live without his life,
And so reward the good."

By every tear-damped thread she draws,
By every needle's gleam,
She links her heart's blood to the cause,
She binds her soul to arm our laws—
Wounded but to redeem.

Oh! soldier, in your camp by night,
Bethink you of her toil.
How you are linked, though dead in fight,
By golden soul-rays glimmering bright
In sorrow and turmoil.

Linked to the nobler soul on earth,
By these weak hands of thread;
'Twas woman's love that gave you birth,
Her love shall bind, come grief, come mirth,
The living to the dead.

CONCERT OF THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

Feb. 27.—If a man could find time and strength to do everything, which he would like, or even intends to do, so might I have been able to send you that complete account of this Society, which I intended. As it is, only some general notes upon it can be sent. It was founded—or as the bill has it, "established" April 30, 1858. It appears to comprehend all the leading musical talent in London, theorists and executants, as is indicated by this list of the council, which contains many names well known on our side of the ocean:

Jules Benedict, Henry G. Blagrove, Wm. Chappel, James Wm. Davison, Joseph F. Dugan, Charles E. Horsley, Edward James, Joseph Lidel, G. A. Macfarren, Frank Mori, Geo. Alex. Osborne, John D. Pawle, John Sampson Peirce, E. F. Rimbault, Charles Salaman, Augustine Sargood, John Simon, Henry Smart.

Charles Salaman, Esq., is the Secretary and a most energetic one he is. The Society gives a series of concerts and has private meetings at which new compositions are examined and tried—through the kindness of Mr. Macfarren at a trial meeting in May, young Paine's (of Portland) Quartette for string instruments was one of the pieces played. What the objects of the Society are beyond this, and the arousing of an esprit de corps among the musicians, I do not know. Certain it is, that one object ought to be the formation of a good musical library, which for modern German musical history still seems to be utterly wanting in London. I would not exchange my own collection in this department for any which I could find in this great city during three months stay—not to speak of our two libraries in Boston.

The orchestra employed at the concerts consists of 1st. violins, 16; 2d. violins, 16; violas, 10; violoncello, 11; contrabassi, 9. String instruments, 62. Flutes, 2; oboes, 2; clarinets, 2; bassoons, 2; horns, 4; trumpets, 2; trombones, 3; ophicleid, 1; drums, 1; bass drums, 1; side drum, 1; triangle, 1. Total, 84. Conductor, Alfred Mellon—a splendid one too!

At this concert the orchestral pieces were. "Ruy Blas" Overture, Mendelssohn; "Tempest," do., Benedict; "Le Philtre," do., Auber; Beethoven's violin Concerto; Solo played by Vieuxtemps, and Spohr's Symphony, op. 59, in D minor. The performance was very fine—St. James' Hall full. The vocal pieces were (with orchestral accompaniment) from Weber, Mozart, and Rossini.

The enormous expenses incurred in carrying on any project of this kind in London, one would think, must break them all down—that they do not, is proof that the people, who support music, whether from the love of it or because it is the fashion, are better able to throw away guineas than we are dollars. The Musical Society however seems to be really flourishing and one can only rejoice in its prosperity, and hope that it may become a musical "power in the land" as the old Philharmonic has been for so many years. But is there no way of giving good orchestral music to shilling people? Must tradesmen and mechanics and their families be excluded from so powerful a means of culture? When the musical Society was in contemplation an article was written "On the great increase of Musical Societies, &c., in London," a copy of which printed on a separate sheet has fallen into my hands. In what degree allowance is to be made for the bias and private feelings of the author, I do not know—but it contains some historical notes, which seem worth preserving. It is moreover a droll specimen of very plain talking. Some of the Societies mentioned seem to me to have been most praiseworthy attempts to really benefit the cause of music, at great personal sacrifices of the men engaged in them, and attempts, which in London could only succeed by the favor of a wealthy public. This public, however, seems to be not much different from those of other countries; it is easy to get large sums for a Bloudin, or a Heenan—for a great vocal gymnast—for any kind of quackery—for anything amusing—but to pay high for real values—no, that will not go down. Cæsus pays a guinea for green peas and strawberries out of season, and grumbles at an extra penny on beef. But to the article.

ON THE GREAT INCREASE OF MUSICAL SOCIETIES, &c. IN LONDON.

[Written in the winter 1857-58.]

Scene—Vide Macbeth. (Eight New Musical Societies, &c., appear and pass over the stage, in order, the last with a glass in his hand; Bankruptcy following.)

Ruined speculator:—

Thou art too like the former swindle,—down!
Thy plans do sear mine eye-balls:—and thy look,
Thou other thing, is too much like the first:—
A third is like the former; filthy hags!
Why do ye show me this!—a fourth!—start eyes;
What, will the line stretch out to crack of doom?
Another yet?—a seventh!—I'll see no more;—
And yet the eighth appears, who bears a glass
Which shows me many more; and some I see
That two-fold Halls and treble Bonus carry:
Horrible sight!—Ay, now I see, 'tis true;
For Bankruptcy with taunting look smiles full on me
And points at them for his.

To the editors of the Musical World and Musical Gazette:

Gentlemen,—Perceiving by recently issued Prospectuses, that the public and profession are to be again offered immense advantages by the establishment of new societies of practical musicians, &c., allow me to present to your notice a few ideas of similar undertakings (suggestive of speedy dissolution) for the edification, not of yourselves alone, but more particularly of those who are not acquainted with the numerous difficulties to be encountered. Almost all of the following pleasant devised schemes have proved abortions, and although aided by the great business capabilities and integrity of men occupying the most exalted positions in the profession and music trade.

"The Musical Antiquarian Society," (established 1840-1). The council consisted of Messrs. W. S. Bennett, H. R. Bishop, W. Chappell, G. Hogarth, W. Horsley, G. A. Macfarren, C. Lucas, E. F. Rimbault, J. Tule and Sir Geo. Smart.

The subscribers to this Society were promised, for this one pound, 500 pages of music per annum! By a strange oversight the works issued were deprived of the only thing likely to make them of any use, viz: A separate pianoforte accompaniment. This fact may account for enormous quantity of these publications continually appearing in Messrs. Puttick's music sales, where the "pounds worth" is generally knocked down for a few shilling!

"The Handel Society," (established 1843-4). This Society was originally set on foot by Mr. Rovedino, who contrived nevertheless, to get ejected by his own friends, in a way best explained by himself (see Mr. Rovedino's account of this transaction, printed at the time.) The council (at last) consisted of Messrs. Addison, Bennett, Crotch, Davison, Hopkins, Macfarren, Moscheles, Mudie, Rimbault, H. Smart, Sir G. Smart, and Sir H. Bishop. This lazy body, to perpetuate the fame of Handel, commenced with the most common of his works, and expended their funds for twelve years on works which Dr. Arnold, Randall, &c., had made quite common. In the same time Novello would have engraved the whole of his works in far better style, and at a much lower rate. It would be interesting to know what became of the large fund raised for these publications.

"The Royal Surry Gardens Company." This concern was smashed in less than no time, which is the more to be wondered at, as, according to the prospectus, the Directors seemed to have "t'ae'n a bond of Fate" to secure success,—On dit. Some fortunate person has bought the place for £13,000, so that the shareholders have something to look forward to.

"The Harmonic Union." This Society appears to have issued a prospectus with the names of Mr. Benedict as Conductor and Mr. H. Smart as organist (1852-3). But as the object seems to have been to restore vitality to defunct or non-appreciated Oratorios by the Musical Genii of England, viz., Messrs. C. Horsley, H. Leslie, Pierson and W. S. Bennett—the latter of whom the Directors stated to be engaged on a new sacred work (probably a Missa pro defunctis) for the Society. I need hardly add that the affair was soon swamped.

"New Philharmonic Society," (1853). This healthy society, supported by H. Berlioz, Dr. Wyld and W. Beale, commenced its career by an early performance for the benefit of the "Asylum for Idiots," patronized of course most extensively by the friends of the Society. But the "Charity" manoeuvre did not take, and a new Oratorio, written by John Milton is said ultimately to have knocked a hole in the bottom of the concern which nothing could mend.

[The New Philharmonic, however, still goes on, 1861.]

"National Opera Company," (1855). This company never recovered the issue of its first prospectus. From what I can gather the verdict was "found dead."

"The Professors' College," 18 Hanover square. This Institution I suppose to be a chapel of ease to its apoplectic neighbor in Tenterden street—but never having seen anybody in the building but the proprietor, I cannot say how it goes on.

"The St. James's Hall Company," of this place I know little, except that the capital is said (see prospectus) to be £40,000; but curiously enough, the expenses (see estimate), are also £40,000 to a halfpenny. So, as by their own account they have no funds left, I leave the public to draw their own conclusions. Nevertheless, on looking again, the clouds clear off, for we have all the available talent in London to see after its welfare, viz., Messrs. W. Chappell, T. Chappell, F. P. Chappell, G. Leslie, T. Beal, J. Ella, O. Jones, &c. This like the Professor's College seems from its decorations inside to be a sort of a chapel itself.

Guided by the preceding cases, I rather trust my money to one respectable man than to 18 calling themselves a "Society;" for in a society I become a mere atom—my only duties being to listen periodically, to an account of its excellent condition (although mortgaged and on the eve of bankruptcy) and to pay my subscription or call with regularity. For if I exceed these duties and with becoming humility venture to ask why £20,000 is added to the builder's estimate, I am straightway assailed by that worthy himself, backed perchance by the Solicitor and informed that it is highly improper to stir up ill-feeling amongst those who are professors of harmony. This exceedingly jocose sally causes a sleek youth to make a statement about some mysterious old cesspool or plague pit, which the worthy builder and solicitor did not expect to find in that locality; or perhaps they hit upon the crater of an extinct volcano and what with that and the interference of parish authorities, &c., he, the "Youth," thinks it certainly cheap at £30,000, and of course a dead bargain at £20,000. A great coughing and some applause follow and I sink into my boots and am silent. In fact, to sum up—in nearly all such cases. A wants a nice berth or position as an Architect, Solicitor, Treasurer, Secretary, Conductor, Lecturer, &c., and, finding he cannot do it all by himself, he appeals to B, C, D, E and F; and forthwith we behold prospectuses (like legal documents) Councils, Members, Subscribers, &c., with occasional bits of reasoning in the shape of Bonus of 15 per cent. the first year, "love of Art" and such humbug. This goes on well enough till the "Sham" appears. Then they all go to loggerheads and the "Solicitor" and two or three of the "legs" perform a demoniacal war dance in the background, getting more jolly as the thing gets more complex; till at least they mortgage the whole property (for a tithe of the prime cost of the whole) probably to a friend of A, B or C. The bubble bursts—"no effects" is the reply to all inquiries. This result, according to the Solicitor is the fault of the shareholders—they say it is the Solicitor's, &c., and after much reading, writing and arithmetic, on both sides, the society is "wound up" by being "run down" at the Bankruptcy Court.

R. E. L.

P. S. "The cry is still they come," I subjoin two more announcements just recovered, viz.—

"The Musical Society of London," (established 1858.) Council Messrs. W. Chappell, W. Beale, Macfarren, F. Mori, E. Rimbault, Horsley, Wallace, Salaman, Benedict, &c.

"The London Music Printing Society," (established 1858.) As the respected progenitors are at present, to use a vulgar word, but "hatching" these associations. I forbear going into details—for if the eggs should turn out as usual "added" I should probably get abused for it. However, for the edification and comfort of all I hear the hens are sitting and cackling with much glee, seeming confident this time of producing something more stomach-sustaining than the time-honored empty egg-shell.

KEMP'S "OLD FOLK'S" IN LONDON.

Feb. 28. Kemp's "Old Folks' Concert" in the small St. James's Hall. I went several times to these performances, the pieces being to me "Herimathsklaenge"—sounds from home. The Hall is small, I found the audiences the same, I think it was a mistake to come to England with that kind of musical wares. The cultivated public took no interest in old psalmody, the uncultivated prefer Christy and Woods Minstrels. The really good voices sadly lack cultivation, and but few of the songs and solo pieces were decidedly successful, though these few were. The American pieces as a rule did not please, and the staple of the concerts soon became, the "Dying Christian," "Strike the Cymbal" and the like, which came to America about fifty years since from England. Nor could the English appreciate at all "Yankee Doodle," which was given in the stage-Yankee manner, but with a text very much changed for the worse from that which Burgoyne has been said to have written. One mistake of Mr. Kemp was in taking up everything almost too fast. As to the dresses, they had little interest for an English audience, as every man woman and child can see the wigs, cocked hats, breeches and broad coats, any day perched upon carriages in Hyde park. The ridiculous costume of 1815-30, was the only novelty.

Mr. Kemp told me he was paying expenses—which I was glad to hear, having doubted the possibility of his doing so. If an article from a Brighton paper, which I sent to the Journal was copied I need not say more.

WALLACE'S AMBER WITCH.

March 2. At Her Majesty's theatre. "The Amber Witch" text by Chorley, music by Wallace. Every reader knows, or ought to, the beautiful story with this title translated from the German of Dr. Meinhold—a tale so successful in its imitation of antique style as to have been received as a real village chronicle—and thus enable the author to turn the tables upon certain critics and show how unsound were their principles of criticism.

As to the text of the Opera—to my feeling Mr. Chorley has worked it up very well, giving a fine plot and many interesting incidents, nor could I at all sympathize with several persons, who called the story (on the stage) heavy and undramatic. I enjoyed it. Some passages as sung differed much from the text in the books—this was explained thus; during the rehearsal, some of the singers found fault with the words as not being "singable" and the author wrote new ones; but before the production of the piece the vocalists changed their minds and restored the original words. One critic was bitten by this; for he in speaking of the words, mentioned that the singers had been obliged to change Mr. Chorley's text! No doubt the words might be improved somewhat now, for they were written about a dozen years ago.

The scenery was very beautiful, equal to much of the best which I have seen; but as a rule the machinery on the London stages does not work nearly as well and quickly as on the German stage. One great mistake in propriety is placing the beautiful night scene in a mountainous country, like the Hartz or first ranges of the Alps, instead of putting it among the dunes of Pomerania where amber is found; not in veins but in deposits.

Wallace's music was a treat. It is very fresh and its leading characteristic is I should say, sweet melody. One very beautiful one is in the scene where Mary in the dungeon, half awake, sings the ballad:—

"When the elves at dawn do pass
Leaving pearls along the grass,
And a dreamy light is creeping o'er the sea;
When the blushes of the East
Tell that weary night hath ceased
And the cheery day come back for you and me;
When the stars are growing dim
And the birds begin their hymn
And the newborn flowers are drinking from the air;
I cannot choose but sing
'How delightful is the spring,
And the early morning how very fair!'"

Another song by Count Rudiger, with a chorus of soldiers struck me much:

"Go sing how our troops war the first in war,
On some lazy noon in May;
How of peace no coward dared prate afar,
When our trumpet loud said 'nay!'
For come are the first, or come are the last,
To his priests or his hundred lords,
The king on his father's throne sits fast,
By the aid of our bright broadswords," &c.

This was the first opera by Wallace I had heard, and I was very agreeably surprised by it. It seems to be a very valuable addition to the small stock of English operas, and one which must be successful if ever produced in our country. Dare I hope to hear it there sometime?

March 4. Monday concert again. A Rosoumowsky Quartette, the Sonata, op. 111, the Kreutzer Sonata, and a string trio, all by Beethoven, instrumental, "The Kiss" and "Adelaide," Italian words, sung by Reeves, and two songs by Miss Banks, instrumental.

ELIJAH.

March 8. A long desired gratification—"Elijah" at Exeter Hall, given by the Sacred Harmonic Society. The hall was erected for speaking and is very bad for music. There is no due proportion between length, breadth and height, and the grand choral passages sound muffled and dead in most parts of the room. What I never saw in Germany is universally the practice here as with us, viz., bringing the orchestra in front and forcing the singers to sing through the crash of the instruments. I, decidedly, as an auditor, and still more so as a chorus singer, prefer the German method of playing the orchestra in the rear, bringing down the centre part of the string band only. With the accompaniment behind, the voices are supported and kept up to the time much better, besides which the singer feels a pleasure in his work, impossible when he stands away up there by the organ and can hear nothing of the leading melody and of the harmony of which he is part. It seems to me radically wrong—this English and American arrangement of the stage and the musical forces upon it.

Now here at Exeter Hall, I heard, on the whole, the finest body of chorus singers I ever listened to, not excepting the Sing Akademie, or Stern's Gesangverein in that city. And yet yet the vocal effect was not beyond that in the Sing Akademie hall, with less than half as many singers (true the hall is hardly half as large) and and not comparable with that in our Music Hall, when we had about 500 singers at our festival a few years since. The Alto in proportion to the other parts in the Sacred Harmonic Society, is not so fine as it is (or was) in the Handel and Haydn Society—the Bass not finer. But the tenors and trebles leave ours far, far behind; and as to the singing as a whole—well, when some English singer again appears in our oratorios in Boston, and praises up to the skies our chorus—just turn your back upon him and tell him, that there is such a thing as going too far in absurd flattery, even for us! The Sacred Harmonic Society is composed of people, who expect to be at some expense to gratify their love of the best music. They study their parts, and go through with an amount of releasing, of which we know nothing. They have their reward in the consciousness, that nowhere out of Exeter hall can such oratorio performances be heard.

At this performance of Elijah, with all its difficult recitative chorus, no slip, no want of precision in attacking the rough points, marred the beauty of the performance. All went smoothly, all with a power and grandeur, which would warrant very strong terms of eulogy. The six hundred singers moved with the steadiness and precision of a vocal quartette. The principal soloists were Mr. Santley, (Elijah) Mrs. Sainton-Dolby—with whose voice, I was much disappointed—but this was her first appearance since childhood—Mad. Laura Baxter, with her large, grand deep voice, Miss Parepa, from one of the English operatic companies and Sims Reeves. Oh, that Reeves! of him another time. Take them together I have nowhere at home or in Germany, heard the parts so well given. All I ask is that the Sacred Harmonic Society may have a better hall.

J. S. Bach.

(TRANSLATED FOR THIS JOURNAL FROM THE "DEUTSCHE MUSIK-ZEITUNG" OF VIENNA.)

Arias from various Cantatas, with Piano-forte accompaniment, arranged by ROBERT FRANZ. Four sets (9 Alto, 9 Bass, 9 Soprano, 9 Tenor Arias). Leipzig: F. Whistling; Boston: O. Ditson & Co.

We have shown how different the natures of the two masters. It necessarily follows that their influence on the public would differ in the same way: HANDEL's influence would be more extensive, Bach's more intensive. Handel has never been unknown; always from the first has he both morally and artistically inspired, elevated, refreshed and enlivened a very great part of the public; he is part and parcel of the national pride of the English. Bach has only very lately risen out of a long, almost complete oblivion, and has his admirers chiefly among musicians and believing Christians; but he takes such a lasting hold upon one, that whoever has got to be thoroughly at home with all other music, comes back again and again to him, to constantly discover new wonders. He thus had the power to transform the musical way of thought and feeling of the modern generation; for only since he has become better known, has the musical understanding experienced an important conversion toward a better direction, if this influence is not to be ascribed exclusively to him. To whom does not the comparison with Spinoza occur here? So long as Leibnitz and Wolf reigned, nay even in the Kantian period Spinoza was scarcely read, and still less understood; since men have learned to know him, he has helped to work such a revolution in the consciousness of the age, that he, at last regarded as the inmost and choicest treasure of a whole cultivated generation, has taught us how to understand the rest more deeply.

But be that as it may; at all events Bach may make claims to a far more general, more earnest and devoted recognition, and to a far deeper study, than has been his lot heretofore. To this the work which now lies before us will, as Herr Franz expressly declares in his "Preface," afford a contribution. Let us now proceed to examine it. Thirty-six arias have in the course of two years (1859 and 1860, as the publisher states in a manner worthy to be imitated) been selected, and provided with pianoforte accompaniment, out of the scores of the "Bach Society" of Leipzig, with the laudable end to "pave the way for the more general public to the treasures of this edition." They are, with but few exceptions, taken from the Cantatas, a species of composition which Bach evidently cultivated with especial fondness; for there are said to have been five whole years, each of which contained at least sixty such Cantatas—one for every Sunday and festival day—and of these only one half have been found, and but a small part as yet published.

The Cantatas were specially written only for church service; and their form seems, like that of the Passions-music, to have proceeded from a naïve imitation of the Protestant forms of worship. They adhere strictly, that is, to the Gospel for the day, and bring out its leading thoughts as well as celebrate the peculiar character of the day itself. The various participants in the solemnity, the parish, the preacher, the single member of the congregation, are all made available; each in his way contributes to the full understanding, to the living enjoyment and to the musical communication of the divine word. Thus for example, the Cantata for Sexagesima Sunday turns upon the Gospel for that day, the parable of the sower, and the different kinds of ground upon which the seed of the word fell, in the following manner: It begins with a "Symphony," which, as is usual, forms the preparation for what follows, inasmuch as its immense unisonos and the interwoven figures spread out over them were plainly meant to depict the fullness, the might, the blessing of God's word, much in the same way as the preacher sums it up in the text-words of the following Bass recitative: "For as the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, so shall my Word be, that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it."—Isaiah lv., 10, 11. Then a spokesman for the congregation, in a Tenor recitative, expresses their readiness to receive the preaching of the Word; the congregation confirm this in the words of the Litany "That thou wilt give thy spirit and power to the Word; we beseech thee to hear us, O Lord!" which gives the preacher an opportunity to hold as it were a preachment, in a long bass recitative several times interrupted by the litany of the congregation; he following the train of thought in the litany and having reference, as far as possible, to the gospel text. Here, too, all turns up on the Word of God, which is to shield them against devils, Turks and Pope, as well as banish sins and error from Christians led astray. This response between congregation and preacher forms the middle point of the Cantata. Now follows, in regular symmetry; first, another member of the congregation, singing, in a Soprano aria, of the "soul treasure," above all treasures, of the Word of God (see No. 1 of the Soprano Arias); whereupon the congregation close with the Choral song, that God may not take his holy word away from them, lest their "guilt and sin should shame them."

In many of the Cantatas the gospel text itself is also used, either entirely, as in the Christmas Cantatas, or in part. In the latter case, it is characteristic with Bach to select the most important passage, the point as it were of the whole; for example, in the Cantata for the 14th Sunday after Trinity, upon which falls the gospel of the ten lepers, (Luke xvii., 11);—in order to indicate the idea of gratitude, of which the whole Cantata treats, according to the text as it were, he takes the 15th and 16th verses, the point of the narrative, and places them as a recitative in the middle of the whole: "And one among them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back and with a loud voice glorified God and fell down upon his face at his feet giving him thanks. And he was a Samaritan."

As in the Passions-musik, so too in the Cantatas we find dramatic, epic and lyric elements interwoven; but mixed in such proportions, that, in keeping with the object of the Festival, the lyric and contemplative predominate. Hence the choral song of the congregation usually places itself in the foreground. It presents itself, on the one hand, as an artistically wrought out figural counterpoint, having great advantages for representing in the most comprehensive way, both objectively and subjectively, the rich relations of the divine word, which here lies at the foundation, whether as Bible text or church hymn. On the other hand, the congregation appears in the Choral, which usually forms eth close and is kept for the most part in the purely lyric style; instead of this, too, we often find an Arioso for the choir; less frequently a wrought out contrapuntal movement. Against this stands the Recitative, which is kept sometimes in the narrative, but for the most part in the reflective, or even lyric vein. In the first case it is assigned to the Evangelist (tenor solo); otherwise, either to the preacher or a member of the congregation. It commonly paves the way from the congregational to the solo song, or vice versa. Finally, in the Aria, the individual subject, as the representative of all believing Christendom, places himself, with his personal faith and his pious feeling, in lyric outpouring, over against the congregation. Here then we see unfolded the richest variety of moods, which every individual may experience daily in his religious life, a many-sidedness worthy of the highest admiration. A more intimate acquaintance with this portion of Bach's creations is the more interesting, stimulating, and edifying, since these by their nature, more than any other, give us without doubt an insight into the inmost soul's life of the noble man. If only for this reason, the collection now before us cannot be earnestly enough recommended.

On Musical Terms.

We observe from European papers that Pauline Viardot Garcia, the great singer and instructress of the voice has edited a collection of classical Cavatinas, &c., so far principally from the old Italian school, with the details for rendering them properly and effectively, minutely carried out. This will be a capital thing for those who will never learn to walk alone, who have no artistic instinct in them to develop the slumbering hieroglyphics of the composer into the thing of life and beauty which floated before his vision when he committed them to paper. In fact most of our singers are of this class. They need a model in all cases. In olden times the composer thought an occasional p or f sufficient to indicate the light and shade of his work. Now every two-penny composition is crowded with signposts, bearing mysterious inscriptions in foreign languages, and studded with signals at every crossbar, taken from the musical signal code and extending from a battalion of f's drawn up in line of battle, to as many p's, the latter reminding one of the story told of Talleyrand who, being toasted at a public dinner, arose before the tumult had subsided and merely moved his mouth for half a minute as though he were speaking, bowed and sat down, whereupon everybody applauded on the mere mental conviction that the Prince must have said something smart, as he was in the habit of doing. (Remember also Jullien's orchestra in this connection.) Our modern composers guard against all misunderstandings. They are bound that there shall be no chance of spoiling the text in the reading. This may be eminently proper when a great work is concerned but the same ceremonies observed in the short-lived trash of the day reminds us of a drove of jackasses, marshalled and escorted like a body of the Imperial guard of France. Our young composers are amazingly fond of using ostentatiously the vocabulary of the Italian terms which have stuck to their memory during their long and tedious studies. To them it sounds indescribably charming to prefix to the introductory measures of their first song (commencing "I met her first in cabbage time when she was cutting kroat") in the purest Tuscan con mola tenerezza. You might as well attack a mosquito with the gigantic fury of Booth in the last scene of Richard the Third. Affectation is a bad thing. The affectations of the French language in the music titles is altogether unnecessary. Only the other day we met with a Grande Marche des Wide Awakes, and felt much commiseration for the author. Anybody who knows what silly words are being constantly set to music and published by fond authors mostly at their own expense, can imagine how gawky the Italian terms look that are thrust upon them. The following lines for instance which wind up a song of four verses might be ushered in with con abbandono ed espressione, followed in succession by melanconico, ritenuto assai and morendo. Observe the effect:

And often when dear mother goes
To get her things to use
I see her drop a silent (!) tear
On sister's frock and shoes.

Sister, of course, has died, when quite small. Accarezzevolmente is a nice word because a big word. We earnestly recommend it to young authors. It would go nicely with the following fashionable serenade—or something equally poetic and sensible—in six-eight time, key of A flat:

"Come where the moon's straight beams
Dark shades illumine,

Where near aquatic streams
Mushrooms are blooming."

Scherzosamente e lusingando would not stand amiss with

Folly has a lubly nose
Flat across her face it grows
It sounds like tunder when it blows!

Nor does this uncalled for, ridiculous profusion of Italian terms comprise all the foolish directions attached needlessly to musical compositions. We suppose it is only when an author utterly despairs of his composition carrying with it a clear idea of its form and meaning that he need resort to the expedient of giving general directions like the following: "Sing this piece with tones rather plaintive and with feeling. Let your own soul be fully imbued with the sentiments of the Song," or "Quality of tones somewhat sombre and agitated, yet full of earnestness and interest," or "Let the tones speak of quiet and earnest joyfulness," &c. Besides being altogether superfluous this is much more than a singer can do. He can sing soft or loud, legato or staccato, hurry or retard, and darken or brighten his voice. But it would confound a singer who really can do all this—and there are a great many who cannot—to attend to such prescriptions as the above. A physician might as well tell his patient to take a dose of medicine with the tenor of his system in a quietly exhilarating condition. If Bellini had interlined the score of his "Norma" with an exposition of each and every feeling into which the heroine is plunged by the rapid changes in her position towards those around her, we should have had but one Norma, a stereotype character, soon to become a pasteboard puppet on our lyric stage, we should have had no distinct creations of the part by Pasta, Lind, &c. The artists want freedom of interpretation. If short-sighted composers erect barriers and fences round their works and these are things which have life in them, it is the artists duty to tear such barriers down. Very few composers, we dare say, fully understand the power of their works in all their bearings. Haydn was overwhelmed by his "Creation," when he heard it performed for the first time. He attributed the music directly to Divine inspiration. Goethe never thought the character of Mephistopheles capable of being interpreted at all on the boards. The manner in which the most adored Cantatrice renders a certain Cavatina need not be binding upon anybody. Rules and models will do for pupils, artists. Composers and performers—must walk alone. Conducting;

A FEW PRACTICAL COUNSELS HOW TO LEARN IT.

BY HERMANN ZOPFF.

(Concluded from page 117)

CONDUCTING AN ORCHESTRA.

The counsels, I gave in the introduction, I consider also applicable to the conductor of an orchestra, and will now add only a few hints, chiefly based upon experience.

One of the most painful observations for a conductor is the neglected state of mind a great many orchestra-players. With few exceptions most of these artists, having often been deprived of a good education, are made dull, indifferent, and even vulgar, in consequence of poor payment, competition, constant rehearsing, and playing to dance during the whole night. These people care for music less than the mechanic for his trade; and those who make an exception, the so-called "learned" members of the orchestra, are generally so conceited on account of having made some studies of the method of harmony and their being able to play their respective instruments tolerably well, that they will strenuously oppose everything which is not sanctioned by tradition in the orchestra, or which they are unable to understand. Woe to him who does not know how to impose upon these people by a display of talent and energy!

Whoever wants to become a conductor of orchestras will do well to go often amongst the players when they are at rehearsal, in order to observe their doings, and to study the timbre of the different instruments, as well as to make friends with the influential members. By and by let him call upon them, and beg to be instructed in the technics of the different instruments, to be made acquainted with all the tones of the different registers in the wind instruments, and let him also take note of everything that is difficult and impossible to execute, in order when he later comes across passages that are not practicable, to be able to alter them. If solo passages are not performed satisfactorily, let the conductor practice them with the player in his own room. It is thus that he will learn to know better the instrument in question. The practical musician is always pleased to find in the conductor a thorough knowledge of his instrument; the conductor will also gain much esteem by counting any faults occurring in the middle parts of the score, thus evincing a sharp hearing.

The performers on wind instruments ought always to be treated in the same way as the singers. One must well observe their breathing and give them a sign as soon as they are to resume their parts, for taking new breath. Precision in cases where the whole orchestra must resume anew, consequently also after fermatas, can be best obtained by preparing the resuming half or a full measure beforehand. Performers of instruments to which are generally given long and frequent rests, are used to prominent signs on the part of the conductor when they have to play again. Phrases and passages which are not given as they ought to be, can be best corrected by singing them or by indicating the rhythm with the baton. In order to repeat without great loss of time, the score must be divided by large letters, and these letters must be marked in all the parts.

It is generally very difficult to obtain an even piano from the orchestra, at least from the performers of brass instruments. These, especially when belonging to a military band, must be made familiar with this effect, because in the open air they are used to play as loud and strong as possible. Very difficult it is further, to induce players of brass instruments to use instruments without valves in such pieces, where they are prescribed. Most of the performers can only play on chromatic instruments in F, and are, moreover, so lazy as to prefer transposing every thing before they play on the required instrument; it is thus, that the easiest natural tones are sometimes missed.

Another evil in the orchestra is the constant and loud tuning. This has become such a habit that the musicians, quite thoughtless, tune, prelude, and rehearse without interruption, as soon as the last tone of the piece has been played. This can, of course, be easily checked by the conductor who, on the proper occasion, may also tell them, that, as they have not to play before Turks, who, like their ambassador at the Prussian Court during the reign of Frederick the Great, always admired the piece which was played before the "overture" beat, meaning of course the tuning, it would be well, if they stopped that barbarous custom. Tuning ought always to be done in a side room of the concert hall. Who during the performance wants to retune, can easily do this in such a way as not to cause a disturbance.

It is usual to tune the instruments after the A of the Oboe, but this is not often admissible on account of the temperature which influences the wind and stringed instruments in a different way. A tuning machine invented by chief military conductor Wieprecht, which is not submitted to any influence of the temperature, must therefore be welcome and we hope will soon be introduced. Performers on reed instruments ought to be cautioned to keep their instruments warm during long rests. All performers of brass instruments cannot lose in tune by drawing in and out but a quarter of a tone; of stringed instruments more than this can be expected.

The conductor meets often in the members of an orchestra negligence, inattention, dullness, and thoughtlessness. Especially is this the case in the first rehearsal where most of them are so much engaged with the reading of their parts, that they can only be made aware of the presence of the conductor by repeated beating of the time on the desk. Even often in the performances themselves does the conductor feel this heaviness on the part of the orchestra, and in this case he will do best to beat the first measures a little faster. But often the contrary takes place; the performers commence hurrying to such an extent that they hardly touch the last quaver. In this case the conductor must observe an imperturbable coolness in order to check the rare ardor of the members. Besides it is always good while conducting to remain cool and self-possessed, although with regard to singers a more animated proceeding is often necessary. If there is little cheerfulness on the part of the orchestra-players, the conductor has to cause it by some good-natured remarks; but let him be also mindful, never to tire the performers of the wind, especially brass instruments. If he meets with a want of civility or, in the rehearsals, with the nasty habit on the part of some players to smoke, let him rebuke this in such a manner as to appeal to their sense of honor and delicacy; and if this will not do, let him send them away. Coming too late or leaving too early is best checked by reductions in the salaries. There is nothing which touches the orchestra-player so quickly as loss of money. A good impression is often produced by not using the baton at all in such places where it can be conveniently done. This shows confidence in the abilities of the orchestra, which is generally repaid by more attention on the part of the members.

Let us conclude with a few hints in regard to conducting of Singing with Orchestra. Only a few orchestras can accompany singing well, for it requires first, that the members have practiced in such a manner that the greatest evenness throughout is obtained; second, that they know how to play piano, consequently know how to control themselves; and third, that they are used not only to mind the conductor, but also the singing.

If a conductor wants to practice conducting of singing with orchestral accompaniment, he must never lose an opportunity to accompany good and bad singers on the pianoforte, in order to obtain routine in the close following up of the singing, and consequently in the yielding to the singers. It is also necessary for the conductor to initiate this great truth into the members of the orchestra, viz., that the most esteemed virtue of good accompanists of singing is: yielding and subordination.

The most difficult part is an always ready accompaniment of the recitatives, because in these the time is constantly changing. The conductor must before all things see that the recitatives are written out in all the parts for the instruments used for the accompaniment. If this is the case, he can in an accompaniment with simple chords restrict himself to simply marking the beginning and end of each chord, without marking the measures.—N. Y. Musical World.

The National Hymn.

Nearly four weeks have elapsed since the day appointed for the opening of the manuscripts sent in to the Committee upon a National Hymn, and impatience is manifesting itself in many quarters for the announcement of the expected award. Aside from any interest which the public at large may take in the subject, the great number of the competitors—only a few short of twelve hundred—makes it inevitable that there are thousands of eager expectants sitting upon the anxious seat in this regard. For it can hardly be that each competitor has less than a dozen friends who are solicitous for his success. We have therefore thought it worth while to inform ourselves as far as possible upon the subject, and we learn that the Committee are upon the verge of the conclusion of their labors. They have not yet, however, decided upon making an award; and we remind our readers, that in their advertised conditions of competition, they expressly stipulated that they were not to give the prize to the best hymn sent in; but that they should reject all, whatever their intrinsic merits, if they found none exactly suited to the purpose.

Their mode of proceeding, we understand, has been this: The manuscripts containing words alone were first opened, the music being laid aside for separate consideration. The verses were then read by the member who opened the envelope containing them. If they were condemned at once by a nearly unanimous voice, they were cast into a waste-basket ready at hand; if not, they were reserved for future consideration. But, by a waste-basket, must not be understood any of those wicker concavities, known to ordinary mortals by that name. A vast washing basket—a "buck-basket," big enough to hold Falstaff himself—was made the temporary tomb of these extinguished hopes; and this receptacle was filled, it is said, five times with rejected manuscripts, which were seized upon for incendiary purposes by the cooks of the gentlemen at whose houses the meetings of the Committee took place. Alas for the hapless writers! Were even the priceless manuscript plays of the Shakspearian age that Warton's cook purloined and used to put under pies so lamented as those remorselessly incriminated hymns will be? The mass of these manuscripts, we are informed, were either the merest common-place, or absolutely neither rhyme nor reason. From the whole collection only about thirty were reserved as worthy of a second reading, and these, on a second and third examination, were reduced about one-half. Several were also preserved on account of their absurdity or grotesqueness. They were so bad as to be good.

The hymns sent in with music were about three hundred in number. To enable them fairly to judge of the merits of these, the Committee called in competent musical aid, and after a winnowing of the heap over the piano-forte, the residuum found worthy of a more particular hearing, were sung. This second examination left less than twenty compositions in the hands of the Committee. We hear that among the rejected musical manuscripts were very many that were evidently sent in by persons who were ignorant of the very first principles of harmony and who to their ignorance added utter lack of native musical capacity. It has been stated that the Committee called in two eminent musicians to pass judgment, as experts, upon the compositions sent in to them. But we are informed that this report is not correct, and that judgment upon the merits of contributions has, in all cases, remained entirely with the Committee, among whom are gentlemen of well-known musical taste and cultivation.

But even with their stock thus reduced the Committee hesitated about their decision; and, finally, determined to call the public to their aid. It is to the public heart and to the general ear that the words and music of the hoped-for hymn are to be addressed; and, therefore, it appears to us that this determination is a wise one. It is to be carried into effect by the performance of the songs, now in the hands of the Committee, at concerts in New York and Brooklyn, in which soloists, a chorus, and an orchestra, will test in the most satisfactory manner the fitness of these hymns for national purposes. The names of the authors and composers will be withheld; and, indeed, they are yet entirely unknown to the members of the Committee themselves. It is not, we believe, intended that the question shall be decided by the amount of applause elicited by this or that hymn; but that the manner in which the performance affects the public shall enter largely into the considerations by which the final judgment of the Committee is affected. The plan is at least an ingenious one, and the concerts, which are to be given at a low price of admission, though in the most creditable style, will doubtless excite a very general interest.—N. Y. Daily Times.

Mr. Paine's Organ Concert.

A musical entertainment whose almost sole attraction is the performance upon the church organ, is somewhat of a novelty in Portland. The full powers of this noblest and most imposing of musical instruments are seldom revealed to our concert-going public. We listen to the organ as playing a subordinate part in divine service, without always remembering that it is an instrument requiring the highest powers to call forth its finest effects.

To many, we doubt not, the performance of Mr. Paine afforded a new revelation of the majesty of tone and grandeur of effect which the skillful musician may call forth from the organ. He certainly exhibited remarkable skill in the handling of the instrument, as well as complete knowledge of the most difficult compositions. The result of his years of study abroad was quite apparent. The clever boy who went forth from among us has returned a thoroughly educated and accomplished musician. We are no musical critic, and cannot speak of this performance in the terms most befitting it, but we know that persons whose musical knowledge entitles their opinions to respect, declare that nothing like it was ever before heard in this city.

As the principal attractions of his programme Mr. Paine chose several of the works of the great master, John Sebastian Bach. He has evidently made the works of this great musical genius a subject of close study, and the fact that he has attained to a knowledge and full appreciation of their marvellous invention, extraordinary power, and science, is the best evidence of his own advanced position as a musician.

The Prelude and Fugue in A minor, by Bach, was played on the full organ throughout. It is a most elaborate composition, yet moving with the most perfect harmony. The manner in which the pedal movement came in was exceedingly neat, and won the applause of the highly cultivated and fashionable audience. The Trio Sonata in E flat, also by Bach, was well chosen to follow the Prelude, its soft and vivacious movement contrasting finely with the solemn grandeur of the first piece. The pedal performance here was quite extraordinary, the feet being continually employed. The solemn "Agnus Dei" was sung by Miss Cammett and Messrs. Dennett and Thurston with fine effect. These performers always do justice to whatever they undertake. In the variations and the Austrian National Hymn, and the Star Spangled Banner, our young townsman displayed his powers as a composer in a highly creditable manner—especially in the former piece. In the latter variations a passage occurred which is played by the feet alone.

Mr. Paine must take high rank as an organist, and we congratulate our citizens upon having among their number one whose example must do much to elevate the standard musical education among us.—Portland Transcript.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

LONDON, July 16.

Had I come here unconvinced either of the existence of an uncommonly wide-spread and real love for good music in London, or of the possibility of making "classical" music "popular," a single occasion, such as I am about to describe, would have removed all doubt upon the subject. The only regret is, that I can speak only of the last of the so-called "MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS," for, having heard the last, one would gladly summon up before him the whole series, now stretching back through three seasons, from Feb. 1859 to July 1, 1861, between which dates no less than sixty-four concerts have been given in St. James's Hall, with programmes of the most classical character, without an orchestra, but with first-class performers—really artists, and such only—and never failing to secure the strict attention and unfeigned delight of a very mixed and numerous audience. So I am told, and what I have just witnessed makes it easy to believe it. They are called "popular," because they are made accessible to the general mass of music-lovers, and not, like most London concerts of the higher order, only to the wealthy and the few—although you would perhaps be astonished to see how many and how constant are those "few" who frequent fashionable operas and concerts to the tune of a guinea for a seat! The "Monday Popular" are cheap—for London; that is, there is a liberal allowance of room for unreserved seats, and not bad seats, at the one shilling price, while the more favored places range from three to five shillings. For most of the oratorios and higher kind of Concerts the minimum price of admission is three shillings, and the maximum half a guinea, and in many cases a guinea. So that these concerts are "popular" in the sense of comparatively cheap. That they are so in character as well, was a matter of conviction and experiment on the part of the enterprising director (Mr. S. Arthur Chappell), until their remarkable success rewarded the experiment and proved the conviction sound. The Director, in thanking the public at the end of his third season, says:

"Till very recently, a string quartet or a pianoforte sonata, played by first-class artists, was a luxury reserved for the enjoyment of a few, and regarded, on the other hand, as something inevitably 'caviare' to the multitude.

"The Monday Popular Concerts, however, were originated with the firm conviction that the quintets, quartets, trios, sonatas, solo and concerted, &c., of the great masters, would be listened to by the general public with decorous attention; that the oftener they were heard the better they would be liked; and that every composer, from the profound Beethoven, the elaborate Bach, the genial Handel, the earnest Mendelssohn, the elegant Spohr, and the universal Mozart, to the light and cheerful Haydn, would find admirers. The result has demonstrated that a faith in the readiness and ability of the public to appreciate the highest manifestations of artistic beauty was thoroughly justified."

And one of the leading journals says what is simply true and reasonable in the following extract:

"The epithet 'popular,' as applied to a performance of music, no longer means something adapted to an uneducated and unrefined taste—something in which the high and classic productions of the art are eschewed as being calculated to weary the audience. At some of our popular concerts, the customary fare is fit for the palate of the most fastidious amateur. And, far from being neglected on this account, such concerts flourish more and more. Such is the case with the MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS, given every week during the season at St. James's Hall. At first we had some suspicion of the reality of the musical taste shown at these concerts. When we heard pieces of great length, highly complicated, such as we always believed to be 'caviare to the general,' not only attentively listened to, but applauded with enthusiasm, we could not help thinking there must be some affectation at bottom, and that people would tire of pretending to be delighted with things they did not understand! But time has shown that this was a mistake. These Concerts, successful the first season, are still more successful the second. They are even improved in quality; an inferior piece is never admitted into the programmes, nor is an inferior performer employed. Yet the spacious hall is every night crowded to the doors by persons in the habit of frequenting cheap entertainments; and no assembly of cognoscenti could show a sounder or more discriminating taste. The consequence is, that the Monday Popular Concerts are now attended by the most musical people in London.—Spectator.

In confirmation of all this I certainly must testify, with regard to the last concert (July 1), that the hall was filled (though not to overflow— for overflow, thank decency, is not allowed in Europe, neither in concerts nor conveyances, in theatres nor railway trains, in oratorios nor omnibuses); that the company appeared composed equally of the wealthier patrons of music and of the music-lovers of more modest rank, who have not much to spend; that all listened most attentively and looked intelligent, applauding warmly what was really best; a well-pleased sympathetic, encouraging audience, and yet in large part not ignorantly pleased, but musically experienced and critical. Whether the things performed were really "classical," whether the feast was fit for cultivated taste, whether genius played a larger part in it than hum-drum or clap-trap, the reader shall judge for himself; here is the programme:

PART I.

Quartet, in E flat, No. 12. Beethoven
M.M. Wieniawski, Ries, Webb, and Piatti.
(First time at the Monday Popular Concerts.)
Song, "Le Secret" Schubert
Miss Banks.
Suite de Pieces, containing "the Harmonious Blacksmith."
Miss Arabella Goddard.
Song, "Pria che spunti" Cimarosa
Mr. Sims Reeves.
Prelude, Sarabande, and Gavotte, for Violoncello Solo. Bach
With Pianoforte Accompaniment (Mr. Benedict).
Signor Piatti.

Song, "Name the glad day." Dussek
Miss Banks.
Sonata, in G major, Op. 69, No. 2, for Pianoforte and Violin.
Miss Arabella Goddard and M. Wieniawski. Dussek
(First time at the Monday Popular Concerts.)

PART II.

Quartet in D. Op. 63. Haydn
M.A. Wieniawski, Ries, Webb, and Piatti.

Song, "Adelaide" Beethoven
Mr. Sims Reeves, accompanied by Miss Arabella Goddard.
Harpsichord Lessons. Scarlatti
Mr. Charles Halle.
(First time at the Monday Popular Concerts.)
Song, "The Hunter's Song" Mendelssohn
Mr. Sims Reeves.
Duet for two Pianofortes, in D major. Mozart
Miss Arabella Goddard and Mr. Charles Halle.
Conductor, Mr. Benedict.

Not one of these choice selections but what shone by excellent performance. Especially the opening string Quartet of Beethoven, the first of the five belonging to his latest period and called, without reason, "posthumous;" a work requiring true artists to seize its spirit and rightly render its design. The four interpreters could scarcely have been better. Wieniawski proved himself an admirable quartet leader; Piatti's bass was worthy of his reputation; and the middle parts were such as it is a comfort to hear. That a mixed public should be readily impressed by a Symphony concert, (like those of Liebig, for instance, in Berlin) is not so remarkable; a fine orchestra, by mere mass and brilliancy, by wealth and variety of tone color, arrests and captivates; great thoughts are greatly enforced by such large utterance; the profoundest and most complicated tone-combinations tell upon the crowd by the mere might of volume and of euphony; a Symphony, too, has something dramatic and exciting in its progress. But that a violin Quartet, the pure outlining of the intrinsic musical thought, with all its inmost subtleties laid bare to close attention, but not enriched by accessories of various instrumental color, not massed into large orchestral proportions so as to arrest attention at a distance,—that a Quartet of such a man as Beethoven, and in his least understood and latest manner, and, stranger yet, heard for the first time by most, and played in a large hall, should be listened to with eager interest through all its movements by so large an audience, and be in fact appreciated (if attention and applause and manifest delight are any signs), is certainly a fact worth chronicling, and should give encouragement to concert-givers and societies who care for Art as well as money. After Beethoven, there was no risk in venturing a Quartet by "father Haydn," whose cheerful face and easy eloquence of manner, let him present himself in what form he will, are always welcome and familiar. This was one of the least well-known, and yet one of the most original and piquant of his eighty and odd Quartets; and its effect on all faces was as of fresh air and sunshine.

I was much interested in the selections from Dussek, the Bohemian composer, contemporary with Mozart, who has been famous in his day, and now has his day again in England. The Sonata Duo was worthy to appear in the same programme with the great names, and it was elegantly rendered by both artists. The song "Name the glad day," was much in the same style with Haydn's Canzonet: "My mother bids me bind my hair," and quite as beautiful. The singer (Miss Banks) has a fresh and lovely voice, good style, and entered into the spirit of the song; and she was no less winning in the more serious and fervent melody of Schubert's song: "The Letter,"—why metamorphosed into the French "Le Secret" I know not. One of the pleasantest and most novel features of the evening was the set of "Harpsichord Lessons" by old Domenico Scarlatti, a contemporary of Bach and Handel, and a great admirer of the latter, as he knew him in his young days in Italy.

They are full of difficult and graceful passage-work, a sort of delicate melodic arabesque, sparkling and lifesome, and Hallé played them to a charm; one smiled at the perfection of the thing. The union of two such pianists as Hallé and Miss Arabella Goddard, in the Duet by Mozart, ensured that most satisfactory conclusion of a good feast, in which all rise with an appetite. It was in the Suite by Handel, containing the well-known variations on "The Harmonious Blacksmith," that I have had as yet the clearest instance of the pianism of Miss Goddard. I never heard it played more perfectly, perhaps never quite so well. In all respects of facile, finished, clear, expressive execution it was faultless. It has not been my fortune yet to hear her play Beethoven; it is in the great Sonatas that she has chiefly won her laurels. The Prelude and quaint old dance movements by Bach, for violoncello, were played con amore by Sig. Piatti, and won new admiration for the happy inexhaustible invention of the genial, learned, wonderful old master. It only remains to speak of Sims Reeves. But he was ill and did not sing; an agreeable substitute appeared in Mr. Santley, the baritone.

The beauty of the whole thing was, that here were the best artists performing (and let us not forget among them Mr. Benedict, who was the masterly accompanist), not to exhibit themselves but to draw attention to the great composers. If I have given more space to the record of this one concert than I have left for others equally important (the reader can imagine that he reads this part through a magnifier), it is because of the "Popular" claim, which has been so well vindicated by these Monday Concerts, without any compromise of high artistic tone. I would commend the example to our music managers at home, so soon as we shall have time again to think of music, so soon as our distracted country shall have come out from her great struggle, with her free institutions nobly saved, her vigorous system purged forever from the treacherous poison so long secretly imbibed from contact with a principle as opposite to its own as darkness is to light; and shall enter upon a new era of real liberty and lasting peace, released from all old blind and suicidal pledges to the only alien and weakening element in our grand symphony of states, to Slavery, the natural enemy of Freedom and of Civilization, the sleepless traitor to the general cause, the curse that clung to all our aspirations, the monster that has been weaving round us a most specious web of "compromises" in the full hope of devouring us! So soon as this good fight shall have been won (as most assuredly it will, since God is just); so soon as the Union shall have saved itself, and shall have guaranteed its own existence by refusing henceforth every guarantee to Slavery, beyond that of non-interference (except where it deprives a citizen of his constitutional right to free institutions, free speech, &c., rights for which the Union was made); so soon as Peace and Plenty shall return again, then certainly will come a great reaction of activity in the behalf of Art and Music and of all ideal and harmonious pursuits. With the new sense of Freedom and of Union based upon the solid rock of principle, these things will not be despised as trivial pastimes of the "piping times of peace," but will be more respected and more earnestly pursued than ever, as belonging to that real education of humanity for higher spheres of being, to secure liberty and room for which is just the motive of all patriotic struggles. This day will soon return to us, if we are true: the day when we shall again have leisure for the true ends of our national and social existence. Music, no more than Religion, is to be silenced or put out of thought for more than a short day by the din of war. So that it may not be idle even now to be holding up good examples and suggesting useful hints to the peace-makers and the peace-improvers, to the educators, and the wielders of refining influences, to those who arrange for our natural supplies of Art and Music, when their time comes. — And so, with this little parenthetic burst of patriotism, here endeth the lesson for to-day. D.

Mr. WILLIAM SCHRAUBSTAEDTER, favorite Solo-Tenor of the Orpheus Society, and long and favorably known as an accomplished music-teacher as well as amiable gentleman, has left this city to take up his abode in San Francisco, Cal. We understand that he has taken this step at the solicitation of many friends who preceded him, especially at the instance of Mr. Trenkle, now the leading teacher there. This does high credit to the ability of Mr. Schraubstaedter. We sincerely hope he will find there a large field for his labors and many congenial minds, and recommend him warmly to our California readers.

Musical Correspondence.

PITTSFIELD, AUG. 7, 1861.—It is generally believed that to give a complete musical education it is necessary to go to Europe for instruction. I do not suppose that the Journal of Music endorses this theory, but some of its readers may be interested in the testimony of a young artist who tried the experiment. Thinking that a European master would release him from the disagreeable drudgery of exercise practice upon which his teacher in America had insisted, he went to Leipzig and became a pupil at the Conservatory, expecting to enter at once upon the study of the works of the great masters. But his hopes were sadly disappointed. His new instructor stopped him in the middle of the first piece he played and condemned him to the practice of the scales! He says; "this was exceedingly cool and refreshing. I had travelled more than three thousand English miles to do what? Scales, and scales, from morning till night with a few delightful interruptions for five-finger exercises. While I was thus practising high art, I could not help thinking of my first teacher in the United States. What I did at Leipzig was exactly the thing he wanted me to do at home, a thing I utterly scorned as being old foggy and unnecessary."

Again, it is said that classical music, such as the sonatas of Haydn, the fugues of Bach, &c., are seldom heard in this country. I remember a complaint of this kind in the Journal of Music not long ago, and am happy to be able to mention one place, where these compositions are often performed, and in a style which would do credit to professional artists. I refer to the Mendelssohn Musical Institute at Pittsfield, in which I know you have long felt an interest, that is well deserved. I do not believe that in any "Conservatory" or school in Europe is music more thoroughly taught than in this institution, and those like our friend mentioned above who are contemplating a trip to the old world might well save themselves trouble and expense, by going through the course of instruction pursued here. I send you the programme of a soirée given at the end of the term first closed.

1. Overture—Egmont. Beethoven
Miss Harriet A. Hall and Janet M. C. Dolg.
2. Song—"Liebes Botschaft." (Love's Message). Fesca
Miss S. Louisa Monroe.
3. Grand Rondo, Aufforderung zum Tanze, (Invitation to Dance). Weber
Miss Helen Mac Gregor.

4. Vocal Trio, L'Esperance (Hope). Rossini
Misses Hall, Merrill and Dolg.
5. Song without words—Blumen Stueck, (Flower Piece). Robert Schumann.
Miss Monroe.
6. Song—"Leibe's Fruehling," (Love's Spring-time). Mendelssohn
Miss Mac Gregor.
7. Sonata in D major. Haydn
Miss Eleanor L. Glasier.
8. Prelude and Fugue in G. Bach
Miss Elizabeth F. Merrill.
9. Aria—"Non so più cosa," from "Figaro's Hochzeit," Mozart
Miss E. L. Glasier.
10. Sonata in E flat. Clementi
Miss Dolg.
11. Vocal Trio—Roaming Song. Abt
Misses MacGregor, Hall, Monroe, Dolg, Glasier and Merrill.
12. Grand Morceau de Concert. Schubert
Andantino, Allegretto, Allegro.
Misses Monroe and Merrill.

The pieces themselves need no comment—it is not often that we get so fine a selection—and all were well rendered. I might perhaps particularize the Overture to Egmont, the Sonata by Haydn, and the Grand Morceau de Concert, a magnificent close to the evening's entertainment, for instrumental pieces, and for vocal, the Aria "Non so più," from Figaro's Hochzeit, sung by a little woman from Hallowell, Maine, of whom if she has a mind, we shall hear more. On the whole I consider myself indebted to Prof. Oliver for the greatest musical treat I have enjoyed for many months, and heartily wish him the success he deserves in the great work which he is doing for music in this country. H. N. E.

Musical Chit-Chat.

PARIS.—The storehouse of scenery of the Opera, was destroyed by fire Friday, July 19th, containing 133 sets of scenery beside other properties; the loss amounting to 750,000 francs. The scenery of Semiramis, Tannhäuser, La Sylphide, la Juive, Orfa, la Reine de Chypre, was destroyed, but that of the operas now being played was kept in a different place, so that there will be no interruption of the performances.

ALFRED JAELL, after great success in Paris, has played (the piano), at Baden, Ems, Weisbaden and Nanheim, receiving everywhere a most flattering reception. He proposes to pass the summer at the lake of Geneva.

A BILLIARD TABLE PIANO.—A. Bataille & Co., of Paris, have constructed a piece of furniture which unites the functions of a Billiard table and a piano-forte, for the Viceroy of Egypt. The French papers praise the ingenuity, elegance and convenience of this invention and think that Egypt will not be the only country where it will be wanted.

JULIUS KNORR, well known for his excellent School for the Piano died recently at Leipzig, where he was professor of music.

TURIN.—M. CONCONE, well known in the musical world as a teacher of vocal music and by his writings, died here recently, where he had been for several years Chapel-master of H. M., Victor Emanuel, the King of Italy. He is said to have been a person of a noble character and high intelligence.

At the funeral of Count Cavour, a remarkable funeral mass by Peri was performed. The solos were sung by Mirate and Beneventano.

Mad. de Lagrange is in Paris. She is in treaty, it is said with M. Bagier to sing in Madrid during the next season.

ABDUL AZIZ, the new Sultan of Turkey. Events would seem to justify the more favorable opinion previously formed of the new Sultan's character. That his tendencies inclined towards the old Musselman party, the choice of Namik Pasha, to which I shall presently advert, must be taken to imply. Yet one of his acts would negative the presumption of a blind fanaticism. Signor Guatelli, the late Sultan's band-master, has been in the habit of giving lessons on the piano to Abdul Aziz Effendi. On the day after the accession of the latter his music master called at the palace. He was at once admitted to the presence of the new sultan, who asked him to what he was indebted for the honor of the visit. "I have come to give your majesty your lesson on the piano," was the answer. "You know," rejoined the sultan, "a pasha cannot condescend to give lessons in music." Signor Guatelli was thus informed for the first time that he had been raised to the rank of Siva Pasha Marco Bey. His imperial majesty's physician, another Christian, has been raised to the same rank.

Parliamentary Views on Architecture.

The following amusing and not uninteresting debate occurred a few weeks since in the English House of Commons. We think Lord Palmerston had the best of it.

On the motion for going into committee of supply.

Lord Echo submitted a motion that in the opinion of the house it was not desirable that the new Foreign-office should be erected according to the Palladian design now exhibited in a committee-room of the House of Commons. The noble lord commented with some severity upon what he called the Palmerstonian style of architecture, and urged that Mr. Scott's design was altogether unsuited to the country, the climate, and the purpose to which it was to be devoted, and that a pure Gothic (not the abuse of Gothic, as in the case of the new houses of parliament) was that of which the country would approve. The new hotel close to the Victoria station at Pimlico, and the Crown Life Assurance-office in Bridge street Blackfriars, from the design of the late Mr. Benjamin Woodward, were in his opinion favorable specimens of what might be done in the way of Gothic street architecture. He called upon the noble lord at the head of the government to give up his Italian notions of art, which were at a deplorable discount, and consent to build the new public offices for the rising and not for the setting generation.

Mr. Buxton seconded the motion.

Mr. Cowper defended the department of which he is the head, and denied that classic architecture was at a discount, advancing as an illustration to the contrary that out of 280 designs sent in for the new foreign office, but fifteen were in the Gothic style.

Mr. Layard spoke in favor of Gothic as on the whole most appropriate, and ridiculed the grotesque ornamentation of the House of Lords and Commons, which he called the "gorilla style."

Mr. Tite eulogized the design of Mr. Scott, and asserted that the great majority of the architectural profession were of opinion that the new foreign-office ought to be in the Italian style. To attempt the introduction of color in our public buildings, either by terra cotta or variegated marbles, would, in his opinion, end in failure.

Mr. Osborne expressed his opinion that of all tribunals in matters of taste the House of Commons was the very worst. When the competition for the design was thrown open, it was thrown open to all the world, and five thousand pounds premium was offered for the best design. The first premium was awarded to Messrs. Coe and Holland, and the second on the list were Messrs. Banks and Barry, but in consequence of Mr. Scott, who had, it was true, an European celebrity as a Gothic architect, being secured for furnishing the plans of the foreign and war offices, Mr. Scott was, by some curious hocus pocus, put forward between the two gentlemen who obtain the first premiums and the noble lord (Lord J. Manners), who was a devotee in the Gothic school (hear). If the house were to treat this subject properly some one would move an amendment and say "A plague on both your houses" (laughter). Reject both the Palmerstonian and Scott plan, reopen the question, and give the building to the man who gained the first premium (hear, hear). He expressed no opinion upon either style—he was so afraid of being a party to the enormous expense which was about to be incurred. He thought the whole question ought to be re-opened, and that these gentlemen ought to have the benefit of the position which they had fairly gained in 1855. He should take no part in the division, but he advised the house to be on its guard, and remember always that the estimate for the house of parliament was £750,000, and the actual cost £2,500,000. They were the worst building committee in the world, and they stood disgraced in the eyes of Europe as men of business ("Oh, oh," and "Hear, hear"). The cost of this undertaking would, he believed, in like manner swell into a million, and if any gentleman would move that both plans be rejected, and the thing thrown open as at first he should be happy to vote for it; but he would say nothing of the merits of the Palmerstonian style, or the Gothic.

Lord Palmerston: The battle of the books, the battle of the big-endians and the little-endians, the battle of the green ribands and the blue ribands were as nothing compared with this battle of the styles (a laugh). But I must say I think that if I were to pronounce an impartial verdict as to the issue, I should say that the Gothic has been entirely defeated. Objections have been made upon the ground that these plans have no originality, and it is said in the first place that it is not a national style—that the Italian style, I will not call it the Palladian, but the Roman classical, is not national. Well, is the Gothic national? I never heard much of the Goths and Vandals and Saracens doing much in this country (laughter). I have been told in my early days that the Romans were in this country for a considerable number of years, and it is probable, therefore, that they have a better claim to have established in this island some style of architecture which may be considered English, than those who never came here at all (laughter). But my noble friend talked about what was the real ancient architecture of England. Why, my hon. friend who followed him thought that Stonehenge might be considered as a specimen of ancient architecture of the country (laughter). But I would go further, and say that the real aboriginal architecture of this country was huts and wicker wigwams—these were the original styles of those who first inhabited this island (loud laughter). And when we talk of Gothic having been practised at certain periods, so has Italian. When we are asked what is the national character, we might, I think, very reasonably ask the question upon which it must very much depend, namely, who have been the most distinguished architects of the country, and what style did they practise? We have had Vanbrugh, of whom truly it has been said he laid heavy loads on earth, but who has given us fine buildings in the Roman and Grecian style. We have had also Sir Christopher Wren and Inigo Jones—great men, who have erected great edifices to excite admiration to the present day. Do not tell me, then, that Gothic is the characteristic architecture of the country. If there was one character more prevalent than the another it was the castellated mansions; but they were erected for purposes of defence. We find them all over the country; but the reason they were erected has ceased to exist, and we may, therefore, I think, dismiss that style with all its inconveniences. My hon. friend says there is nothing so light as Gothic, on account of the number of windows you can introduce. But we have heard of the Great windows that exclude the light;

And passages that lead to nothing.

(Cheers and laughter.) And these were after the Gothic style. Then my noble friend has very kindly invited me to take a morning drive, which I am unable to accept, through the streets of London, to test the public taste, forgetting all those fine buildings Somerset house, St. Paul's Cathedral—

An Hon. Member: The Post-office.

Lord Palmerston: Yes, the Post-office, and several others. Why, it is very much as if a gentleman should drive through the streets of Rome, and, seeing a number of children with arms dislocated and legs out of joint exhibited as beggars for the profit of their parents, should say, "These are the tastes of the Roman people," forgetting all the while the many stout, well-conditioned, able-bodied men he may have met (laughter)—and should say, "Let us make our children like the people of Rome, for these are the tastes of the Roman people" (renewed laughter). My noble friend reverses the boast of the Roman emperor, "I found it of brick and left it of stone," and would make these buildings of brick. Well, we all know what color brick turns after a certain exposure to London smoke. I am afraid to quote an Italian authority against it, because I do not admit Italian taste; but I will quote what was said to me by Canova, a man versed in arts, and supposed to be a good judge in these matters. He said, "If London were only widened it would be a real Paradise." But instead of making it a real Paradise my noble friend would make it a real something else, by the gloominess he would cast over all the streets (cheers and laughter). He hoped the house would not, by agreeing to the motion, delay the execution of the works, which were urgently required for the public service.

On a division the motion was rejected by 188 to 95.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Mary Boll. Song and Chorus. G. F. Benkert. 25

A melodious little song in the popular style. Quartette Clubs with a good Solo Tenor will find it taking with the public.

I'm leaving thee in sorrow Annie, with Guitar accompaniment. C. F. Dorn. 25

One of the prettiest of ballads, long a favorite everywhere, adapted for the Guitar. The arrangement is easy.

Glory! Hallelujah! Popular refrain, as sung by the Federal Volunteers. 25

A people's tune said to have originated with the Massachusetts Volunteers at Fortress Monroe. The tune has spread more rapidly than even "Dixie," and at this time one can hardly walk on the streets for five minutes without hearing it whistled or hummed. As it is a capital marching tune, our soldiers will carry it with them where they go. There are added to the popular words some verses written expressly for the Fourth Battalion of Rifles (18th Reg.)

Instrumental Music.

Gen. Scott's Grand Review March. S. Glover. 50

A capital march, full of spirit and vigor. The title-page is illustrated with a lifelike portrait of the great Commander, as he now appears, in full uniform with all the insignia of his rank. It is one of the best likenesses out, superbly designed and richly colored.

Heart's Ease. Waltz a la Tyrolienne.

Carl Faust. 35

By a new composer of Dance Music, a German, of late a resident of London, whose charming Polkas and dashing Galops have become staple articles in transatlantic Ball-rooms. A Polka-Mazurka of his, the "Violetta," is perhaps the prettiest piece of music ever written to the measure of this lovely dance. All his melodies are graceful and striking.

The girl I left behind me. Varied. C. Grobe. 25

An easy arrangement of this pretty air, just now of more significance than ever before. It is written for young pupils and of the same difficulty with the numbers of the "Melodies of the Day," of which set it forms one.

Castles in the Air. Valse brill. R. Fitzgerald. 25

Quite a pleasing, lively waltz, which can be dashed off with considerable eclat, without being at all difficult.

Books.

THE UNION STAR.—A collection of Operatic Choruses, Glees, Quartetts, &c., for the use of Conventions, Schools, Clubs and the Social Circle. Edited by B. F. Baker and W. O. Perkins. 50

This new glee book contains all the favorites; on this account and the low price at which it is sold it is an exceedingly desirable publication for musical conventions and schools. An advertisement in another column of this paper will inform our readers of its contents. It has been compiled with much care and will prove a fine acquisition to the collections of Societies and of amateurs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Cavalry Song.

BY CHARLES GODFREY LELAND.

Weaponed well to war we ride,
With sabres ringing by our side—
The warning knell of death to all
Who hold the holiest cause in thrall :
The sacred Right
Which grows to Might,
The day which dawns in blood-red light.

Weaponed well to war we ride,
To conquer, tide what may betide,
For never yet beneath the sun
Was battle by the devil won ;
For what to thee
Defeat may be,
Time makes a glorious victory.

Weaponed well to war we ride—
Who braves the battle wins the bride ;
Who dies the death for truth shall be Alive in love eternally :
Though dead he lies,
Soft, starry eyes
Smile hope to him from purple skies.

Weaponed well to war we ride—
Hurrah ! for the surging thunder-tide
When the cannon's roar makes all seem large,
And the war horse screams in the crashing charge,
And the rider strong,
Whom he hears along,
Is a death-dart shot at the yielding throng.

Weaponed well to war we ride—
The hall is open, the hall is wide—
The sabre, as it quits the sheath,
And beams with the lurid light of death,
And the deadly glance
Of the glittering lance,
Are the taper lights of the battle dance.

Weaponed well to war we ride—
Find your foemen on either side,
But woe to those who miss the time,
Where one false step is a deadly crime :
Who loses breath
In the dance of death,
Wins nor wears nor wants the wreath.

Weaponed well to war we ride—
Our swords are keen, our cause is tried ;
When the keen edge cuts and the blood runs free,
May we die in the hour of victory !
We feel no dread ;
The battle-bed,
Wh'er'er it be, has heaven o'erhead.—Knickerbocker.

For Dwight's Journal of Music

The Diarist in London.

March 9. A Beethoven concert in the afternoon at the Crystal Palace in Sydenham.

In the Palace is a music-hall—"wheel within a wheel"—nearly as large as ours in Boston, in which music sounds reasonably well. An orchestra of some 35 men ; under the leadership of A. Manus, a German, discourses music various in style and excellence. This day it was all excellent. Beethoven's Heroic Symphony, Violin Concert (Vieuxtemps) and that great work, op. 124, the Overture "Consecration of the House."

Mr. Henry Haigh sang "Adelaide," in Italian and "Entreaty" op. 82, and Mad. Rudersdorf, a scene from Fidelio and a song called here "Wake thy lute, oh, gentle lady," of which I know nothing, or, rather I do not remember which song it can be.

Saturday is the half-crown day of the week and on these days entertainments of a higher order are given. There is a constant effort to improve the musical performances, for happily Mr. Bowley, the general manager of the palaces is so much of a musical person, as to be a leading man in the Sacred Harmonic Society, and in Mr. Grove, the Secretary of the company, I had the happiness to find not only a scholar and a gentleman, but a devoted admirer of Bach, Beethoven, Handel, Mozart, &c. Mr. Coward and another gentleman (name forgotten) are the regular organists, and that instrument is played daily. The organ struck me as being too loudly voiced (if that be the correct expression)—apparently with the design to make up in sound what is wanting in true power for the immense space it has to fill. Hence the effect of its tones is injured by harshness, however that is of small account ; for when one has spent hours in walking through the fairy land—that truly marvellous museum—it is a most delightful thing to sit down and listen to the orchestra or the organ, and calm and rest one's self with music.

No American coming to London should omit to pay several visits to this place, it is certainly one of the most instructive and interesting places of resort that earth can show.

March 11. New Philharmonic Concert in St. James's Hall. For aught I could see these concerts have life enough, though we are assured upon hymnbook authority

"'Tis not the whole of life to live."

The Director and Conductor of music is Henry Wylde, doctor of music ; the orchestra consists of 1st. violins, 20 ; 2d. violins, 18 ; violas, 10 ; violoncellos, 10 ; contrabassi, 12. Total string instruments, 70. Flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, 2 each, 10. Horns, 4, trombones, 3, 7. Drums, triangle, ophicleid, &c., 5, 22. Total, 92.

The performance for this season are six concerts and five public grand rehearsals. To these the prices are as follows : The first class seats on the main floor, subscription for the series of concerts £2 2 ; first row in the balconies £1 11s. ; 2d row in do. £1 1s. ; a single ticket, best place 10s. 6d., in the balcony 7s., 5s., and 3s. At the rehearsals single tickets 5s. and 3s. The pieces performed on this evening were, Overtures, "Egmont," Beethoven and "Oberon," Weber, Symphony, Schubert's in C. Concertos, Violin, Mendelssohn, Solo by Vieuxtemps, and Pianoforte, E flat, Weber, Solo by Miss Goddard (Mrs. Davison) : Vocal, "ob die Walken" from "Der Freyschütz," sung in English, "Glocklein in Thale" from "Euryanthe," sung in German, the air "My long hair is braided," from the "Amber Witch," all sung by Madame Lemmens-Sherrington and a chorus from Haydn's Seasons. All went well and the large audience had every reason to be satisfied.

The programme book (16 pages price 25 cents) gives not only the themes of the Symphony but a sketch of Schubert's life—not the sketch from Dwight's Journal, which I found in a Monday concert programme book—which at the close I recognized as an old contribution of my own.

Leaving the concert before its close I accompanied the editor of the Musical World to Covent Garden theatre, to hear Mendelssohn's operette "Die Heimkehr," put upon the stage here in English, with the title "Son and Stranger," a nice little work with true comedy in it—making one regret again the early death of its author. It was composed in honor of the "Silver Wedding" of Mendelssohn's parents and performed in private by the family and friends. It was given this evening as an afterpiece to the "Black Domino," but it was very late and only a small portion of the audience remained to hear it.

March 12. Another society—this time the "Vocal Association"—its first concert of the fifth season, conductor Benedict—about two hundred voices. The choir sang first a Motet, written by Neithardt for his "Dom Chor," in Berlin—but by no means with the effect produced by that wonderful boy choir. Indeed, thus far, I have never heard that class of music—I mean that written expressly for boy's voices and by a composer equal to the task—given with its due effects by women for Soprani and Alti, and vice versa. There is so much excellent music written for mixed chorus that it seems a mistake to study other.

Two chorals harmonized by Bach, and sung to English words, seemed to please the audience greatly ; there were also several part songs by Mendelssohn, Bishop and others. Madame Laura Baxter sang that piece so full of tears from Handel's "Rinaldo," "Lascia ch'io pianga," and a glorious song by Benedict, "By the sad sea waves." Miss Banks, too, gave a piece or two with her sweet soprano voice, one of them a solo with female chorus from Benedict's "Undine." The programme was varied by a Quintet of Onslow's—no favorite with me—Bach's "Tarentella" prelude and fugue played by Mrs. Davison and a pianoforte fantasia in English airs composed by Benedict and played by the same lady, to a degree of wonderful perfection.

The performances of the Association (choral) struck me as being very good, though not get up the highest standard. In quality of tone, I think as a rule the chorus singing in London superior to that in Germany, no doubt in part owing to the language, and inferior to that with us, although we seldom hear anything at home so good in point of execution. The contralto part of a Boston chorus is perhaps in quality of tone the best I have ever heard—a Mrs. Rametti is only to be found in Boston, so far as my observation extends.

March 13. Imagine a snug little room filled with treasures of literature, and hung with beautiful pictures and sketches, most of them by Turner; some of them exquisite specimens of that master. The "House Father," to use a German term is a lawyer some 70 years of age, full of life as a young man of thirty — a widower — with a loveable dark-eyed niece for his house-keeper. We have had tea, and now the gentleman takes his violin, a clergyman one of the violas, his wife 2d violin, and two gentlemen the other viola and violoncello, and strike of into a string quintett. And so I spent this evening.

March 18. Monday Concert. Beethoven night. Trio in D, op. 9; Sonata in A, op 101; Quartett in F, op. 59; Sonata, P. F. and violin, C minor, op. 30. Soloists, Vieuxtemps and Mrs. Davison. Vocal, the "Liederkreis" and "Ade-laide," sung by Sims Reeves.

Davison says in the descriptive programme:—

Those pianoforte sonatas which Beethoven produced towards the latter period of his life, and which are no less remarkable examples of what the art critics of Germany denominate his "third manner" the Ninth Symphony, the Mass in D, and even the so-called "posthumous" Quartettes, were till recently almost neglected. The expertest performers have either ignored them altogether or regarded them with suspicion or distrust. One evident source of this unmerited treatment was their extreme and in some respects almost unsurmountable difficulty. But a reason still more constantly pleaded, and openly avowed by pianists, was the obscurity of style, and general want of intelligible form, by which, it was assumed, these sonatas were distinguished. Times have happily changed; and at present the last sonatas of Beethoven like the above-named quartettes, are ranked by unanimous consent among the most striking masterpieces of his genius. Beethoven himself considered them the best of his many contributions to the pianoforte and at length the world seems to have endorsed his opinion. Posterity has done the grand "tone-poet" justice. One of the most thoughtful and clear-sighted of modern critics on music (the late Ludwig Rellstab of Berlin) laid it down as a maxim that whatever Beethoven had written must be played; and this decision has passed into a law. Pianists apply themselves with courage and perseverance to master the vast mechanical difficulties in which these wonderful compositions abound; and it is now universally admitted that the mere fact of their having been written for the pianoforte, has elevated the character of that instrument and placed it next in value and importance to the orchestra itself. That such was Beethoven's opinion his works sufficiently attest. However this may be, the last sonatas are now studied con amore and pianists agree to consider the task of mastering them in the light of a sacred duty. Of course we allude to performers unusually gifted, since to players of ordinary ability the last works of Beethoven present inseparable obstacles.

"When some not very profound critic," says a clever and eloquent writer, "ventured to pronounce certain passages of Goethe's second part of Faust obscure, the great poet-philosopher retorted 'Are you quite sure sir, that nothing is the matter with your light?' Beethoven might have put some question to many of the would-be executors and critics of the stupendous works belonging to his so-called "third manner" many of which remain still perfectly unintelligible to all but artists of the very highest order and these we need scarcely add, are extremely rare in every country." The Sonata, Op. 101, is one of the most remarkable of those inspirations of what critics call his "third period" which were for a long time condemned even by Beethoven's admirers as incomprehensible rhapsodies, impossible to execute. That they should be incomprehensible if not executed distinctly may well be credited; and as, till recently, pianists "de la première force" were chiefly occupied with composing and performing fantasias upon popular operas and airs with variations of the same stamp, there was little chance of their meeting with that clearness of execution indispensable to render them intelligible. Mendelssohn would often play them with delight to those he thought capable of appreciating them; but then Mendelssohn was a phenomenon, and what was impossible to the majority of professed pianists was nothing to him. Liszt never attempted any of them publicly, though of course no one can doubt of his ability to play them. The modern "virtuoso" style of pianists were satisfied with a fugue or two of Bach, and a concerto and one sonata (generally the Moonlight Sonata) of Beethoven, as a sort of classical stock, to be served out occasionally to the English public. And so Beethoven had composed the largest number of his pianoforte works for the shelf.

So far Mr. Davison. In the same descriptive programme in the Entr' Acte is a fine analysis of this Sonata (Op. 101) — but it is too long for me to copy.

March 20. "Exeter Hall National Choral Society." First concert concert of unaccompanied music, 600 voices, Conductor G. W. Martin." So it stands on the title page of the book of words. Remarkable singing there certainly was not on the part of the "600 voices," some of which must have been doubled to make out the number I notice that most of the pieces in the book have a note to the effect, "Journal of Part Music, No. so and so, price 1½d. 2d. as the case may be. I notice, too, that of 16 vocal pieces on the programme, seven are harmonized or arranged by G. W. Martin and that three are composed by him, one of them being a prize glee." I notice moreover, that "old English melodies" as "Barbara Allen," such popular ones as "Last rose of summer" and the like are among these arrangements, and very bad they are. The best things were "Hail Smiling Morn," by Spofforth, "Awake Æolian Lyre," by Danby, "In these delightful pleasant groves," by Purcell, "My pretty Jane," by Bishop. Upon the whole the impression left by the concert was not particularly favorable to Mr. G. W. Martin either as conductor, harmonist or man of musical taste. Mrs. Davison gave two remarkable performances on the pianoforte, of show music.

March 21. Another vocal concert of what Mr. G. W. Martin calls "unaccompanied music" — this time in St. James's Hall — by a society called Mr. Henry Leslie's choir, numbering about 80 voices only. This was the third concert of the sixth season — the number of the concerts this season being seven. Save two pianoforte pieces of little interest, the following was the programme, and a very fine one it was, especially the old pieces:

Madrigal, "What saith my dainty darling" T. Morley, 1596
 " " "In the merry spring"..... Ravenscroft, 1513
 " " "Flora gave me fairest flowers"..... Wilbye, 1609
 Part-song, "Love's 'Heighio!'"..... Walter Macfarren
 Glee, "The mighty conqueror of hearts"..... Sam. Webber Trio, for female voices, "Hearts feel that love thee".....

Mendelssohn
 Madrigal, "Take heed ye shepherd swains"..... R. L. Parnall Part-song "When the shades of eve descending".....

Henry Leslie
 Glee, for single voices, "Come see what pleasure"..... Elliot Madrigal, "As Vesta was from Latmus hill descending".....

T. Weekes, 1000

PART II.

Forty-third psalm, 8 parts, (Dom chor music) Mendelssohn
 Glee, for 5 single voices, "Beauty sweet love"..... W. Horsley Part-song, "Come and watch the daylight dawning".....

S. Reay
 Trio and chorus, The chough and crow to roost are gone".....
 Bishop

Part-song, "Evening"..... H. Leslie
 Do. "This pleasant month of May"..... Do.

Solo and chorus, "Now tramp, tramp o'er moss and fall".....
 Bishop

You see what a splendid selection, combining variety, and the highest excellence, and giving both old, standard and new pieces.

I have but one remark to make as to the execution, and that is, it was the most perfect choir singing I ever heard in my life from a mixed choir; the Dom chor in Berlin, being the only one I ever heard to rival it, but that we all know is a boy choir. To one so passionately fond of glees and Madrigals, as I am, it was worth coming to London just to hear once. Such precision, such perfect time, such crescendos, deminuendos, pianissimos, such enunciation of the words, nowhere have I heard anything like it.

The psalm by Mendelssohn, however was not effective to me having heard it sung by the Dom chor, it is not exactly fitted for woman's voices, but its execution was superb. Nothing that I ever heard in Boston or New York could do more than give a faint idea of such glee and madrigal singing.

March 22. Christy's Minstrels, in a small concert room connected with her Majesty's Theatre. The same old story.

March 27. Sacred Harmonic Society, "Messiah." Perfection. Soloists, Sims Reeves, Mr. Saintly, (bass); Madame Sainton-Dolby, (contralto); Miss Louisa Pyne, (soprano).

March 30. Heard part of a concert this afternoon at the Crystal Palace, viz., Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang." It was given in the "wheel within the wheel," drew a good audience, and went exceedingly well. Chorus of the Italian opera reinforced by amateurs. Very enjoyable.

April 1. Amber Witch again; this time in the Drury Lane Theatre, my liking for the music confirmed, the generally favorable impression as to the work strengthened.

April 3. Concert of the Vocal Association again, I am sorry to say; the less said about it the better!

April 8. Rehearsal of Beethoven's great Mass in D, at Exeter hall.

April 10. The Musical Society of London — its second concert of the season. See what a glorious programme:

First Walpurgis Night..... Mendelssohn
 Concerto in C, for pianoforte, solo by J. F. Barnett. Mozart Symphony, B flat, (4th)..... Beethoven
 Scenes from "Faust," sung by Louisa Pyne..... Spohr
 Vocal Trio from "Fair Rosamond"..... Barnett
 Overture, to "Chevy Chase"..... G. A. Macfarren

The cantata (Walpurgis Night) given by this grand orchestra and a professional chorus of 80 voices, was one of the finest successes, I have heard. The performance was worthy of the poem. 'Twas superb. But what I paid special attention to was the difference of effect arising from the use of the English instead of the German language. The translation is by Wm. Bartholemew, a difficult thing to do, because the words are to fit music already composed, and because Goethe makes such a variety of rhythm and so fits the sounds of his words to the sense. Upon the whole it is well done. The English version is far more singable than the German and the vocal effect much better than when I heard it by one of the best societies in Germany, —Stern's.

Take the opening solo and chorus, and see how much more easy the English words are to pronounce with a good tone than the German ones, in most of the lines.

Now May again
Breaks winter's chain
The bud and bloom are springing;
No snow is seen
The vales are green
The woodland choirs are singing!
Yon mountain height
Is win'try white
Upon it we will gather
Begin the ancient holy rite,
Praise our Almighty Father
In sacrifice
The flame shall rise;
Thus blend our hearts together.

Es lacht der Mai!
Der Wald ist frei
Von Eis und Reifgehangen,
Der Schnee ist fort
Am grünen Ort
Erschallen Lustgesänge,
Ein reiner Schnee
Liegt auf der Höh:
Doch eilen wir nach oben
Begehn den alten heil'gen Brauch
Allvater dort zu loben,
Die Flamme lodre durch den Rauch!
So wird das Herz erhoben.

It is all nonsense for people to talk of our mother tongue being so bad for singing. Of course if you undertake to sing the first chapter of Chronicles you will find hard work of it; but English lyric poetry—that which is lyric—is unequalled by any except that of the Latin languages on the shores of the Mediterranean. If our singers would study English singing, or rather the English language for singing, as the French and Germans do their own tongues, we should soon cease to hear complaint and might hope to see the few Italian airs now sung to death in our concerts give way to the beautiful compositions, which I hear in London. One of these days when peace has come again and slavery ceases to bring about a commercial crisis every ten years, I hope that music will raise her head again in Boston, and that the "Walpurgis Night" may be studied and given even if far less beautifully than on this occasion.

I was told—I do not vouch for the correctness of the story—that twenty years ago or more, "Chevy Chase," a melodrama, was to be brought out at one of the London theatres, but at the last moment there was no overture. The manager applied to Macfarren; he undertook it; composed away for dear life; copyist following close at his heels, and in a night, or so, the overture was finished. Hearing it but once I can only say that for style it struck me as a curious blending of Mendelssohn's forms with those of Beethoven—as though one should write a poem one part like Longfellow, and another like Dr. Johnson's "London." This is said not of the musical ideas but simply of the mode of treatment as it struck me at the close of a long concert in which we had so important a specimen of both Mendelssohn and Beethoven.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

J. S. Bach.

(TRANSLATED FOR THIS JOURNAL FROM THE "DEUTSCHE MUSIK-ZEITUNG" OF VIENNA.)

Arias from various Cantatas, with Piano-forte accompaniment.
arranged by ROBERT FRANZ. Four sets (9 Alto, 9 Bass, 9 Soprano, 9 Tenor Arias). Leipzig: F. Whistling; Boston: O. Ditson & Co.

It would be worth the while to form an idea, from the sources themselves, of the state in which Bach found the religious Aria. The examination would no doubt show in a much clearer light the new shape it received from him, and probably would lead to the conclusion, that what went before him scarcely deserves mention in comparison with his,—as may indeed be maintained with perfect right of all the other spheres of his activity. For it becomes gradually more apparent, that only a very small part of German music before Bach, great as its historical worth may be, yields any lasting artistic interest. Hence the historical-critical introduction to these Arias must be left to men approved in such researches; a few remarks only may be here in place, suggested by the work itself which lies before us.

As regards the architectural structure of these Arias, they consist, not always to be sure, but commonly of three parts: the anterior, middle and concluding sentence. The anterior and concluding sentence are often, especially in broadly laid out arias, the same—which is indicated by the Da capo; at least they are often very like to one another, except that the concluding sentence contain significant heightenings, embellishments, &c., but even in these the Ritornel commonly returns unaltered at the close. The anterior sentence usually consists of two clauses, frequently preceded, after the Ritornel, by a short attacking phrase of the voice as it were. They move in the Tonic and one of the related keys, most commonly the Dominant; the parallel key (Relative Minor) is reserved for the middle sentence; this too is commonly two-fold, though not always, for general exhaustive rules can only be approximately applied to Bach's thoroughly free artistic method, which is bound to no absolute formula. The second part of the Aria seldom forms a sharp antithesis to the first; the principal motive is copiously used—especially in the accompaniment—but freely modified in various ways; the newly added matter often can be scarcely called an independent motive, and is seldom wrought out on its own account. Here, as elsewhere, Bach proceeds with an astonishing economy, which makes, however, always the impression of exuberant fulness; for he knows how to spin out his ideas so broadly, to put them in such striking connections with one another, to metamorphose them so variously, and and above all to win from them continually such new sides by ever new melodic turns in the voice part, that once for all, one comes to feel, that this plastic faculty is inexhaustible and inimitable.

We can trust the master, who made every means of Art serve an ideal end, for proceeding very carefully and according to fixed principles in the choice of solo voices for his texts; although it is difficult to state precisely, what those principles were. But the deep and labored thought, which we already find in the composition of the texts for his Cantatas—and it seems to be beyond doubt that he took the most active part in that himself—justifies us in the most unqualified confidence on this point. This much it may be permitted to say in general: that the text for Tenor and Soprano airs have, in the average, a more personal, more purely lyrical character, than those for the Bass and Alto airs, in which frequently a reflective or rhetorical moment only melts into a lyric flow by means of the music. But it can be more confidently maintained, that the Bass arias contain the most dramatic life; the Tenor, the most brilliant psychological musical dialectics; the alto, the most tranquil depth and clearness; the soprano, the most fervent, inward glow of feeling. Bach is in fact a perfect master in showing the distinctive character of every voice, in respecting its compass and in placing its most brilliant and effective portions in the foreground. To be sure, the excessively high pitch of our instruments occasions almost insurmountable difficulties, especially to the Tenor arias; but Bach is not responsible for that; consider on the contrary the thoroughly peculiar stamp, which, in the cantilena as well as in the figured work, distinguishes an Alto absolutely from a Bass aria; this goes so far, the even the harmonic relation, which the voice part (according as it lies in a higher or lower stratum) sustains to the accompaniment, is always taken into consideration, and hence in a Tenor air, for instance, a very different sonority is intended, than in a Soprano air. This becomes most clear if you attempt to apply to these airs the direction now so much in vogue: "for Soprano or Tenor," &c.; the air sounds, to be sure, but its impression is incomparably weaker, than when it is left to its own proper organ. On the other hand, there need be less hesitation about allowing Alto arias to be sung by a rich mezzo-soprano voice, and the Bass arias by a Baritone; since with Bach neither the Alto nor the Bass voice seeks its richest development in the deep tones; it is only from some special motive that it descends occasionally from the middle height.

But let us take a look at last into the work itself and allow it to speak to us by some examples. We will select—without any special particularity—one from each set, and try to analyze it, well aware of the insurmountable limits to the expressive power of words, where music is the subject. It will be necessary to adduce numerous citations; these of course cannot make the comparison of the work itself superfluous, but are designed as much as possible to prompt and further it.

From the Nine Alto arias, which appeared first, we select No. 6,* out of the Whitsuntide Cantata; O ewiges Feuer, O Ursprung der Liebe ("O eternal fire, O wellspring of Love"). The aria forms the middle point of the Cantata, in which at first a powerful chorus prays to God, the eternal source of Love, that he may fill and enkindle the hearts of men: "We desire, O most high to be thy temple." Whereupon a Tenor recitative reminds the Lord of his sure promise, repeats the prayer and adds:

"Ein solch erwählter Heiligthum Hat selbst den höchsten Ruhm."
(Such a chosen sanctuary
Has even the highest honor).

And at this point our Alto Aria connects itself:

"Well done, ye good and faithful servants
Whom God hath called to homes above,
What earthly crown so worth possessing,
What wealth of everlasting blessing
And all from Him whose name is Love.

It sets out—certainly on purpose—in A major. Bach is a very fine character-painter of the keys; and that he allows himself to be determined in his choice of keys by no law but the nature of his texts, is proved (for example) by the fact, that he commences the Cantata: Du Hirte Israel ("Thou Shepherd of Israel," in G major, and ends it in A major. The Ritornel or symphony, which, as is often the case, sums up briefly the leading movements of the Aria, begins with a tender and lovely cantilena, which floats up and down through 2 bars over the bass which lies in the Tonic, pulsing in equal quaver beats; and in such a manner, that the upper as well as the middle parts move in octaves; but the latter, reversing the motives, cross the former. (A).†

The rich fullness of tone here developed, makes palpable to sense, as it were, the multiplied blessing and blissfulness which streams through the "anserwählten Seelen" ("chosen souls," in the Boston edition: "good and faithful servants.") Then in ever richer and lovelier forms the rythmical design of the leading motive develops and extends itself the more, that in the second half of the introduction we pass suddenly into the Dominant key (E major) and make a close in that; then by a swift transition to the Tonic the entrance of the voice part is prepared. First, in a short section it simply brings out the leading motive and ends in the Dominant. Then, starting again with the same motive in E major, it draws the hitherto so quiet bass into emulous, fluctuating motion like its own; new and bolder wave lines appear too in the upper part of the accompaniment. (B).

A lengthier development, in which the accompaniment repeats the second part of the Ritornel, gives the voice free room to unfold itself, at first in shorter, then in ever broader and more compound melismata (melodic phrases). Already the accompaniment has found an end, while the voice, barely supported by a pair of tones to fill out, takes still another upward flight and then sinks softly down upon the Dominant. (C.)

The most wonderful freedom and dexterity is shown in the independence, with which Bach sets off his voice part against the accompaniment; he lets it go free, as it were, and then he weaves it in with the accompaniment again most intimately. Frequently the voice goes with the accompaniment; but quite as frequently is, as they say, "written in" (interpolated). Here nothing seems to have been impossible to him. Not only in the Arias is he never at a loss, how to write into the full organic harmony of the accompaniment a melodious, beautifully conducted, characteristic voice part—but even in the choruses, where there are four voices, we meet this phenomenon. When we think what inexorable powers the vocal organ and the text are, and when we see the clearness, ease, correctness in which all stands before us, we cannot sufficiently admire the mastery, with which Bach has wrought. Instead of many other examples, often much more artfully constructed, the one just cited will illustrate what we mean.

A longer interlude, again ending in E major, forms the conclusion of the anterior sentence and at the same time the transition to the middle sentence: Wer kann ein grösser Heil erwählen, &c. ("What earthly crown so worth possessing.") It consists of two parallel clauses, with an interlude between them; the first in F sharp minor, the second in C sharp minor, but both concluding with a free modification of the principal motive. They were originally accompanied only by the organ and the basso continuo; hence the voice moves here in a more free and characteristic manner, almost like recitative, which corresponds completely to the interrogative form of the first two lines of the text, even outwardly, according to the rising and falling of the voice. But the parallelism does not prevent, that the second clause should contain heightened reproductions of the first, which are already significantly indicated by the interrupting interlude. For here, in the middle point of the whole Aria, the simplest element of the leading motive urged itself gradually upward and thus brings the highest energy of expression into the aria. (E).

Who can fail to remark, in this middle sentence, the depth and freedom with which Bach interprets his text? Most others would perhaps have employed here for the first time the whole wealth of melody and the greatest fullness of tone in the accompaniment to the words: Wer kann des Segens Menge Zählen. ("What wealth of everlasting blessing,") &c., in order to represent them as sensuously as possible. Bach never descends to soulless word-painting; whatever of that sort you seem to find in him is always more symbolical, more deep and musically logical, than may appear at first sight. He describes the seen and palpable beatitude of the "chosen souls" with such richness of color, such sweetness as to excite the deepest longing; but so soon as the question arises about the magnitude, the wealth, the source of the blessing, he lets the accompaniment become silent, man sinks into pensive contemplation; and who could overlook now the painful feature which the interlude just cited introduces into the midst of it?

But this cannot be the last of it; the fullness of inward peace gushes forth anew in yet more tender and voluptuous melodies. By a free re-entrance of the leading motive, we are transported back with glad surprise into the ground-tone of feeling, which the concluding sentence, heightening and expanding, conducts now to its goal. This third sentence moves throughout in A major; its second clause, which the anterior sentence had in the Dominant, returns now to Tonic; so that by its higher place in the scale it acquires a heightened expression, which reaches its goal and acme in a beautiful ecstatic cadence. (F).

Apart from all the fine traits, only obvious to a close examination and a technically sharpened eye, this aria, by its magical sound, its wondrous lovely and caressing melody, its thoroughly poetic temper, can be sure of a marked impression even upon quite unmusical persons, provided that the piano-player knows how to loose the magic charm locked up in it. For the piano part is not without its difficulty; but who can talk of difficulty, with such reward in prospect?

Dramatic Music.

Many theories are formed upon music and particularly on dramatic music. There is no sort of vagary which is not indulged, particularly in Germany, in regard to this admirable art, which touches upon such delicate questions, and which, at the same time, is not understood but by a small number of good intellects. Nothing is easier than to build chimerical and pretentious systems upon the works of a Mozart or a Rossini, to glance over with a bird's-eye view, the history of the art, to bring together glorious names, and strangely mingle them, with impunity, because the public, very ignorant in such matters, is not there to contradict or disprove you. But I dare to affirm anew that nothing is more difficult than to form a good judgment upon the composition of a master, to seize its true character, and to assign it an incontestible rank in the hierarchy of the works of the human mind. Success does not suffice to give measure of the durable merit of a musical composition; for I can cite such an opera, Italian, German, or French, which has had more than a hundred representations without having a note of it remain in the memory of the following generation. Who knows anything now-a-days of La Cosa rara of Martini, which, however, disputed the success of Mozart's Nozze di Figaro? It is a certain sign of the decadence of the age to pretend to exact from an art like music or painting effects of a false profundity, which it is not in its essence to produce. It is form which reveals the intellect and the sentiment which animates it; and without form, which ought first to please my senses, it is in vain for you to invite me to reflect and meditate long on a picture or a score which does not exhibit the particular beauties I have the right to seek. Let us beware of this hollow German symbolism which indulges in such dark reasonings in matters of art, and which thinks it sees in everything obscure, unpleasant or incomprehensible, a superior conception to a work brilliant with light, which speaks to all, and which expresses the truth through the medium of beauty, without which there are no fine arts, above all, music. I don't go to the theatre to attend a course of metaphysics, or meditate upon the government of empires and the mysteries of Providence. I go to enjoy a delicate pleasure, a moral pleasure without doubt, but hidden under the attractive forms of poetry and art. It is from Germany, and contemporaneous Germany, that has come to us this abstruse and barbarous theory of a pretended spiritualistic music, a music so sublime that it goes beyond the empire of sound, if we must believe the demi-poets of Leipzig or Berlin, and surpasses the senses and intelligibility. It is by such absurdities that they have sought to explain certain equivocal passages in the last compositions of Beethoven, and to ring the changes upon the miserable productions of the poor imitators of this great genius. Shall I say my whole thought? I begin to throw off the too heavy weight of the false profundity of German estheticism, and I have begun to prefer a limpid, healthful page of Descartes or Pascal to the nebulous pathos of the pantheists beyond the Rhine.

An opera should satisfy two essential conditions to merit a rank among the great works of art. The music must be imprinted with the general character of the story to which it is adapted; it must express the characteristics of the dominant characters; it must paint the struggle of great passions by the means proper to it; it must adapt itself, in fact, to the laws of verisimilitude and dramatic logic without ever forgetting that it is poetry, and cannot descend to material imitations too much extended, without losing its prestige, and compromising its power over the heart and imagination of men. This first condition of general truth being fulfilled, and it is not the most difficult, there remain, pure music, beauty of language, elegance of form, simplicity of means, delicacy of detail, nobleness of melody, richness of coloring and instrumentation, everything which tends to the dramatic illusion, but which outlives representation: in short, style, which gives permanence to a musical composition as it does to a poem, and which constitutes the eternal charm of great works. The most impressive drama, the most powerful lyric conception put effectively upon the stage are works of an inferior order without style which consecrates them, and alone ensures them the admiration of posterity. Let one read the score of Don Giovanni, Le Nozze di Figaro, Der Freyschütz, Oberon, even the Vestale of Spontini, who was not, however, a great musician, and in the dead letter of these fine dramas, so vital upon the stage, one will find a musical poetry by turns vigorous, powerful, exquisite, profound, with the only profundity which it belongs to the fine arts to reveal, that of sentiment and grace. Be a philosopher if you will; but be one as a creative artist, like Poussin, in speaking the language of the gods.

Do you wish a shining example of the doctrine which we maintain here, of what one has the right to exact from a dramatic composition to warrant its classification among the rare chefs d'œuvre which please the learned as well as the ignorant, and which make an epoch in the history of art? Go and see William Tell, the marvel of our time. From the overture, which is a true picture, as clear as day, as transparent as light, as colored as night where the scenes occur, you are informed of the character of the story which is to be told you—a heroic and pastoral drama, where the divine sentiment of love of country predominates; and the poet tells you this in an admirable language, which at once charms the most inexperienced ears, which seizes upon the imagination, and touches the feelings. Then comes that colossal introduction, where a thousand episodes mingle, without the musical discourse being ever weakened or interrupted, a vast Kermesse, where the coloring of Rubens shines with a distinctiveness of form which the Flemish painter never knew. Need I cite all the beauties of this marvellous chef-d'œuvre, the duet of Arnold and William, so vigorous, so melodic and always musical, the air of Matilda, Sombres forêts, whence exhales an exquisite sentiment of nature, serene and bright as it is dreamed of by poets of the south, and the duet which follows between the two lovers with so chaste and profound a tenderness? In the opinion of all musicians and connoisseurs, there exists nothing on the stage comparable to the second act of William Tell for united dramatic truth and musical beauty. The chorus, in which the sons of Switzerland swear to live free and to exterminate the traitors among them, is a thing absolutely surprising; and as to the trio for three male voices, known to all the world, I do not think that there is a piece of dramatic music where the pathetic expression has ever been pushed so far without ever forgetting the beauty of language which it belongs to art always to utter. The trio in William Tell can be put beside the masked trio in Don Giovanni. I will not continue this arid enumeration of the beauties of William Tell, which the whole world knows by heart. Some day or other I will perhaps attempt a more complete examination of the author of so many chefs d'œuvre. Take the score of William Tell only, reduced to the simple proportions of a piano accompaniment, that is to say, despoiled of the coloring of its instrumentation, the prestige of stage effect, and all the powerful accessions of a good performance. You will be even more surprised at a nearer view of those limpid, large simple, vigorous melodies, which live by their own life, accessible to all voices, intelligible to all the world, those duets, choruses, concerted pieces of a construction so simple, a harmony so new, so picturesque, so natural, those admirable modulations which are born from the development of the idea whose form they vivify, and which are not the cold artifice of an impotence which changes a key because it cannot change the theme. When a great dramatic composition can undergo this ordeal of pure art with impunity, and after having moved the crowd assembled in the theatre, retain sufficient internal vitality to charm the individual connoisseur, and everywhere spreads the sentiment which animates it, it is the indelible mark of a great work. Joseph of Méhul, La Dame Blanche, Le Pré aux Clercs, Zampa, Le Domino Noir, Fra Diavolo and almost all the ingenious and piquant labors of M. Auber, are in different degrees, musical compositions sufficiently pure and vivacious to exist without the prestige of representation. Dramatic truth, of which people are so jealous now-a-days, is after all only a qualification in lyric drama secondary to beauty, abundance and originality of purely musical ideas, which alone classify and consecrate great works. I once knew a professor of music who read the holy fathers of the church and the Somme of Saint Thomas to make the fools and demi-connoisseurs believe that he drew thence the inspiration necessary for his high mission. If he had known his business, he would never have had recourse to such stratagems. Let us be certain then: to create great works in the arts and in poetry it is not absolutely necessary to know how to read the Mechanique Celeste of Laplace; it is sufficient to possess the genius of Mozart, of Weber, or of Rossini.

An Hour with Meyerbeer.

HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND HIS VIEWS OF AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

(Correspondence of the Evening Post.)
MEYERBEER'S REPUTATION.

BERLIN, June, 1861.

The distinguished composer of the "Huguenots" has occupied a prominent position in the musical world for so long a time that his name and reputation are beginning to savor of the traditional past, while, at the same, in the composition of his later works, he manifests all the vigor and activity of the actual present. The last generation were quite as much delighted as is the rising one with "Robert le Diable," and the newspapers and magazines of a quarter of a century ago talk with fond enthusiasm of the great singers who in their day took part in its performance, and who now are either dead and buried, or have retired from the stage to a life of private obscurity. Who has not heard of the effects produced by Levasseur, when he played Bertram? and even Jenny Lind's first appearance as Alice at London dates back some fourteen years. Rossini, also, though still living, enjoys a traditional reputation, for with his operas are associated the names of such artists as Rubini, Lablache, Persiani, Pasta and Malibran, all of whom belonging to a time which has passed away. Indeed, at so early an age do real musical geniuses begin to develop their powers and to reap their harvest of fame, that it seems difficult to remember that neither Meyerbeer nor Rossini can be now really called old men, and that Bellini and Donizetti, had they not died so young, would at this day have been but little past the prime of life, with their eyes undimmed and their natural force unabated.

MEYERBEER'S COMPOSITIONS.

But while the gentle author of "La Sonnambula" and the delicate composer of "Lucia" have left only their works and their memories, and while the swan of "Pesaro" has for many years ceased to put music on paper, the industrious man to whom we owe "Robert" and the "Prophete" continues to work steadily and faithfully. He is not a rapid composer. While an Italian would write fifty, Meyerbeer would write but one opera—spending, for instance, eight years on the "Prophete." But then how noble has been the result of this plodding toil! Meyerbeer has not written a single weak opera. Every one, though different in outline and coloring, is a noble monument to his genius; and while each is in itself too complete a work to be heard to advantage in any other state than that of perfect completeness, yet the gems which best bear to be detached are models in their way. What more touching than the Ah mon fils—what more inspiring than the Coronation March of the Prophete? What more majestic than the old Chorale, more quaint than the Piff-paff, or more thrilling than the Valentine and Raoul duet in the "Huguenots"? What air has been oftener sung by cultivated artists than the famous Robert toi que j'aime, and what concerted piece is more effective than the concluding trio of "Robert le Diable"? And "L'Etoile du Nord," though less generally known, is replete with delicious melodies, both of the andante and bravura styles. These are all, in every sense of the word, grand operas; and after they have brought the composer, it might be said, almost an immortality of fame, lo! he turns away from the monarchs and splendors of these themes to take up a libretto of the loves of simple shepherds and weaves about it the delicious music of the "Pardon de Ploermel."

HIS RESIDENCE.

With such a man as the creator of all these merceux it would be indeed a privilege to have a personal acquaintance; and I gladly availed myself, while in Berlin recently, of an opportunity of calling on Meyerbeer, especially as he had honored me with his card of private invitation. As is usual abroad with even the wealthiest, he occupies a suite of rooms and not a whole house. The mansion—an elegant and princely one—like all the larger residences in the Prussian capital, is at the open piazza at the end of the Unter-den-Linden, and is the second house from the magnificent Brandenbourg Gate, through which the Berliners reach their large public park, which lies just outside the city walls. Meyerbeer's rooms are on what we would call the third, but what is known in European houses as the second story. There is no name on the lower door, but affixed to the wall at the foot of the third flight of stairs is a porcelain plate bearing in neat letters the one word "Meyerbeer."

A ring of the bell brought to the door a neat German maid-servant, who took my card to her master, quickly returning to usher me in. Passing through a long dark entry I was shown into a well-furnished square apartment, and welcomed in French by a small man apparently about sixty years old, of Jewish features, round stooping shoulders and green spectacles. It was Meyerbeer.

HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE.

If not an Adonis in appearance, I found him to be—what is after all much more agreeable—a perfect gentleman. He showed no assumption of condescension, no haughtiness of manner, no affectation of eccentricity—nothing which would intimate that his natural simplicity and geniality had been at all affected by the praises which have for so many years been ringing in his ears. After the usual salutations were over Meyerbeer began to speak with interest of affair in the United States. Like most Europeans, his sympathies were with the North in the dreaded struggle; he heartily expressed his regret that difficulties had occurred, and that the land which was to liberal Europe at once the type and realization of national liberty, should be the scene of fraternal discord and bloody warfare. From this was the conversation turned upon musical affairs in our country, in regard to which, indeed, I found Meyerbeer not as well informed as might have been expected. He at first remembered only the name of Maretzek among the laborers in our musical vineyard.

MEYERBEER ON AMERICAN COMPOSERS.

"And was there not a Monsieur Free?" he added soon, "who wrote some operas?"

"You mean, I suppose, William H. Fry?"

"Oui, c'est le même. Is he living yet?"

"Yes, he is alive. Turned his attention some time ago to politics; became a popular stump orator, and is now the Secretary to the American Legation at Turin."

"Ah! Then he don't compose any more. Who is your best American composer now?"

"Well, I suppose Mr. Bristow must have the palm."

"Who do you say—Breestau? Is he a German?"

"No, an American—George W. Bristow." And after I had said this Meyerbeer repeated the name several times, as if to get it by heart.

"He has written several oratorios," I added, "and an English opera, 'Rip Van Winkle,' which has been performed in New York."

"Is the plot from Washington Irving's story?" asked Meyerbeer, and the reply being in the affirmative, he added: "I know well Monsieur Irving. He was a most amiable and delightful man. He called on me once in Paris, and I also met him a long time ago in Spain. But he is dead. Then there is another American novelist, whom I have only known through his works—I mean Cooper. Is he living yet?"

HIS VIEWS OF AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

This question being answered, and the interlocutor duly informed as to the facts of the case, the conversation suddenly turned again to political affairs, and Meyerbeer asked with much curiosity about President Lincoln and his antecedents. The brief biography I gave of the rail-splitter, and especially the fact that he had risen from the position of a flatboatman to that of President, seemed to greatly interest the composer. "Quell energie!" he said admiringly.

Then followed some shrewd inquiries as to the existence of a copyright law in America, and the rights of American publishers to print foreign music without paying the author. He was not aware that his "Diinorah" had been published in Boston, but had heard of its performance in New Orleans, and of the success of Adelina Patti therein. "Is this Patti a fine singer?" he asked, and my next duty was to give a history of this charming young prima donna, who was at that time singing with great clat at the Covent Garden theatre, London. Then came questioning as to the European singers who had visited America. Carl Formes had personally given him some account of his experience there, and as other singers who had crossed the ocean were mentioned, Meyerbeer expressed his opinion of their merits. La Grange he deemed an almost unsurpassed vocalist, a careful actress and a perfect lady. Bosio was finished and elegant, but so cold! Alboni's superiority as a contralto was readily acknowledged, and others were pleasantly spoken of, while Frau Lucca, the then reigning favorite at the Berlin Opera-House, came in for a share of his kindly appreciation. He then invited me into the next room, a long apartment with four windows looking on the street front. In the centre, on a platform raised at least a foot above the floor, stood a grand piano open and strewn with sheets of music. Directly over the key-board, yet leaving plenty of space to play on the keys, was arranged an odd little desk, on which lay an inkstand, pens and unfinished manuscript music. This was Meyerbeer's work-bench; here he composed his great works, while the unfinished manuscript I saw was part of a cantata for the next grand concert to be given before the Prussian Court.

HIS LIBRARY, ETC.

He opened his musical library, which occupied one end of the room, and showed me its contents, consisting principally of various editions of his own works, while on the upper shelves were a number of bundles tied up in brown paper.

"Those," said he, pointing at the bundles, "are my compositions which have never been printed—cantatas, operas, and oratorios."

"But I hope they will be printed soon."

"I don't know," he answered; "ça depend;" and with a French shrug of his shoulders he closed the doors of the library and showed me the pictures, chiefly portraits of musical celebrities, which adorned the walls of the room. Before the portrait of Sontag he lingered with delight. "Here," said he, "is the singer of the century—poor Sontag, who died in Mexico." Of Jenny Lind he also spoke very highly, as of Roger, Liszt, and Thalberg. Donizetti and Bellini he had known personally, and seemed to hold them in deep regard, both as men and as musicians. And so with pleasant chat the moments glided away, until I rose to leave, unwilling to depart, but not wishing to trespass on the time of my distinguished host. A warm invitation to visit him again, and counsel to come to Berlin in the winter, when the musical season was at its height, closed an interview so agreeable to me.

Meyerbeer is the Kapellmeister to the King of Prussia, and in virtue of that office is obliged to live about six months of the year in Berlin; but he prefers Paris, and passes most of his time there. Wherever he goes, in refined society he is welcome; for besides that interest which all must feel in the personality of the individual who has given to the world those marvellous works—the Prophete, the Huguenots, Robert le Diable, L'Etoile du Nord and Diinorah—Meyerbeer renders himself attractive by his sprightly conversation and his unaffected and agreeable manners.

Criticism.

"For the sake, or rather for the purses, of the artists in Paris, M. Fiorentino, the well-known writer of the Moniteur and the Constitutionnel, has been discharged by Count Persigny. It is said that this man drew every year some twenty thousand dollars from the 'celebrities' in Paris."

We cut the above from the Boston Post. It is a text from which some sage conclusions may be drawn regarding the calibre and the value of French criticism. Here is a man who is the so-called critic of two leading journals of Paris. He stands with his pen in one hand, while the itching palm of the other is spread to catch the black mail of the poor artists who are seeking fame and fortune. The Moniteur and the Constitutionnel will have a so-called critique on these artists. Will it be the opinion of a well-balanced mind; the impartial sentence of a clear headed judge? No! It will be a glowing puff or a deprecatory trifle, in proportion to the golden titillation of that outspread palm.

We hear foreigners in this country boast of the educated critics of the continental papers, while our thinkers and writers are spoken of with contempt. We know from the flippant arrogance of some English journals, and the utter silence of Parisian journals, that American criticism is thought to be worthless. But while the principal journals of Paris are supplied by so-called critiques, which are merely the boughten puffs of a mercenary stipendiary, American journals, as a whole, contain the real, honest, thoughtful judgment of the writers who treat of music. They may, at times, show unfamiliarity, sometimes a venial writer may prostitute his pen to vulgar flattery or undeserved blame, some obscure journal may be the vehicle of vulgar pomposity; but it is certainly true that the leading journals of America are, as a whole, the exponents of a straight forward, honest, hearty, manly criticism. We have looked over many foreign journals, to find matter for our own, that might bear translation, and have been surprised at the lack of descriptive criticism which they show. When we read that one of the principal critics of the principal European city is a black mail writer, who fleeces the artists that fall into his hands, and puffs for pay, we may well doubt the value of Paris criticism, and be better impressed with the sincerity of what emanates from America.—Boston Musical Times.

Editorial Correspondence.

No. XIX.

London, July 22.

Speaking of the concerts, it will not do to omit the old PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, now that we have spoken of the "New." A famous lighthouse in the distance has that been for many a by-gone year to the poor Yankee all afloat in vague, unsatisfied musical wants, and longing for such terra firma as he read in English journals of those "Philharmonic" feasts, with their two whole Symphonies each night, their Concertos, Overtures, and extracts from great operas by great singers. The old Society played an important and most useful part in its day, and great was the prestige thereof, year after year and decade after decade, while it stood (to speakers of the English tongue), alone in its glory. It has had Symphonies composed for it by some of the greatest masters in music; the Die majores of the German Olympus have courted inspiration to its order, and some of their best things have been first produced before a public in its halls. But now, since rival organizations have sprung up—one, two, perhaps we should say three; now that the "New Philharmonic" has hardened into bone and sinew by annual persistency, and the young "Musical Society of London" takes such formidable strides (many say that its orchestra is the best of all—I have not been to one of its concerts, but only to its very sociable and pleasant and æsthetic "Conversazione"); now that there is a "Musical Art Union" too, which has its orchestra, and which plays Schumann as well as "the old fogies," thus having an eye, shrewdly or not, to "the Future," it is no longer the Philharmonic by the undivided vote, and enjoys the distinction of being (among the critics of the Press) the best abused Society in London. Yet certainly, to judge from its last concert, that of June 24, it seems to hold its own quite well. The only thing about it which I could have wished much better was the rather small and gloomy looking hall in which it was held. Hanover Square Rooms are fashionable, and have perhaps to the habitué a charm, in that the scent of the roses (of past musical languets) lingers there still; but they are not to be compared for light and beauty to St. James's Hall, and cannot hold half as many people as the Boston Music Hall. There was no sign of flagging interest; on the contrary, an eager audience, crowding the room to the doors; a fashionable one too—is not the Society "under the immediate patronage of Her Majesty and of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort?" The programme, too, was a fine one, made up of things that never can cease to be good, if it did lack the interest of novelty; the conductor was no less a person than "Professor STERNDALE BENNETT, Mus. Doc."; the performances were all of sterling merit; and a venerable coryphæus among classical pianists and composers, on a visit from Germany among the scenes and comrades of his old labors, had come to pay a tribute to the old Society, in which he had played a distinguished part, by performing one of his most important compositions, as well as to receive a most enthusiastic tribute in return—and this perhaps was one chief secret of the eager crowd that night. For the programme, here it is:

PART I.

Sinfonia (La Reine de France).....Haydn
Aria, Signora Guerrabella. "Bel raggio" (Semiramide).....Benedict
Concerto, violin, Herr Strauss.....Beethoven
Recit., ("La Dea di tutti i cor") } Mr Teonant, (Jigjura-
Aria, ("Belle adorata incognita") } mento.....Mercadante Concerto in G minor, pianoforte, Mr. Moscheles.....Moscheles

PART II.

Sinfonia in C minor.....Beethoven.
Duetto, ("La ci daran") Signora Guerrabella and Signor
Steller (Don Giovanni).....Mozart
Overture (Jubilee).....Weber

The Symphonies were finely played; although the glorious C minor was certainly not up to the incomparable performance of it which I had heard at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. Beethoven's great violin Concerto would be a capital feature in any concert; the execution was rather too mechanical, but firm, accurate and true; the player's two cadenzas were more elaborate than happy. The singing does not leave a vivid impression; so that it was probably neither very bad nor very good. Naturally the climax of interest with the audience was the appearance of the veteran Moscheles. It is sixteen years since he assumed his present important post in the Conservatorium at Leipzig, after a residence of more than a quarter of a century in London, where he had done much for the Philharmonic Society, much to build up a sound classical taste in England. His influence upon the whole history of pianoforte music since the time of Beethoven, has been perhaps as great as that of any man. While he has been one of the foremost interpreters of Beethoven, while he has composed Concertos, Sonatas, the "Hommage à Handel," and such solid things, he is also called with truth the real originator of the "bravura" or "fantasia" style, which has run away with so many famous virtuosos, and run out, leaving their fame nothing lasting to repose on,—nothing like, for instance, this Concerto in G minor, in the interpretation of which the old master seemed that evening to renew his youth. Certainly the beauty and perfection of his playing were astonishing and might have been the despair of many a younger virtuoso of the highest pretensions, not that the thing was mechanically as whole as it might once have been; that there were no threadbare places; that nerve and muscle quite kept pace with clear conception, and never dropped a note. But in elegance and fineness of expression, in all the lights and shades, in the lending of exquisite point and finish to the least details, so as to make all significant, it was wonderful; and there was an animating life and spirit in the whole, as if we had the master in one of his best hours. The composition indeed was not that of a Beethoven, a Mozart, a Mendelssohn, or a Chopin, in point of imaginative genius; the orchestra played but a secondary and comparatively uninteresting part in it; yet it had great beauties and was a work worthy of a place in a Philharmonic concert. The old man is still young in his musical enthusiasm; still the kind friend and adviser of young men who have the will and talent to be artists; still active in composing. He too has been full of Bach of late, and played to me in Leipzig quite a number of pieces for two pianos (with his laughter), in which he had been marrying a modern piano part, sometimes a melody, sometimes in concertante character, to Preludes from the "Well-tempered Clavichord." One may condemn the match-making but he could hardly deny the beauty and the harmony of the result, at least in several instances. May I recall, too, here the satisfaction of a private reading which he gave to me one morning of several of the Sonatas of Beethoven? They were played with the heart and with the understanding, you may be quite sure.

The old "Philharmonic," thanks in great degree to Professor Bennett, seems to be lifting up its head, and is already preparing to make a great point twelve months hence. "It is intended," says the programme, "to mark the year 1862 as a peculiar epoch in the annals of the Philharmonic Society, that year being its fiftieth anniversary. The jubilee will be distinguished by offering to the subscribers, after the eighth concert, a complimentary concert, to be held in a locality adapted to the performance, on a large scale, of the colossal works written expressly for the Society by Beethoven, Spohr, Mendelssohn, and other great composers. Sterndale Bennett, at the request of the Society, will compose a large work for the occasion.

At the second concert of the MUSICAL ART UNION—also in Hanover Square Rooms—I arrived too late for what to me would have been the greatest novelty of the programme—a "revival" the critics call it—the Overture, or Suite de pièces for orchestra, in D, by J. S. Bach; too late for "Natti, batti" sung by a Signorina who might fill as large a frame as Alboni; and even too late for the first bars of a Concerto in A minor (Op. 54) by Robert Schumann, in which the prominent part (pianoforte) was very finely played by Herr Pauer. The work is rich in ideas, and interesting to the end. Schumann first wrote it during the year following his marriage, as a Fantasia for piano and orchestra, for his wife to play, and it was printed. In 1845, when settled at Dresden, he extended it into the present Concerto, and dedicated it to Ferdinand Hiller. It was first performed in public by Madame Schumann that same year, and has been played once by her in London, in 1856, the year of her first visit to England, at one of the new Philharmonic Concerts. After another song by Mlle. Parepa (an air from Auber's Serment), the concert closed with a worthy climax to the two fine things already given, by an admirable performance of Beethoven's seventh Symphony only; there was now and then a rudeness on the part of drums or trumpets in overdoing an emphatic phrase. The orchestra numbered about forty of the viol family, and was well conducted by Herr Klindworth. In its third and last concert the Union had a chorus, and performed Cherubini's Requiem and Gade's "Erl King." I was not able to be present.

So much for the orchestral societies. And now for something, more sheltered in a sort of semi-privacy, something in which benevolence conspired with Art, something very choice, and fashionable (though how does that agree with privacy!) The object was to aid the "Society of Female Artists;" the place was Dudley House, "by the obliging permission of the Earl of Dudley," known in the musical world hitherto as Lord Ward; the company, some hundreds of ladies and gentlemen of the distinguished classes, were closely packed in two large rooms (the ball-room and the picture gallery) of the aforesaid mansion. The artists and the programme were as follows:

PART I.

Duo, Theme and Variations, Piano and Violoncello. Mendelssohn
Mezra Goldschmidt and Plattl.
Air, "Without the swain's" (Susanna). Handel
Madame Goldschmidt.
Romance, "M'appari tutt' amor" (Martha). Flotow
Sig. Giuglini.
Ave Maria of Schubert, transcribed for the Violoncello.
b. Tarentella. Violoncello, Signor Plattl.
Rondo for Voice and Violin Obligato, from "Il re Pastore" Mozart
Madame Goldschmidt and Herr Deichmann.

PART II.

Duet, "Son geloso" (La Sonnambula). Bellini
Madame Goldschmidt and Sig. Giuglini.
a. Romance. (Don Pasquale). b. "Bravo, bravo! Il mio Belcore!" (L'Elisir d'Amore). Donizetti Sig. Pelletti.
Gavotte and Minuet (dances) and Allegro. J. S. Bach
Pianoforte—Mr. Goldschmidt.
Trio, "Fatal moments" (Robert le Diable). Meyerbeer
Mlle. Goldschmidt, Signor Pelletti and Giuglini.
Cradle Song. Reber
Violin—Herr Deichmann.
a. "John Anderson, my Jo". Scotch Ballad
b. Echo Song. Norwegian Melody
Madame Goldschmidt.

It was in fact "Jenny Lind's" concert. The great songstress had chosen this occasion to make renewed trial of her powers before a public for the first time after a long seclusion. And the result was so satisfactory as to inspire a general wish, amounting almost to a hope, that she may yet resume her throne as Queen of Song; for surely there is no one who could dispute it with her; no one who could radiate or rather vibrate a purer and more quickening influence from that tuneful eminence. Ten years, of course, with their domestic duties, have not left the outward person wholly unchanged; but the same soul, ever young, lit up the face in song; as she sang on she became the Muse, as formerly. When she began, I thought the voice had grown a little worn and hard (it always had to struggle for a moment through a slight veil; but its intrinsic richness and all-conquering beauty made it the more interesting on that account). And so now all doubt of that sort vanished as she went on, and that pensive, moralizing strain of Handel sank most deeply and most musically into the listening sense and soul. In the Mozart Rondo all the old brilliancy and triumph of execution, voice vying with instrument, and adding the grace of soul to every passage, was completely felt. And there was the same warmth and tenderness, the same lyric fervor and chaste pathos in the Bellini Duet and the Trio from Robert. I heard but one remark on all sides—and the critics echoed it the next day, even the sceptical ones of old—to wit: that the great singer never seemed in better, fresher voice, never in fuller possession of her powers and that she never sang better in her life I would hardly dare to assert all this, charmed as I was with all the rest, for genius has a way always of making you grant all and more too. Genius, after all, is the main thing, and, having that, "all these things shall be added;" that is to say, feeling the genius, the soul, the artist's real "righteousness," you forget to miss or measure what may possibly be wanting; and that is heaven's economy, which lets us enjoy the heart of the matter, and saves us the slow pain of criticism, and, Ariel-like, eludes its dullness.

A glance at the programme will show how harmoniously and worthily the accessories were grouped about the central attraction of the concert. Mr. Mr. Goldschmidt played the variations by Mendelssohn and those dainty things of Bach with true artistic feeling and precision. The cello and the violin were admirable. Giuglini is one of the most pleasing of the tenor singers; and our readers know already what Belletti is, since he is all he was. A word only of the conclusion, the two old songs in which Mme. Goldschmidt used to be so popular—"John Anderson" and the Norwegian herdsman's "Echo." Here she seemed more than ever herself. The simple, searching pathos of the one, the mountain air elasticity and freshness of the other, revived completely the old charm. Musically these are hacknied, unconsidered trifles; but with such a singer they become alive and full of meaning. One could not help thinking of Mendelssohn's "Nightingale" in the part-song:

The nightingale has been away,
But spring again invites her;
She has not learned another lay,
Her old song still delights her.

The last line applies better than the third one; for this nightingale learns all new lays, when they are worth the learning. D.

Musical Chit-Chat.

A writer in the Vienna Musik Zeitung, which city has of late shown a great partiality for the works of Schumann—solemnly protests against the practice of the Music-of-the-future party of placing Liszt in the same category with Schumann. "The only similarity which exists between the works of the two composers, is the strangeness with which they fall upon the ear of the great public. The works of the one show but an eternal striving and seeking for what the other had in abundance. Musical Young Germany tries to get the public into worshipping its king and master, Liszt, by familiarizing it with Schumann,—whom to understand and properly to appreciate they reserve the exclusive right to themselves, just as, not very long ago, a lot of Beethoven-enthusiasts used to sneer at everybody outside of their coterie who dared to enjoy the compositions of their idol in his own way. But the Young-Germans omit to speak of a something which, for a long while yet, nobody will accustom himself to, that is, the power of impotence—as a Frenchman has called it—apparent in Liszt's works."

CHURCH BELLS.—In childhood the church bells used to make us melancholy. They have not that effect now. The reason we take to be, that they sounded to us then from the remote regions of the whole world out of doors, and of all the untried hopes, and fears, and destinies which they contained. We have since known them more familiarly, and our regard is greater and even more serious, though mixed with cheerfulness, and is not at all melancholy, except when the bell tolls for a funeral; which custom by the way, is a nuisance, and ought to be abolished, if only out of consideration for the sick and sorrowful. One of the reasons why church bells have become cheerful to us, is the having been accustomed to hear them among the cheerful people of Tuscany. In Catholic countries bells are ringing at all seasons, not always to the comfort of those who hear them; but the custom has associated them in our mind with sunshine and good nature. We also like them on account of their frequency in colleges. Finally, they remind us of weddings and other holidays; and there is one particular little jingle in some of them, which brings to our memory the walking to church by the side of a parent, and is very dear to us.—L. Hunt.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

July 18.—This week the Prophète is produced, and as I told you, Mad. Viardot is to play Fides, in which part she will appear some half dozen times previous to making her debut in Alceste, which is not to be produced until the 15th of next month. Mean while we are promised two new singers. One a robust tenor, M. Dulaurens, who erewhile was a slender tenor at the Théâtre Lyrique. He will make his debut in Robert le Diable. The other is M. Ecarlat, a medium tenor—tenore di mezzo carattere—who effects his plunge in La Favorite. These accessions will fill up the void left by the absence of M. and Mad. Gueymard, who take their congé next month.

The Opéra Comique has again engaged M. Roger for a series of performances, and he made his appearance last week as Georges in La Dame Blanche. His reception was, of course, that of an old favorite, and one who had not yet outlived his power of pleasing. Les Noces de Jeannette is in rehearsal for Mlle. Marimon and M. Coudere; and so is the Poniatowskian operetta, Au Travers d'un Mur.

The Théâtre Lyrique, I think I have already mentioned, will open with a new opera by M. Grisar, the book of which is due to the joint authorship of MM. Dumanoir and Denney. Such a trio ought to brew something worth tipping. After this novelty, the manager promises The Templars, by Marschner.

The Académie des Beaux Arts has been awarding its prizes for musical composition. The first grand prize was carried off by M. Dubois, a pupil of MM. Ambroise Thomas and Bazin. The second grand prize was adjudged to M. Salome, a pupil of the same brace of successful preceptors; and yet another second grand prize was awarded to M. Anthoine, who derived his instruction from MM. Carafa and Elwart. One Titus Charles Constantin, a pupil of M. Thomas, came off with an honorable mention. The cantata which gained for M. Dubois his prize was executed by Mlle. Monrose and MM. Wurot and Bataille. By a statement in the papers, it would appear that the successful candidate, shortly after entering himself for the composition, was seized with an attack of small-pox; and thus he may be said to have been pitted against his rivals in a double sense. As we are on the subject of musical honors, let me notice a curious one conferred on a German musician M. Robert Franck, director of music to the University of Halle. He has had conferred upon him the degree of "Doctor of Philosophy." The grounds upon which he has been thus dubbed are his talent as a composer and his zeal in propagating the music of Bach. What this has to do with philosophy is more than lies in mine to divine; but German philosophy embraces heaven and earth and all that in them is. It puts me in mind of a similarly inscrutable compliment paid to Franz Liszt, to whom a "sword of honor" was presented. But the lion pianist being a bit of a bashaw, there was some little appropriateness in giving him a scimitar to hang by his side.

Berlin.

The principal subjects of interest at the Royal Opera-house, since my last letter to you, have been the farewell performance of Mad. Köster, as Julia; the reappearance of Mad. Herrenburg, after a long absence, as Endora; and the appearance of Mlle. Lucca, as Recha and Leonora (Il Trovatore). These events have given a fillip to the apathy in which the theatre-going public have been plunged by the heat which has lately prevailed here.

The part of Recha, as the Berliners call it, in Halévy's Juive, is one of the most difficult which Mlle. Lucca has hitherto attempted. Only an artist of great vocal and dramatic ability can, in my humble opinion, render the character an effective one, while persons of moderate talent can do no more than evolve a few isolated "points" out of the numerous difficulties with which the part is so plentifully interspersed. Mlle. Lucca, however, achieved a triumph, and realized the intentions of the composer with something approaching inspiration. Mad. Herrenburg sang the music of Endora with her usual correctness and finish, setting a brilliant example to the many young and fine aspirants for operatic fame who have just now commenced their arduous career. Herr Formes was an excellent Eleazar, although laboring under indisposition; this prevented his impersonation from coming up to his customary standard. The gem of the opera was the concerted music in the second act, admirably sung by Mad. Herrenburg, Mlle. Lucca, Herren Formes and Krüger. Herr Fricke made an imposing Cardinal. A word of praise is due also to the chorus, the ballet, and the orchestra.

Before taking a temporary leave of the public, previous to her annual holiday, Mad. Köster sang the part of Julia in Spontini's chef d'œuvre Die Vestalin. This part is generally acknowledged to be the best in her classical repertory, and, as such, is always sure of attracting a good audience. Her impersonation is particularly distinguished for its great dignity and warmth of feeling, which are really inimitable. She is especially happy in those portions of the work which bear the impress of a sort of elegiac tenderness; for instance, in the air, "Dich soll ich wieder sehen," and again in that of the third act, "Du den ich trost los hier verlassen," the dramatic vigor and passion she infuses into the second are more than ordinarily remarkable. She was vociferously applauded and called before the curtain. Mlle. de Ahna was the high priestess. The part of Licinius was entrusted to a young beginner, Herr Schäfer. He has still far too much of an amateur about him to be judged by the standard of criticism we apply to more experienced artists, but he gave unmistakable proof of possessing a fine and very high tenor voice, which, as yet, he is unable to turn to the best account. He was the most successful in the third act, and was rewarded by encouraging applause. The other principal parts, namely those of Cianna and the High Priest were played respectively by Herren Kranse and Fricke.

Despite all the opposition it has met with on the part of the critics, Verdi's Trovatore has become a stock opera, and takes a good position among the productions of the Italian school. It certainly deserves that position when it is given with such spirit and perfect finish as marked its performance on the 2nd inst., and which, probably, could with difficulty be surpassed on the German stage. Mlle. Lucca was the Leonora. She was admirable throughout, more especially in the finale of the second act. Mlle. de Ahna was in every respect an Azucena worthy of the Leonora. The other parts were well given. The chorus was irreproachable, and the orchestra did its duty valiantly under the direction of Herr Taubert.

MUSIC IN CONNECTION WITH THE EXHIBITION OF 1862.—It excited much surprise among that portion of the public—no inconsiderable one—who take an interest in the state of music in this country, that, in the arrangements for the great Exhibition of 1861, designed to forward the progress of the arts throughout the world, the art of music was altogether ignored; for we cannot consider the distribution of prizes to the manufacturers of pianofortes, &c., among other industrial classes, as any recognition of music as an art. And yet, as is now universally acknowledged, there are few (if any) arts which have a greater or more direct influence on the welfare and happiness of society.

We have received a communication from which it appears that an important measure is contemplated for rendering the exhibition of next year conducive to the interests of music. A circular, in the following terms, has been addressed to the principal choral societies and other musical institutions:

"I write to inform you that several gentlemen connected with music are making arrangements for building an international concert room at Kensington, for the display of music during the forthcoming Exhibition of 1862. They are of opinion that such an opportunity ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed by the musical profession, but that an effort should be made to bring before the public the different styles of English and Continental music. Every care and attention will be showed on the construction of the building to make it peculiarly adapted for musical performances, and also in the preparation of the concerts, that they shall be of the highest class; and to prevent interference with existing interests, it is contemplated that the concerts shall take place between the hours of four and seven o'clock in the afternoon. The undertaking will be entirely of an international character; the Continental societies will be invited to co-operate. The profits of the undertaking will be devoted to the furtherance of music. The building will be of a temporary character, and afford accommodation for an audience of 12,000, and the orchestra 500 performers; this, if necessary, on certain occasions, could be enlarged when an increased number of performers are required. The necessary capital will be raised by means of a guarantee fund, each guarantee to receive a certain amount in tickets for the performances.

Such are the leading features of the scheme, and as we are preparing the programme of the concerts which are to take place, would feel obliged if you would kindly favor us with your opinion respecting the same, also whether we can depend on the support of your society, in arranging to give one or more performances, subject to such conditions as may hereafter be agreed on."

The matter being thus brought under the consideration of the parties whom it most immediately concerns, and who may be presumed to be the most competent to judge of the expediency and practicability of the proposed measure, of course its promoters must be governed, in their further proceedings, by the nature and amount of the encouragement, advice, and assistance, that they may receive.

In the meantime an application has been made to her Majesty's Commissioners for the use of the vacant site at the back of the Royal Horticultural Society's Gardens, and plans of the proposed Concert Room have been submitted. We may add, that the character of the eminent individuals concerned (whose names, doubtless, will speedily be made public) gives full assurance of the purely artistic nature of their views; and we look with much interest for further information on the subject.—London Daily News, July 22.

BASEL.—A performance of J. S. Bach's Johannes-Passion was lately given here. It was not only the first performance in Basel itself, but the first that had ever been given in Switzerland. The attendance was very great, several of the visitors having even come from Paris, to be present on the occasion. The solo parts were sung by Herr Julius Stockhausen, and K. Schneider (from Wiesbaden), assisted by excellent amateurs, a chorus of 150 voices, and a fine orchestra. Especially praiseworthy was the feeling of veneration for the great composer, which induced the committee to exert themselves to the utmost in order to restore such instruments as the "viola d'amore," etc., in use in Bach's days, but now fallen into desuetude. The rehearsals for the performance were going on for six months previously, and the highest praise is due to Herr E. Reiter for the energy and untiring perseverance he displayed during the entire proceedings, as well as to Herr Rippenbach-Stehlin, a perfect Mæcenas of music, for the great liberality with which he enabled the Committee to meet the exceedingly heavy expenses they had incurred. Indeed, had it not been for this gentleman's assistance, the performance could not have taken place.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Where are all the young men gone? Song.

J. M. Jolly. 25

A young lady complains in a droll manner how slow and dull the time passes since the young men have taken so much to soldiering, and that the time formerly spent in their company is now employed in drill-clubs and parading. The music is spirited and well suits the words.

Oh! if I had some one to love me! Song and Chorus.

Fred. Buckley. 25

A new melody by this favorite writer. In London, where the author is at the head of a highly successful establishment devoted to Ethiopian Concerts, this Song is nightly called for.

The Volunteer's wife. Song and Chorus.

Fred. K. Pease. 25

Fine and brave words which many a wife left behind by our volunteers will heartily subscribe to. Combined with the music which is excellent they are truly touching and the Chorus with its bold ending cannot fail to inspire the hearer.

Mary Bell. Song and Chorus. G. F. Benkert. 25

A melodious little song in the popular style. Quartette Clubs with a good Solo Tenor will find it taking with the public.

Instrumental Music.

Glory Hallelujah Quickstep. J. W. Turner. 25

An easy piece introducing the popular refrain in a striking manner.

The Captain. Varied. C. Grobe. 25

One of Mrs. Florence's popular songs. The air, in March-time, makes a very pleasing piece. It is arranged for beginners, and a number of the "Melodies of the day" sort.

Early morning Galop. J. Smalley. 25

Very lively, with a chorus ad libitum in the Trio, somewhat similar to the one in D'Albert's Nightbell Galop. For the Orchestra it is one of the most effective pieces of the kind.

Heart's Ease. Waltz a la Tyrolienne.

Carl Faust. 35

By a new composer of Dance Music, a German, of late a resident of London, whose charming Polkas and dashing Galops have become staple articles in transatlantic Ball-rooms. A Polka-Mazurka of his, the "Violetta," is perhaps the prettiest piece of music ever written to the measure of this lovely dance. All his melodies are graceful and striking.

Books.

THE UNION STAR.—A collection of Operatic Choruses, Glee, Quartetts, &c., for the use of Conventions, Schools, Clubs and the Social Circle. Edited by B. F. Baker and W. O. Perkins. 50

This new glee book contains all the favorites; on this account and the low price at which it is sold it is an exceedingly desirable publication for musical conventions and schools. An advertisement in another column of this paper will inform our readers of its contents. It has been compiled with much care and will prove a fine acquisition to the collections of Societies and of amateurs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

"Not Yet."

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

O country, marvel of the earth !
O realm to sudden greatness grown !
The age that gloried in thy birth,
Shall it behold thee overthrown ?
Shall traitors lay that greatness low ;
No, Land of Hope and Blessing, No !

And we who wear thy glorious name,
Shall we, like cravens, stand apart,
When those whom thou hast trusted aim
The death-blow at thy generous heart ?
Forth goes the battle-cry, and lo !
Hosts rise in harness, shouting, No !

And they who founded, in our land,
The power that rules from sea to sea,
Bled they in vain, or vainly planned
To leave their country great and free ?
Their sleeping ashes, from below,
Send up the thrilling murmur, No !

Knit they the gentle ties which long
These sister States were proud to wear,
And forged the kindly links so strong
For idle hands in sport to tear —
For scornful hands aside to throw ?
No, by our fathers' memory, No !

Our humming marts, our iron ways,
Our wind-tossed woods on mountain crest,
The hoarse Atlantic, with his bays,
The calm, broad Ocean of the West,
And Mississippi's torrent-flow,
And loud Niagara, answer, No !

Not yet the hour is nigh, when they
Who deep in Eld's dim twilight sit,
Earth's ancient kings, shall rise and say,
"Proud country welcome to the pit !
So soon art thou, like us, brought low ?"
No, sullen group of shadows, No !

For now, behold, the arm that gave
The victory in our fathers' day,
Strong, as of old, to guard and save —
That mighty arm which none can stay —
On clouds above and fields below,
Writes, in men's sight, the answer, No !

The Diarist in London.

April 12. The Sacred Harmonic Society, is, like the Sing Akademie, of Berlin, a model Society. Its members love good music, and study it regardless of the question of dollars and cents. Whatever there is of greatest and most profound — that which is rarely to be heard and is above the popular comprehension — this they seek out and give it that thorough study which leads to perfection of execution. Hence, knowing that its performance would end in a loss of a thousand dollars to the Society, they gave on this evening, Beethoven's great second Mass, or, as they call it, "Grand Service in D." I have already recorded, in former years, the intense feelings of excitement aroused by this work. Nor has its power diminished upon new hearings. There is a colossal breadth of effect in it nowhere to my mind equaled save in Handel's works. That all the parts, especially those where the solo singers are heard, are beautiful music, or even fully satisfactory to the ear, that one does not feel here and there that the effect cannot be what Beethoven intended, that the deaf man has not written agreeably for the voice, these things I will not assert. But there are spots on the sun. The sun does give light and heat, it does vivify all nature, it is the highest of which we can conceive in glory and radiance. So whatever faults the critics point out and prove to me do exist (in their opinions) in Beethoven's Mass. Still, when I listen to it, and imagine myself in some vast cathedral, throwing myself for the time being into a state of sympathy with the devout Roman Catholic, and so in my mind's ear hear the services at the altar between the various movements of the musical service, put myself, in short, into the frame of mind and position, which Beethoven necessarily had in view, ah, then, this work rises to a height of grandeur, vastness, and power, of which words can give no conception. It works upon the feelings until such a choking sensation rises, that one rejoices when a pause comes and he can turn away and find relief in chatting with his companion.

The solo singers were Madame Rudersdorf, Mrs. Sainton-Dolby, Messrs. Sims Reeves and Thomas. An ungrateful task it was indeed for them, but one grandly performed. I doubt if ever the work was so heard as from that mighty orchestra and chorus, in which its strength lies.

April 15. Monday popular Concert. The principal pieces were the Octett of Mendelssohn, and Spohr's double quartet, E minor, op. 87. No. 3. I have confessed before that I am not up to these works, at all events they afford me little satisfaction, and I think that the amateur portion of the large audience agreed with me.

April 16. Concert in Exeter Hall in aid of the funds of Middlesex Hospital. "Abraham" an oratorio, text from the Old Testament, music by Bernhard Molique, was performed. The style is that of Mendelssohn's Elijah. I found it very uninteresting, and am sure that it is not a work for the Handel and Haydn Society.

April 18. Concert in the smaller St. James's Hall, of six Swiss women and girls, uncultivated voices, but good. Frau Decker-Schenk an immensely deep contralto singer, noteworthy — the leading soprano voice apt to come out at the final chords just enough flat to make one shiver. Still most of the pieces, part songs, were well done and very effective. A comic song, with spoken interludes, in which an Alpine herdsman describes a Berlin, a French, and an English tourist, with their broken German was exceedingly funny, and drew out shouts of laughter from the Teutons present. Fraulein Johanna Clausen, too, gave a very comical description in a song of a bashful lover. Should they come to America, they will be found worth hearing at a "quarter."

April 22. New Philharmonic. The grand features of this concert were a concerto (piano forte) Mozart, C minor, solo played by Charles Hallé, a violin fantasia, Ole Bull, and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, that work, which, according to an American writer, has now been played enough to prove its poverty of idea and its absurdity of construction and is laid upon the shelf forever! What a love for music God must have given that writer. The multitude which crowded St. James' Hall this evening had the folly to find the choral symphony abounding in the most musical thoughts, the most wonderful instrumental combinations and effects, and the choral part transfused with a glorious energy and power, which almost took away the auditor's breath. As this audience was made up of the most highly cultivated musical people of London, the "appreciative" out of these millions of people, the inference is, that some American newspaper writers know things about music which Londoners do not. It went gloriously, though I found fault with the tempos in some parts. The soloists were Miss Parepa, Miss Lascelles, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Signor Belletti.

I intended to give some specimens of the execrable French text which was sung, but cannot find it.

April 23. Mr. Walter Macfarren's Concert. This was one of a series of three concerts "of solo and concerted pianoforte music," to which the prices were, subscription tickets for the three one guinea, single tickets, half a guinea, or three tickets to one concert, one guinea. The performers were, pianoforte, Mr. Macfarren, violin, Mr. Blagrove, cello, Piatti. A Miss Lindley played in a duet for pianoforte with Mr. Macfarren, and Mr. Berger accompanied the songs, sung by Madame Laura Baxter. Of the excellence of the performances nothing need be said, for my experience is, that nothing but the best (of its kind) has any chance of success here and here the kind was good. The programme was very fine, and contained both old and new. First three pianoforte and violin duets by Spohr, which I believe are unknown in our concerts, and therefore I copy Mr. G. A. Macfarren's notice of them.

"Three Duets, op. 127, Allegro, Larghetto, Allegro Moderato. These pieces are chosen from a series of six duets which were first published about the year 1843, when the composer, at 59 years of age, though he had passed the meridian of his greatness, had still a large portion to fulfil of the important labor to which he was destined in the jealous service of his art. It was after this that he produced his quartet concert, his Historical Symphony, and his Symphony of the Seasons, his opera of the "Kruetz-fahrer" and his Sestet for string instruments, all compositions of extensive form, original purpose and careful study; and thus though he never equaled what he had accomplished in his earlier efforts, though from the number of the present work we see that these efforts were of enormous amount, it is clear from the sequel that the powers of the veteran were by no means failing him, but that he was still as full of vigor for his task as of readiness to pursue it. The Duets form a rare example of what is a great desideratum in chamber music namely, a series of concerted pieces of earnest purpose of artistic design and of moderate length. Many are the occasions to which the performance of a work of the extent and elaboration of the Sonata would be inappropriate; and when a piece of the trivial character of those bravura compositions, which have as much use, too, in their way, as they have celebrity, would be wholly uncongenial with the taste of the hearers. For such occasions, the pieces under consideration are eminently valuable. Each of the series is complete in itself, announcing and fully developing its ideas in natural sequence and with perfect symmetry; and though any two or more of them may be played in succession, any one might be given alone, and its effect would be entirely satisfactory. It is difficult to cite any other pieces with which they may consistently be classed; the Lieder ohne Worte of Mendelssohn near perhaps as near an analogy to them as anything that can be named; but Spohr's Duets differ from these—not only in being written for two instruments instead of one—they are both longer and generally of a more brilliant character."

After these duets Mr. Macfarren played these rarely heard variations, for the pianoforte, Beethoven's op. 35, the basis afterwards of the Finale to the Heroic Symphony. It would be hardly modest for me to quote the historical notice from the descriptive programme. Suffice it to say that this work ought to be a stock piece in our own chamber concerts, both for its beauty and its interest historically.

Then came Madame Baxter with that ever new and lovely "Lascia ch'io pianga" of Handel, after which Mr. Macfarren and Miss Lindley gave a specimen of his compositions in a fine andante and Scherzo for four hands.

A trio by Mozart, pianoforte, violin and 'cello in B flat, a song, "By the sad sea waves," a mazurka and saltarello, by Mr. Macfarren and duet, pianoforte, and 'cello in D., op. 58, by Mendelssohn, were the other pieces.

The Concert was in the Hanover Square rooms, and I could hardly be convinced that that small room has been the scene of the Philharmonic triumphs, now for forty-nine years. Real—I cannot see how 800 auditors can crowd in—music of the highest class must indeed have been in London the luxury of the few. When will it be the daily food of the many?

April 25. Another of the exquisite performances of Henry Leslie's choir. All the strong terms in which I have described the first, were warranted by the success on this evening. Mr. Hallé was pianist and played the Kreutzer Sonata with Strauss of Vienna (not the Strauss) but a first class violinist, and two pieces by Chopin to perfection. Strauss played also a lovely notturmo for violin by Ernst.

April 26. Beethoven's great Mass again at Exeter Hall, just as wonderfully done as before perhaps more so if possible.

May 1. To the Crystal Palace—with 13,000 other people (I was there one day, when over 50,000 were present); the attraction to-day was Haydn's "Creation."

But, first, let me quote a passage or two from the preface to the book of words sold (price 25 cents) on the occasion, in which preface by the way are divers very queer errors as to Viennese names and the like.

"Early in the year 1800," says Mr. W. H. H., "the full score of the oratorio was published at at Vienna with a German and English titlepage; the German and English words under the music; [does this imply that our wretched text is one of of Vienna manufacture? One might think so, "on mighty pens instead of wings, for example] and a list of 411 subscribers (nearly one half of whom were English) subscribing for 510 copies, prefixed. Immediately on the publication, Haydn forwarded a copy of the score to his friend Saloman, with a view to the production of the oratorio at his concerts, at which Haydn had brought out during his stay in England his twelve grand Symphonies. Before, however, this copy of the score reached Saloman, another was brought to London by one of the king's messengers, who was a friend of John Ashley, at that time the director of the oratorio performances, which were then given at Covent Garden theatre on the Wednesday and Friday evenings during Lent. This person arrived in London late in the evening of Saturday, the 22d of March, 1800; and Ashley, using the utmost possible speed, procured the parts to be copied and the work rehearsed, and actually had it performed at Covent Garden theatre on the following Friday, 28th of March, 1800, the band and chorus consisting of 120 performers. Produced in such hot haste and with the less perfect executive ability of sixty-one years ago, it is no matter for surprise, that the work was only partially successful. It gained however sufficient reputation to induce its being performed at the meeting of the Three Choirs at Worcester in the autumn of 1800, where it met with so much success and gained such favor that it was given in 1801 at Hereford, in 1802 at Gloucester and in 1803 again at Worcester."

Again. "Although the 'Creation' could not be said to have failed in its first production in England in 1800, its success was not fully established until some years later. On the 17th March, 1813, Sir George Smart reproduced it at Drury Lane theatre as one of the series of Lenten Oratorios conducted by him. It was on that occasion interspersed with recitations from Milton's Paradise Lost by the favorite tragic actress, Miss Smith, afterwards the wife of the late eminent comedian Mr. Santley. After this time its popularity increased to such a degree, that for many years scarcely a musical festival of any importance was held without some portion at least of the work being included in it; and its attractiveness is even now but little, if at all diminished."

And so May-day was celebrated with it at the Crystal Palace in this year of our Lord 1861.

The announcement was that orchestra and chorus would number at the aggregate three thousand persons. That at least five-sixths of that number were really present there is no doubt. The large stage in one end of the transept was filled in the centre by hundreds of instrumentists, and the chorus rose tier above tier back to the wall. The building is very bad for sound and the effect is in no proportion to the force; but when that vast mass of tone in chorus rose it swelled forth—though muffled and sadly unresonant, with a subdued power and grandeur that filled the very soul. Though the kindness of Mr. Grove, secretary to the Palace company, I was allowed to listen to the effect in all parts of the building, and ascended the upper gallery but one, away at the opposite end of the transept. It was there that the effect was finest. The masses of sound rolled up surging like the solemn roll of the ocean on the beach. It was a new effect in music—that of mere massiveness. Haydn's Music however has not breadth and weight enough to bear this sort of thing—it is too nice and dainty—and one ought to hear Handel's choruses under such circumstances. So Haydn's symphonies are rather injured in effect by employing a very large orchestra while many movement in those of Beethoven will gain by every addition to the number of (adequate) performers.

There was something very grand and exciting in looking down from that lofty gallery upon the big audience on the main floor, in the side galleries, and wherever a view of the orchestra could be obtained, and although I was so ill that day as hardly to venture thither and was alternately enjoying the heats and chills of incipient fever—consequently in bad condition for either the scene or the music—all together has left a very strong and agreeable impression. It was worth the visit just to hear for once in a man's life the wonderful effect of hundreds of string instruments in that vast space. The effect was not that of loudness but of wide reaching power, which set the whole atmosphere in a vibration, and you seemed to feel as well as hear it.

The soloists were Formes, Reeves, Fraulein Titiens and Madame Rudersdorf. Their magnificent voices surely here had ample verge and scope enough, and though on the main floor they were in some degree lost, they came up to the gallery some 400 feet away, with a force and power really bordering upon the majestic and grand. Titiens is truly wonderful for power and general "gloriousness" of singing, and how her vast powers have developed since I hear her some years since in the Berlin Opera. I imagine her to be for the great style the finest singer living. She is a tall woman with not a handsome, but an expressive face.

These great performances have proved that there is no more difficulty in ruling great numbers of singers than large bodies of soldiery—and it is to be hoped that at length an acoustical building may be erected for performances on this scale. Be sure of this when this is done it will be found that two men have lined with powers equal to any demands; Handel in choral music, Beethoven in orchestral.

May 6. New Philharmonic Society again. The Symphony was Spohr's "Weihe der Töne"—called on the programme "The Power of Sound." They make queer work, I find of German words, and sometimes I cannot imagine what work is meant until I hear it—but the most outrageous instance is the one mentioned before in which a quite different text was used in the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven. The concerto was the one in G, op. 58, Beethoven, solo played by young Barnet, and very finely, too. The singers were Titiens and Giuglini.

Have we no players in Boston and New York

up to Beethoven's concertos? Of course we have; I could name a dozen. Why then are they never heard? They are as unparalleled for beauty and wonderful depths of expression as his symphonies, and deserve to be made as familiar to all music lovers. I had never heard this one before, although that exquisite player, Julius Eppstein in Vienna had given me an idea of it as well as could be done upon the pianoforte. But the contrast of orchestral effects was of course wanting.

May 8. Third Concert of the Musical Society of London. The principal pieces were Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat, and one by Haydn in E flat, here called No. 10. The former fell dead upon the audience, its prominent themes reminding people of those in Schubert's C symphony. It was curious to see how faces brightened when old father Haydn's work was begun. I felt the difference so strongly, that I looked round me to see how others took and found on all sides sympathy. People will enjoy Haydn more than Schumann, and I believe with good reason. Miss Parepa sang Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," with full orchestral accompaniment to universal delight. How surpassingly beautiful it is—it was a work of the young B., he was only 25 when he composed it.

May 9. Rossini's "Tell," at the Italian Opera, Covent Garden. Magnificently done, and put upon the stage superbly. So much has been written in the Journal of this glorious opera, of eulogy already, that I need only cry "ditto" to it all. Wonderfully fine as is the music, I must still give the preference on the whole to that in "Moses in Egypt," possibly, it is true, because I am more familiar with it. As a play, however, the "Tell" is far, far beyond the "Moses," the latter, as I remember it in Berlin, being to a New Englander, who drew in the old Testament with every breath in childhood, both silly and in parts blasphemous, as where Moses is called by a mysterious voice, and is seen ascending a mountain at the back of the stage, and a bright cloud comes down to him, which opens, and he takes out the two tables of the law! This I saw. But its music is favorite Rossinian music for me. The gathering of the Cantons however in Tell is for beauty, force, and dramatic effect, I do believe not surpassed by anything ever written for men's voices.

No wonder Davison and others so insist upon this work being made a stock piece. No wonder at their lamentations, that the marvellous success of Miss Patti should compel it to give way for "Sonnambula," "Lucia," &c.

By the way, we are all so proud of her success!

May 10. I delayed my departure from London, luckily too for my great object, as the delay gave me a mass of original letters of Beethoven to copy, which, although printed in part if not completely, it was very important to me to see and copy for myself, so little reliance I find it to be placed upon transcripts (as a rule) made for the press—some ten days, to hear the performance on May-day. Then a transient fit of illness, and the announcement of the performance of this evening kept me there so much longer—nor do I regret it on any ground save that of the delay.

If I were condemned to lose my hearing utterly, but had the liberty of choosing the one grand performance of music, of all which I have heard in my life, to hear once more and take its recollection with me into my future of never-varying silence, I think the decision would be made at once. No opera of Mozart, Gluck, Cherubini, Rossini, Spontini—not even those all-glorious performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and Overture in C. op. 124, which so excited me in Berlin six years since, and in Vienna last year, not Handel's "Messiah," nor the "Requiem" of Mozart and Cherubini, no performances of the Dom chor or the Sing Akademie of Berlin—none of these but Handel's "Israel in Egypt" by the London Sacred Harmonic Society, as heard on the evening of May 10th, 1861, in Exeter Hall. I have not forgotten, though it is not mentioned above, Beethoven's great Mass, which perhaps of other vocal works most powerfully affects me. But for pure musical delight, for that feeling carried to its highest pitch, which in childhood a fine psalm tune or delicious melody used to excite—that indescribable emotion, which used them to make the little bosom swell and the little heart beat with delicious pain, when hearing the tavern hall in our village ringing with the "tunes" and anthems of the old singing-books—for this give me again the "Israel in Egypt." Even now when I think of it my mind is in a tumult—I have no words for it—can only say, that my dreams of what vocal music can do in awakening emotion and touching the very heart, with no extraneous aid from dramatic story or theatrical effect, have never gone beyond the reality as here experienced. It was a positive relief, that owing to the necessity of rest, the choir was allowed to pause for some minutes after almost every number. While on the one hand I cannot conceive of anything surpassing the simple grandeur—nay, the positive sublimity of the music, so on the other it is equally impossible to imagine several hundred performers executing their task so with one mind and will as was here done. One thought not of difficulties. The choruses went of themselves. They rolled on and on as calmly as the waves of the ocean—mighty masses of tones, overwhelmingly sublime. No, there is nothing like it in music. There cannot be! And so closed my London Season.

Memoirs of my Life.

[MEMOIREN MEINES LEBENS.]

BY DR. J. F. CASTELLI. (PRAGUE.)

The writer of this autobiography has had many of the opportunities of Lorenzo da Ponte, and we might have expected a somewhat similar story. He has lived in Vienna the whole of his long life, and since 1801 has been writing for the stage. The number of his dramatic works amounts to a hundred and ninety-nine; for some years he was the poet of the Kärntner-Thor theatre; he knew all the singers and some of the composers of the Austrian capital; he remembers a character who figured importantly in the life of Mozart, and the first performance of the "Zauberflöte." He knew Sontag, and Weigl, the composer of a popular German opera, "The Swiss Family," of which he wrote the libretto; Zacharias Werner, the dramatist; and Theodore Körner, the patriotic poet. He collected more than 300 songs, 1,800 snuff-boxes, a mass of books of plays, portraits of actresses, autographs of actresses, and all the playbills of Vienna since the year 1800. But, out of all these materials, Dr. Castelli is very far from constructing a living picture, and his life and portrait furnish us a reason. He was most part of his life an employé, and his portrait gives us the thorough bureaucratic face of a German Beamter. The love of adventures for which Da Ponte's life was chiefly remarkable, figure very slightly with Dr. Castelli; he once loved an actress who was false to him, and once a young Hungarian who could not spell correctly. The chief interest of his autobiography lies in the illustrations of manners and customs of the former time, and the occasional allusion to well-known names which now seem to belong to the past.

A long and interesting sketch of Schikaneder, the author of the text of Mozart's "Zauberflöte," the manager who produced it, the critic who gave Mozart instructions how to write for the public, and the good friend who cheated the composer of the profits of the opera, will be relished by all students of the life of Mozart. Any one familiar with Mozart's operetta, "The Impresario," will remember many traits of Schikaneder's character which Dr. Castelli fully confirms:

"Schikaneder," he says, "was, strictly speaking, a natural poet; if he had received scientific training, he would have better satisfied æsthetic laws. The verse in his operas was, truly, enough to make one's hair stand on end, and was full of contradictions. Read through the text of the 'Zauberflöte,' which only a Mozart could have set to music. He was a pitiful singer, because in his operas he either wrote the music of all the passages he had to sing himself, or dictated it to the composer. Thus several of the airs in the 'Zauberflöte' are by Schikaneder himself; Mozart made them works of art by his wonderful instrumentation. The bass Sebastian Meyer told me that at first Mozart had written the duet between Papageno and Papagena, when they first meet, entirely different from the way it stands at present. Both cried out in astonishment 'Papageno!—Papagena!' But when Schikaneder heard this he called out to the orchestra—'You Mozart! that is nothing; the music must produce more astonishment; both must look at each other in silence, then Papageno must begin to stammer. 'Pa-papapa-pa-pa;' Papagena must repeat this till at last both have spoken the entire name.' Mozart followed the advice, and the duet had always to be repeated so. Further, when the Priests came together in the second act, at the rehearsal, there was no accompaniment to the scene. Schikaneder, however, desired a pathetic march to be composed for it. On this Mozart asked the musicians for their parts, and wrote at once the splendid march which now stands there. It is laughable to relate what Schikaneder said to a friend who complimented him on the success of the 'Zauberflöte,' and on his share in the work. He replied, 'Yes, the opera has succeeded, but it would have succeeded much better if Mozart had not spoiled my ideas as he has done.'

Of the first performance of the opera, Dr. Castelli says: "The 'Zauberflöte' was first given on the 30th of September, 1791. On the playbill it was simply stated, Herr Mozart will to-day direct in person."

It is, however, natural that Dr. Castelli should not tell us much about Mozart, whose death took place in the tenth year of the autobiographer's life. The account of Weigl is more detailed, and the history of the "Schweizer-Familie," may be worth repeating:

"I must here observe that I may call the text of the 'Schweizer-Familie,' in the fullest sense, my work, for I only took the idea from the French; the characters, the scenes, the dialogue, the situations, and the distribution of songs, were entirely my property. If this is called adaptation or translation, there are very few original works in the world. When I brought the first act to Weigl, he thought it had succeeded fully, and some parts pleased him so that he set to work to compose without waiting for the other two acts. But will any one believe that he did not like the splendid air of Emeline, the air which is the sun of the first act, and he doubted if he would set it to music; and then he had to compose it three times over before he contented himself. I must here observe that Weigl, in all his operas, as soon as he had composed any piece, would play it over on the piano to those two friends for whom he always wrote the best parts, and would ask their advice. I now worked at the other two acts of the opera, and then read the whole at Weigl's house to himself and his two friends. It pleased them thoroughly. I thought I had now completed my work, but I had not by any means. The poet must go hand in hand with the composer, if they would bring into the world a capable child. Weigl soon asked me to put a couple more verses in one place, or to strike out a couple in another; one time he wanted verses with a single, another time with a double rhyme. At the rehearsals one speech must be shortened, another lengthened. At last, on the 14th of March, 1809, the opera was given in the Kärntner-Thor, and received with enthusiasm. It was not a success, it was a jubilee. Now that I had earned so much honor, how did I come off in the pecuniary question? It has long and justly been a subject of complaint in Germany, that dramatic writers receive so little payment for their works, while authors in France build themselves country houses, and touch yearly rents of 20, 50, 80, 100,000 francs. The 'Schweizer-Familie' had a European reputation, partly from the excellent music of Weigl, partly, also, from my text. It has been given in every theatre of Germany, and has succeeded in every one. In Vienna it was given more than a hundred times. It has been translated into French, Italian, Russian, and Danish. Guess what I received. You will never guess. I got 8 florins (4.). True I got 100 florins in bank notes, but to bring the bank-notes to the level of silver, you had to divide first by five, and again by two and a half."

Dr. Castelli's adventures with his patriotic songs were as unfortunate as his librettos could have been. On one occasion he was refused permission to print a song of his own which another was allowed to pirate. At the time of the French invasion of Austria, a patriotic song was the cause of Dr. Castelli's proscription. He applied to the Emperor of Austria for help, but the Emperor, on hearing that he had written a war-song, asked who had told him to do so. The mention of the Censorship, which forbade him to print his own works, yet suffered another to pirate them, leads us naturally to the most amusing passage in Dr. Castelli's autobiography, his chapter on the Viennese Censorship.

The first censor of whom Dr. Castelli had any experience, was a certain Hager, whose reverence for the name of God was so profound, that he only allowed the name to be employed in the Court Theatre. All the suburban theatres had to substitute Heaven, and once a rhyme of Dr. Castelli's was cruelly murdered, sacrificed to the Censor's reverence. The precision of Censor Hager in all delicate matters was equally commendable, and not even the stage directions escaped his observation. When it was written "He kisses her," the Censor would alter it to "He gives her a kiss." The production of Schiller's "Don Carlos" was long forbidden, because Don Carlos loved his stepmother; in "The Robbers," the Father was turned into an uncle, and a stupendous effect was produced by the cry of "Uncleicide," substituted for Parricide. A composer wrote a sonata to the manes of Hummel, but there was a law of the censorship that no Dedication might be printed without the permission of the person to whom it was offered. Accordingly the Censor asked the composer to produce the permission of the manes of Hummel. Another time a censor struck out a long quotation from Montesquieu, and re-wrote it in the opposite sense, and, probably, in a dissimilar style. But it had to figure as a quotation from Montesquieu. Dr. Castelli was twice fined for disrespectful remarks on the language of the official journal of Vienna, though his remarks appeared in Dresden. The Imperial Royal Vienna Gazette placed among its deaths, "Marianna H—, Lady-in-waiting to Her Majesty the Empress, born Hölzl," and Dr. Castelli observed, "According to this wording, the Empress' maiden name was Hölzl." Next time, an Academy was announced for the benefit of "The in-the-town hospital-grown-poor citizens," and the Doctor remarked it must be an ill-conducted hospital in which citizens grew poor!

The first volume of Dr. Castelli's autobiography brings us to the year 1813. Two or three more volumes are promised to bring the life nearer to the memory of men still living.—N. Y. Musical World.

Russian National Music.

(Correspondence of the N. Y. Evening Post.)

ST. PETERSBURG, July 4, 1861.

This splendid metropolis lies upon the Neva, at a point where it suddenly expands, or rather empties itself into an extension of the Gulf of Finland. For the gulf actually reaches up to the city, though above Cronstadt it is called the river Neva. Near the mouth of the river proper are a number of islands, on several of which is built the Russian capital, while the others are devoted to pleasure grounds for the populace generally, and to the country seats of the richer classes; the Emperor himself having here two charming retreats, which in their construction and surroundings unite both the rural and palatial. To these islands the fashionable world of St. Petersburg takes its daily drives, the hours being from eight to ten in the afternoon. In any other clime this would be called evening, but here, where the sun does not set till nine o'clock, and twilight lingers on till midnight, it is but a modified day.

There are a few places of amusement on these islands. There is the theatre on the Kammenoy Ostrov, (the word ostrov means island,) where Italian operas, sung in Russ, alternate with Russian plays. On another island is a place of resort so characteristic as to need special description.

It is accessible from the city by little steamboats which run hourly up the branches of the Neva and pass by shores lined with country seats, (among them the favorite and unpretending summer residence of the Czars), and dive under low bridges, lowering their smoke pipes with a terrible splutter of steam and splash of wheels, as they rush under the blackened archways. The last landing is made opposite this Russian resort, and leaving the steamboat you cross the road and pay thirty copecks (about twenty-five cents) for admission to a large garden pleasantly laid out in well-graveled walks. In the centre is a building used as a refreshment saloon, where you can get anything from onions to ice-cream, from cold tea with sliced lemon in it, to champagne, claiming, at least, to be pure Verzonay. Tables are also scattered among the trees, and numerous waiters are in attendance.

Scattered around the gardens are some half a dozen little theatres, the seats being chairs set out in the open air, while the stage is neatly fitted up with scenery, proscenium, &c. On one of these stages a performance is taking place; a Russian clown is making himself ridiculous and sometimes vulgar, while the ring-master is as easily duped and as absurdly conventional as this class of individuals always are, whether the scene of his labors be Niblo's, Astley's, or a Russian open-air theatre. A man with trained dogs next appears, and the animals with the profoundest gravity impressed upon their canine features, jump through hoops, sit up on chairs, turn somersets, &c. One performance is, however, more remarkable. Dog A gets on the top of a globe, while dog B pushes it about the stage, dog A maintaining his equilibrium with scientific skill. Then the clown makes a funny speech, in the delicious Russ language, the entire dramatis personæ (consisting of two dogs, clown, ring-master, dog-trainer, two gymnasts, and three boy "supes" in shabby spangles) appear together, make low bows and the curtain drops.

Immediately a band of music strikes up and the audience hasten towards the next attraction. The musicians are stationed on a platform covered with a convex roof in the form of a huge shell. Ornamental rock work, interspersed with flowers, adorns the front of the platform, and creeping vines wind about the edges of this artificial cave. The musicians play well, and the popular Italian and German composers—Donizetti, Rossini, Bellini, Meyerbeer, Wagner and Strauss—are all represented in the programmes. After the music there are some gymnastic feats performed by professed gymnasts, and then on another shell-covered platform a band of Russian singers demand attention.

RUSSIAN MUSIC.

Their performance forms the most characteristic feature of the entertainment. They are sixteen in number, all males, the oldest about fifty years of age and the youngest five. They are all dressed in the Russian national costume, with black velvet frocks, trimmed with golden fringe, reaching to the knees, and are led by a very active, lithe, and energetic maestro, who stands in the centre, with his subordinates ranged about him in the form of a semicircle. At a given signal from the maestro, who has a long baton and gesticulates as fiercely as a drum-major, they strike up a melancholy minor chorus, in which is frequently repeated a pleasing refrain. The maestro then essays a solo accompanied in unisons by a clarinet, the only instrumental aid employed by these singers; at the end of each verse occurs a chorus, during which the clarinet player, departing from the melody, indulges in quite a fanciful arabesque obligato.

The next chorus is in waltz time, and at the refrain the youngest member of the troupe, a boy some five years old, runs out of the ranks and commences a wild national dance, waving his hat, and at intervals shouting out as a racer does to encourage his horse; and at the same time a reserve orchestral force, consisting of a triangle and a tambourine, are suddenly brought into active service. Soon the next youngest member joins the dance, and then a third, the singers, the clarinet player, the tambourine striker, the triangle jingler, and the three dancers all at work, till the chorus suddenly ceases, and the performers retire.

This odd entertainment has interested me more than any I have yet seen in the Russian capital. The native melodies are all in the minor mode, and invested with a strange and plaintive melancholy; and even the dance music gives that impression of forced gaiety which any would-be lively music, performed in minor keys, imparts. The singing is at the first start very bad, the singers producing fearful discords, through which the shrill clarinet pursues its way most vigorously. Soon, however, the vocalists fall into their parts and sing with a fair degree of accuracy. Their time is excellent, and the bass voices are universally fine. Indeed, Russia, I believe, contains the finest bass singers in the world, and at the churches, where the best are heard, there is always one who ends on a prolonged note way down among the double D's and C's—a note which Formes or Marini may well envy, for they cannot equal it in depth or sonority.

There is on another island, a Russian place, with a French name, the Café Chantant, the only one in the city of St. Petersburg where the amusements are more genteel, but not near as entertaining. In place of national games and singing, French conjuring and "Tyrolean warblers" are the attractions. When considered as places of popular amusements, the prices of admission to these establishments are dear. To the Kammenoy Ostrov opera the charge is from ten rubles to one and a half rubles; at the Café Chantant the admission is a ruble, and seats and refreshments extra. A ruble is worth seventy-five cents. There are no theatres open in the city during the summer. The very lowest classes of St. Petersburgers seem to have no higher amusement than sprawling at full length in the sun, and eating garlic.—W. F. W.—("Trovator" of Dwight's Journal.)

My Whistling Neighbor.

We have moved into a new house, situated about the centre in a row of ten, all bound up together in hurried, mushroom fashion, and divided from each other by partitions of brick so thin that sound was only a little deadened in passing through. For the first three or four nights I was unable to sleep, except in snatches, for so many noises came to my ears, originating, apparently, in my own domicile, that anxiety in regard to burglars was constantly excited. Both on the first and second nights I made a journey through the house in the small hours, but found no intruders on my premises. The sounds that disturbed me came from some of my neighbors, who kept later vigils than suited my habits.

"There it is again!" said I, looking up from my paper, as I sat reading on the second day after taking possession of my own home. "That fellow is a nuisance."

"What fellow?" asked my wife, whose countenance showed surprise at the remark. She was either unconscious or unaffected by the circumstance that annoyed my sensitive ears.

"Don't you hear it?" said I.

"Hear what?"

"That everlasting whistle."

"O!" A smile played over my wife's face. "Does it annoy you?"

"I can't say that I am particularly annoyed by it yet; but I shall be, if it is to go on incessantly. A man whistles for want of thought, and this very fact will—"

"I'm not so sure of that," remarked my wife, interrupting me, "the poet notwithstanding. I would say that he whistles from exuberant feelings. Our neighbor has a sunny temper, no doubt; what, I am afraid, cannot be said of our neighbor on the other side. I've never heard him whistle; but his scolding abilities are good, and judging from two days' observation, he is not likely to permit them to grow feeble for want of use."

I did not answer, but went on with my reading, silenced, if not reconciled to my whistling neighbor.

Business matters annoyed me through the day, and I felt moody and depressed as I took my course homeward at nightfall. I was not leaving my cares behind me. Before shutting my account books, and locking my fire-proof, I had made up a bundle of troubles to carry away with me, and my shoulders stooped beneath the burden.

I did not bring sunlight into my dwelling as I crossed, with dull, deliberate step, its threshold. The flying feet that sprung along the hall, and the eager voices that filled suddenly, the air in sweet tumult of sound as I entered, were quiet and hushed in a little while. I did not repel my precious ones, for they were very dear to my heart; but the birds do not sing joyously except in the sunshine, and my presence had cast a shadow. The songs of my home birds died into fitful chirpings—they sat quiet among the branches. I saw this, and understood the reason. I condemned myself; I reasoned against the folly of bringing worldly cares into the home sanctuary; I endeavored to rise out of my gloomy state. But neither philosophy nor a self-compelling effort was of any avail.

I was sitting with my hand partly shading my face from the light, still in conflict with myself, when I became conscious of a lifting of the shadows that were around me, and of a freer respiration. The change was slight, but still very perceptible. I was beginning to question as to its cause, when my thought recognized an agency which had been operative through the sense of hearing, though not before externally perceived in consequence of my abstracted state. My neighbor was whistling "Begone Dull Care!"

Now, in my younger days, I had whistled and sung the air and words of this cheerful old song hundreds of times, and every line was familiar to memory. I listened with pleased interest, for a little while, and then, as my changing state gave power to revolutions quick born of better reason, I said, in my thought, emphatically, as if remanding an evil spirit, "Begone, dull care!" And the fiend left me.

Then I spoke cheerfully, and in tone of interest to quiet little May, who had walked round me three or four times, wondering in her little heart, no doubt, what held her at a distance from her papa, and who was now seated by her mother, leaning her flaxen head, fluted all over with glossy curls, against her knee. She sprang at my voice, and was in my lap at a bound. What a thrill of pleasure the tight clasp of her arms to my heart! O, love, thou art full of blessing!

From that moment I felt kinder towards my neighbor. He had done me good—had played before me as David played before Saul, exercising the evil spirit of discontent. There was no longer a repellant sphere, and soon all my little ones were close around me, and happy as in other times with their father.

After they were all in bed, I sat alone with my wife, the cares that "infest the day" made a new assault upon me, and vigorously strove to regain their lost empire in my mind. I felt their approaches, and the gradual receding of cheerful thoughts with every advancing step they made. In my struggle to maintain that tranquillity which so strengthens the soul for work and duty, I arose and walked the floor. My wife looked up to me with inquiry in her face. Then she let her eyes fall upon her needle work, and as I glanced toward her at every turn in my walk I saw an expression of tender concern on her lips. She understood that I was not at ease in my mind, and the knowledge troubled her.

"How wrong in me," I said in self-rebuke, "thus to let idle brooding over mere outside things, which such brooding can in no way affect, trouble the peace of home;" and I made a new effort to rise again into a sunnier region. But the fiend had me in his clutches again, and I could not release myself. Now it was that my David came anew to my relief. Suddenly his clear notes rang out in the air, "Away with Melancholy."

I cannot tell which worked the instant revulsion of feeling that came—the cheerful air, the words of the song which were called to remembrance by the air or the associations of bygone years that were revived. But the spell was potent and complete. I was myself again. During the evening the voice of my wife broke out several times into snatches of song—a thing quite unusual of late, for life's sober realities had taken the music from her as well as from her husband. We were growing graver every day. It was pleasant to hear her flute-like tones again, very pleasant, and my ear harkened lovingly. The cause of this fitful warbling I recognized each time as the notes died away. They were responsive to our neighbor.

I did not then remark upon the circumstances. One reason of this lay in the fact I had spoken lightly of our neighbor's whistling propensity, which struck me in the beginning as vulgar; and I did not care to acknowledge myself so largely his debtor as I really was.

We were in our bed-room, and about retiring for the night, when loud voices, as if in strife, came discordantly through the thin party walls, from our neighbors on the other side. Something had gone wrong there, and angry passions were in the ascendant.

"How very disagreeable!" I remarked.

"The man's a brute!" said my wife, emphatically. "He does nothing, it seems to me, but wrangle in his family. Pity that he hadn't something of the pleasant temper of our neighbor on the other side."

"That is a more agreeable sound, I must confess," was my answer, as the notes of "What-Fairy-like Music steals over the Sea," rose sweetly on the air.

"Far more agreeable," returned my wife.

"He plays well on his instrument," I said, smiling. My ear was following the notes in pleased recognition. We stood listening until our neighbor passed to another air, set to Mrs. Hemans' beautiful words, "Come to the Sunset Tree." To a slow, soft, tender measure the notes fell, yet still we heard them with singular distinctness through the intervening wall, just a little muffled, but sweeter for the obstruction.

"The day is past and gone,
The woodman's axe lies free,
And the reaper's work is done."

My wife recalled these lines from her memory, repeating them in a subdued, tranquilizing tone. The air was still sounding in our ears, but we no longer recognized impression on the external senses. It had done its work of recalling the beautiful Evening Hymn of the Switzer, and we repeated to each other verse after verse—

"Sweet is the hour of rest,
Pleasant the wood's own sigh,
And the gleaming of the west,
And the turf whereon we lie
When the burden and the heat
Of labor's tasks are o'er,
And kindly voices greet
The loved one at the door."

To which I added:

"But rest more sweet and still
Than ever nightfall gave,
Our longing hearts shall fill
In the world beyond the grave.
There shall no tempest blow,
No scorching noontide heat;
There shall be no more snow,
No weary, wandering feet,
And we lift our trusting eyes
From the hills our fathers trod,
To the quiet of the skies—
To the Sabbath of our God."

All was now still on both sides. The harsh discord of our scolding neighbor had ceased, and our whistling neighbor had warbled his good-night melody, which, like a pleasant flower growing near an unsightly object, and interposing a veil of beauty, had removed it from our consciousness.

It was a long time since I had felt so peaceful on retiring as when my head went down upon its pillow—thanks to my light-hearted neighbor, at whose whistling propensities I was inclined in the beginning to be annoyed. But for him I should have gone to rest with the harsh discord of my scolding neighbor's voice in my ears, and been ill at ease with myself and the world. On what seeming trifles hang our states of mind! A word, a look, a tone of music, a discordant jar, will bring light or shadow, smiles or tears.

On the next morning, while dressing myself, thought reached forward over the days anxieties, and care began drawing her sombre curtains around me.

My neighbor was stirring also, and, like the awak'ning bird, tuneful matins, "Day on the Mountains" rang out cheerily, followed by "Dear Summer Morn," winding off with "Begone, Dull Care!" and the merry laughter of a happy child which had sprung into his arms, and was being covered with kisses.

The cloud that was gathering on my brow passed away, and I met my wife and children at the breakfast-table with pleasant smiles.

In a few days I ceased to notice the whistling of my neighbor. It continued as usual; but had grown to be such a thing of course as not to be an object of thought. But the effect remained, showing itself in a gradual restoration of that cheerfulness which care, and work, and brooding anxiety about worldly things, are so apt to produce. The "voice of music," which had been almost dumb in my wife for a long period was gradually restored. Old familiar ditties would break suddenly from her throat as she sat sewing, and I would often hear her singing again, from room to room, as in the sunnier days of our spring time. As for myself, scarcely an evening passed in which I was not betrayed into beating time with my foot to "Auld Lang Syne," "Happy Land," "Comin' through the Rye," or "Hail Columbia," in response to my neighbor's cheery whistle. Our children also caught the infection, and would commence singing on the instant our neighbor tuned his pipes. Verily he was our benefactor—the harping David to our Saul.

"You live at Number 510, I think," said a gentleman whose face was familiar, though I was not able to call his name. We were sitting side by side in the cars.

I answered in the affirmative.

"So I thought," he replied. "I live at 514—second door east."

"Mr. Gordon."

"Yes, Sir; that is my name. Pleasant houses, but mere shells," said he. Then, with a look of disgust on his face, "Doesn't that whistling fellow between us annoy you terribly? I've got so out of all patience that I shall either move or silence him. Whistle, whistle, from morning till night. Pah! I always detested whistling. It's a sign of no brains. I've written him a note twice, but failed to send either time; it isn't well to quarrel with a neighbor, if you can help it."

"It doesn't annoy me at all," I answered. "Indeed, I rather like it."

"You do? Well, that is singular! Just what my wife says."

"First-rate for the blue devils I find. I'm indebted to our whistling friend for sundry favors in this direction."

My new acquaintance looked at me curiously.

"You're not in earnest," said he, a half-amused smile breaking through the unamiable expression which his face had assumed.

"Altogether in earnest; and I beg of you not to send him that note. So your wife is not annoyed."

"Not she."

"Is she musical?" I inquired.

"She was; but of late years life has been rather a serious matter with us, and her singing birds have died, or lost the heart for music."

"The history of many other lives," said I.

The man sighed faintly.

"Has there been any recent change?" I ventured to inquire.

"In what respect?" he asked.

"Has there been no voice from the singing birds?"

A new expression came suddenly into the man's face.

"Why, yes," he answered, "now that I think of it. There have been some low, fitful warblings. Only last evening the voice of my wife stole out, as if half afraid, and trembled a little on the words of an old song."

"The air of which our neighbor was whistling at the time," said I.

"Right, as I live!" was my companion's exclamation, after a pause, slapping his hand on his knee. I could hardly help smiling at the look of wonder, amusement, and conviction that blended on his face.

"I wouldn't send that note," said I meaningly.

"No, hang me if I do! I must study this case. I'm something of a philosopher, you must know. If our neighbor can awaken the singing birds in the heart of my wife, he may whistle till the crack of doom without hindrance from me. I'm obliged to you for the suggestion."

A week afterwards I met him again.

"What about the singing birds?" I asked, smiling.

"All alive again, thank God!" He answered with a heartiness of manner that caused me to look narrowly into his face. It wore a better expression than when I observed it last.

"Then you didn't send that note?"

"No Sir. Why, since I saw you I've actually taken to whistling and humming old tunes again, and you can't tell how much better it makes me feel. And the children are becoming as merry and musical as crickets. Our friend's whistle sets them all agoing, like the first signal warble of a bird at day-dawn that awakens the woods to melody."

We were on our way homeward, and parted at my own door. As I entered, "Home, Sweet Home" was pulsing in tender harmonies on the air. I stood still and listened until tears fell over my cheeks. The singing birds were alive again in the heart of my wife also, and I said "Thank God!" as warmly as my neighbor had uttered the words at a little while before.

Grisi.

London now in reality has seen and heard the last of the Giulietta Grisi. Wednesday night at the Royal Italian Opera closed the dramatic career of the renowned artist; for, although she appears on the stage in the provinces before taking her final leave, she has virtually laid aside her crown, and for ourselves and all opera-goers she has quitted the scene forever. The career of Grisi on the stage has been indeed unparalleled. For nearly thirty years she has been before the public; and before Time only has the lustre of her genius grown pale. During that long period she has had, in her special line and range of characters, absolutely no rival, and Mlle. Titiens alone has recently attempted to divide with her the tragic throne. When Giulietta Grisi first came to this country she found Pasta reigning supreme at the Opera, and Malibran the object of unbounded idolatry at Drury Lane. Her success, nevertheless, was prodigious, and the young prima donna soon became the rage, despite her alarming proximity to two artists of greater genius and talent even than herself. But Grisi's voice was of that quality that might truly be called "divine," and her beauty was of the highest order. In fact, to look upon her or to listen to her was alike enchanting; and as everybody could appreciate in a moment such recommendations, her popularity became universal. To admire and appreciate Pasta, some knowledge and understanding was required; to feel the intensity and profundity of Malibran's acting and singing, it was necessary to see her more than once; but Grisi entranced the audience in a moment. Who came to see her, learned or unlearned, went away in wonder and enthralled.

It was fortunate that Grisi selected a part for her first essay which did not place her in direct comparison with Pasta or Malibran. Ninetta, in La Gazza Ladra, had been played by both artists; but subsequent performances of a loftier stamp had expelled from the public mind any impression it had made. When afterwards Grisi performed Anna Bolena, and Amina in La Sonnambula, neither impersonation was calculated to efface the sensation created by her Ninetta. In fact, Grisi, like Beethoven, had "three styles." Her first, belonging to the romantic, and comic line, embraced such parts as Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra, Elena, in La Donna del Lago, Rosina in the Barbiere, Amina in the Sonnambula, Susanna in the Nozze di Figaro, Eliza in the Matrimonio Segreto, and Elvira in the Puritani. Her second style, appertaining to the grand and heroic, comprised all her celebrated tragic parts, with which the reader is sufficiently acquainted; while her third refers to the period when she was compelled from vocal decadence, to have recourse to the repertory of the French Grand Opera. It will be thus seen that Grisi, at three periods of her career, was in reality three different artists—now sustaining the parts of Sontag, anon those of Pasta, and finally those of Alboni and Mad. Viardot, gaining eminence in all. Has history of the art produced another example? We think not. Few singers outlive one style; few indeed are permitted to shine through a third of the longevity of Grisi. The vocal organ is perishable, and a few seconds' over-exertion, or merely a sudden catarrh, may destroy the most powerful and well-educated voice ever heard. Grisi's career might be denominated a miraculous one, not simply in reference to the length of the time she has endured, but to the wear and tear her voice has undergone. Let it be remembered the parts she has played and the music she sang were almost always such as to put her powers to the severest test. Artists like Sontag and Alboni, whose repertoires involve no parts which are calculated to fatigue the voice, we can easily understand singing to the end of the chapter. It is another thing to perform such parts as Norma, Lucrezia Borgia, Donna Anna, Semiramide, Anna Bolena, and those belonging to the lofty tragic line, continually; more particularly when the artist exerts herself to the utmost—as Grisi never failed to do—on every occasion. A powerful constitution is no less requisite to a great dramatic singer than a powerful voice; and if ever vocalist was blessed with that most desirable of all nature's gifts—a good constitution, it was Giulietta Grisi. Healthful strength, indeed, was in her case art's greatest help. It was the means of making her outlast the common period allotted to three ordinary singers; it kept her vocal powers free from the elemental casualties to which all artists are more or less subject; and, above all, it enabled her never to disappoint the public. No wonder, then, she preserved her powers but slightly impaired to the end. And even now, were music written expressly for her by some cunning composer who would carefully nurse the upper tones, we have little doubt Grisi would still manifest her supremacy as a declamatory singer. But of that there is no hope. Grisi has sung her last, and has taken an eternal leave of the public. Her tears on Wednesday night left no doubt of the fact.—London Musical World.

Mr. John K. Paine.

A few weeks ago, while sojourning for a day or two in the beautiful city of Portland, we had the good fortune to meet with a young American musician, whose name is familiar to most of the readers of the Musical Times, Mr. John K. Paine. At the suggestion of a mutual friend, Mr. Paine very kindly permitted us to enjoy an hour's unalloyed pleasure in listening to his rare interpretation of the music of the great master of that grandest of instruments, the organ. When at last we were reluctantly compelled to leave the church, we went away convinced that the high praise awarded our young countryman by the critics and musicians of Europe, was well merited.

Mr. Paine plays with remarkable clearness and vigor, and his pedal playing is most admirable. Bach's fugues were given with a rare power we have not heard excelled, and a trio sonata of the same composer, in which two manuals and the pedals are simultaneously employed, was played with a clearness and individuality of parts, and at the same time so elegantly interwoven and shaped into a perfect whole, as to at once indicate the talent of the performer, as well as the lofty genius of the composer.

But Mr. Paine does not confine himself to Bach, though he worships him as the great genius of the organ. His own compositions bear marks of solid merit. His variations on the National Hymn of Austria, Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser, display a thorough knowledge of the resources of his instrument, and are broad and majestic in their changes. A friend tells us, too, of other compositions, among them an "Agnus Dei" composed in the strict church style, for the choir of the first parish in Portland, as remarkably fine. Even now Mr. Paine is hard at work writing, and we are happy to say that during the coming season some of his orchestral compositions, will be brought to light in our own good city.

Educated as Mr. Paine has been, under Haupt, of Berlin, and being, as he is, an organist by nature as well as by profession, he is a devoted worshiper of the greatest composer for the noblest of instruments, Johann Sebastian Bach. He revels in the wealth of the life long labor of the illustrious master. He would have the world love Bach as he loves him, and he sincerely believes that the world has only to know him as he knows him to love him equally as well. He is a missionary of Bach, and Bach has no more enthusiastic a worshiper, nor so admirable an interpreter in the United States or Disunited States of America.

We certainly believe that this young man stands at the head of the organists in this country, and that he will do more towards disseminating the principles of Bach than any other musician now among us. We shall be happy to welcome him in Boston, and would suggest to the parties having the charge of the new organ for the Music Hall, the securing, if possible, his permanent residence in this city. We do not know his intentions, but if he purposes remaining in this country, we surely ought to exert ourselves to obtain his presidency over our long arriving instrument.—Boston Musical Times.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE UPON A NATIONAL HYMN.—The gentlemen requested to act as a Committee upon a Prize National Hymn have made their report, in which they state the following result of their arduous labors:—

They received nearly twelve hundred manuscripts in answer to their call, of which about one-third furnished new music as well as words. To the examination and comparison of these, the Committee addressed themselves at the earliest moment, and gave to the task very much more time than they supposed that they would be called to upon to give. Every manuscript received was opened in Committee, read, and duly considered. Every musical composition was performed once, and those found sufficiently meritorious to be worthy of more careful examination were heard in solo and chorus. With comparatively few exceptions, the hymns sent in proved to be of interest only to their writers as rhymed expressions of personal feeling or fancy.

Of these exceptions many were excluded from special consideration as being purely devotional, or because they were written either to the national airs of other people, or to those in certain vogue with us, the acknowledged insufficiency of which was the reason for the appointment of this committee. After a careful and repeated consideration of the remainder, the committee are unanimously of the opinion that, although some of them have a degree of poetic excellence which will probably place them high in the public favor as lyrical compositions, no one of them is well suited for a National Hymn. They, therefore, make no award.

Propositions were made for public performances of those hymns which the Committee should think worthy of such a distinction; but upon due consideration, it was deemed most advisable not to accept them. In accordance, however, with one of the conditions of competition, the most meritorious and noticeable of the songs received, have been placed in the hands of the publishers, and will be issued in a volume at their risk; the publication, if profitable, inuring to the benefit of a patriotic fund.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of "The Hymn of Praise," (Lobgesang), a Cantata by Mendelssohn.

J. S. Bach.

(TRANSLATED FOR THIS JOURNAL FROM THE "DEUTSCHE MUSIK-ZEITUNG" OF VIENNA.)

Arias from various Cantatas, with Piano-forte accompaniment, arranged by ROBERT FRANZ. Four sets (9 Alto, 9 Bass, 9 Soprano, 9 Tenor Arias). Leipzig: F. Whistling; Boston: O. Ditson & Co.

Of the nine Bass Arias, which form the second part of the work and appeared in 1860, we take No. 2, out of the Cantata for the 16th Sunday after Trinity: Wer weiss wie nahe mir mein Ende ("Who knows how near my end to me?") Setting out from the gospel of the day, the resurrection of the young man at Nain, it first unfolds, in a figured choral movement, the emotions of dread of death and the last judgment, which, however, is interrupted by consoling recitatives. Then a Tenor recitative reminds of the true position which Christ holds to death:

"D'rum leb ich allezeit,
Zum Sterben fertig und bereit," (Therefore I live all the time,
For death still ready and prepared),

—since life is to prepare us for Blessedness. Then an Alto aria expresses the joyful willingness to die, because death releases from all ills. Still more earnestly does this appear in the following Soprano recitative, which concludes thus:

"Flügel her, Flügel her,
Ach wer doch schon in Himmel wär."
(Wings for me! Wings for me!
Whoever yet in heaven may be.

Now follows in our Bass Aria the farewell to the world, with which the congregation chimes in gladly at the close, in the Choral: "World adieu! of thee I'm weary." The aria has the following text:

"Gute Nacht, du Weltgetümmel,
Jetzt mach ich mit dir Bechluss;
Ich steh schon mit einem Fuss
Bei dem lieben Gott im Himmel."
(Good night, thou bustling world!
Now I make an end with thee;
I stand already with one foot
With the dear God in heaven).

It is not kept in so noble a tone as the text to the Aria just described; indeed Bach's texts form a rather motley mixture of the noblest poetry and the driest rhymed prose. They are not free from the tastelessnesses of his time; and yet perhaps they conciliate the rigorous critics by their plain and honest simplicity, by their touching humility and, in most cases at least, also by their downright natveté. The air sets out (which is extremely characteristic) in G minor. The Ritornel consists of two fully contrasted parts of eight bars each. At first a very sustained Cantilena, full of deep seriousness, reconciling calmness and painless faith and confidence. (G).

Then a quickly stirring, enticing, rustling tumult in semiquavers, in which the Basses hurl themselves upward with all haste, but presently, as if by an irresistible power, are pressed back, step by step, through two full octaves into the depths again — as if the vain onsets of the “bustling world” and its gradual, shadowy collapse should be presented palpably before our eyes; for in this part it does not come to any concrete carrying out of a melody. The Ritornel closes in B flat major and then leads quickly back to G minor. (H).

And now the voice part carries through the anterior sentence of the Aria in two clauses of some length, separated by a couple of bars, closely following, in the first clause, the Ritornel, which is represented in the accompaniment. Hence it has at first the sustained melody, which is appropriate to the “Good night,” but scarcely have the words “bustling world” unchained as it were the whole troop of evil spirits, than the whole troop rocks itself into a bolder and more violent attitude, to conclude at last with a proud, victorious, exulting flourish. (J).

After three bars of interlude, in which the basses hurry downwards faster and faster, the voice boldly returns to the attack, as if it would hurl back the “bustling world” once for all; the accompaniment flies asunder in both directions with hard, odd sounds. (K).

And, if the turmoil is not yet over, it can only assert itself in weaker echoes (D minor); the voice ends exultingly, with the same, nay deeper, firmer confidence of uiatory, in D minor. (L).

With the first part of the Ritornel (in D minor) we are led now to the middle sentence: Jetzt mach ich mit dir Beschluss (“Now I make an end with thee”), &c. It consists of a connecting piece, which is woven with great skill quite gradually and imperceptibly into the concluding sentence. It begins choral-like (at a); but soon takes, with the use of the first leading motive, a freer movement (b) imitated in the accompaniment; and, with an extremely characteristic melodic turn, also borrowed from the first part, and also imitated in the accompaniment, gains a preliminary close in C minor (c), (M).

Here is a casura of the middle sentence; but, as the citation indicates, the leading motive begins again at once in the accompaniment, over which the voice floats in long drawn tones, until, following the law of parallelism, it bends into that ascending turn (cited under c) to end at last in E flat major. (N).

Particularly characteristic and graphic in this middle sentence is the singularly wavering modulation, which, as the attentive observer cannot fail to see, is seized with the same inward soaring impulse as the melody itself, and renders the idea, the image of the text most strikingly. One might say, that Bach not only interprets his text, but chisels it as it were into living, inspired tone-forms!

To this part now the second clause of the anterior sentence finally attaches itself, beginning here in C minor and ending on the Tonic; it contains no particular heightenings of expression, which is easily explained by the whole course of what proceeds.

If any one is seriously prejudiced with the idea, that Bach works only in the figural style; that he has no independent melody, but treats his voice part always like an obligato instrument, more calculated for concertante brilliancy than for truth and simplicity; that he, the organ virtuoso, had no practical knowledge of the vocal organ; that his airs therefore are not singable, and so on: he may learn better from the arias just described. For their melodies, like countless others, are not only very convenient for execution and of a genuine song character: but they stamp themselves as irresistibly and wonderfully upon the memory as any melody of Mozart or Handel; although it is quite true, that the melody with Bach has never the same autonomous position, as with them. For this there are reasons, ultimately connected with Bach's certain method as above alluded to. First, the historical reason, that Bach's melody is not, like Handel's and Mozart's, based essentially upon the secular Volkslied and the like, but purely on the spiritual air, the Choral and counterpoint. In the Volkslied the melody is entirely independent, and has the distinguished rhythmical divisions. It was by the free marriage between the popular and the artificial song, that the Handel-Mozart melodies acquired such a wonderful simplicity, with all their high artistic nobleness. The Choral, on the contrary, as Bach found it, had virtually renounced all that was originally popular, all that was rhythmical; hence its melody was very relative; it was a melody of the congregation but not of the individual. But this too presupposes, on the other hand, a deep æsthetic reason, why the melody of Bach should be less autonomous than that of Handel and Mozart. With Handel and Mozart a single, definite historical individual sings an Aria in a no less definite situation. Now the melody being the primitive expression for the individual, and the harmony being only the secondary element, it is easily explained why in Handel's choruses, for example, there occur generally speaking, few peculiarly melodious elements, and why these are reserved almost entirely for the arias. And equally easily is it explained why with Bach the choruses present a richer melody, while in the Arias it is less autonomous. For the Bach Aria is never a purely individual, historical nature, but always represents, according to its text and connection, the universal human consciousness; accordingly it must go back to the most universal elements, to such as are raised above all specific national coloring; and thereby it approaches the melodic expression of a voice part in a chorus far more, than this can be the case with Handel. As the believing Christian never knows himself as a separate self-dependent entity, but always as a member of the body of Christ, so the Bach melody can never be absolutely independent, but always only an integral part in the harmonious whole. And just by this means does it acquire an independence, which is really greater than the other kind. For as it blossoms, so to speak, out of the harmonious connection of the whole, so on the other hand out of a melodious motive there unfolds itself with Bach a rich, harmonious life, such as one seeks in vain elsewhere; no doubt, then, this kind of melody must be more many sided, more capable of expression, in a word more independent, even if one cannot sing each single air by heart. Therefore the objection, that Bach has no “melody,” requires no further remark.

* The letters G, H, &c., refer to the musical illustrations which may be given with the last number of this article. Our readers meanwhile can refer to the aria itself.

Musical Chit-Chat.

PRIZE FOR COMPOSERS.—If any composer in this country has one or two Symphonies ready which he desires to have performed, a chance from Vienna is offered to him. The Society of the Friends of Music of the Austrian Empire, in Vienna, have concluded to warrant the performance of two new Symphonies in the first months of 1862, and solicit us to extend the invitation to native and foreign composers in this country. The conditions are as follows:

1. The Symphonies must not have been performed nor published.
2. They must be sent to the committee (Vienna, Tuchlauben); and not arrive later than the last day of the present month.
3. The Symphonies must be sent in full score, without the name of the author, but with a motto, and a sealed letter containing the name and address of the author, and bearing on the envelope the same motto.
3. All the Symphonies will be sent to the following five judges, who will decide which of them are worthy of a performance: Dr. Ambros, in Prague; Ferd. Hiller, in Cologne; Dr. Franz Liszt, in Weimar; Carl Reinecke, in Leipzig, and Robert Volkmann, in Pesth.
4. The performance will take place early in 1862. The Symphonies to be performed remain the property of the authors. They will be denoted in the programme with the motto chosen by the authors. Immediately after the performance, the sealed letters will be opened, and the names of the authors will be made public.
5. All the unsuccessful works will remain in the office of the Society, and it will be hereafter announced when they can be reclaimed.—Musical Review and World.

The great Italian cantatrice (now some years dead) Signora Grassini, was performing one evening in 1810, with Signor Crescentini, at the Tuileries, before Napoleon I., in the opera of Romeo and Juliet. At the scene in the third act, the Emperor applauded vociferously, and Talma the great tragedian, who was among the audience, wept with emotion. After the performance, Napoleon conferred the decoration of a high order on Crescentini, and sent Grassini a scrap of paper, on which was written, “Good for 20,000 livres—Napoleon.”

“Twenty thousand!” said one of her friends, “it is an immense amount.”

“It will serve as a dowry for one of my little nieces,” replied Grassini, quietly.

Many years after this, at Bologna, another of her nieces was presented to her for the first time, with a request she would do something for her. The little girl was extremely pretty, but her friends thought her unfitted for the stage, as her voice was a feeble contralto. Grassini asked her to sing, and, when the timid voice had sounded a few notes, Grassini embraced her niece.

“Dear child,” said she, “you will not want me to assist you. Those who called your voice a contralto were ignorant of music. You have one of the finest sopranos in the world, and will far excel me as a singer. Take courage, work hard; your throat will win you a shower of gold.”

This young girl still lives. She has not disappointed the prediction of her aunt. Her name is Giulia Gristi.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

Since the above was written for the art world of Paris, the Conservatoire Imperial de Musique et de Declamation has been awarding its prizes to the successful competitors in a series of grand ordeals which by annual custom the pupils trained under its auspices undergo. What concerns you chiefly being any artists of promise whom this great educational establishment may have given to the world of music, I will commence with that branch. In singing, therefore, I will state at once that the first prizewinner among the men two claimants, M. Caron, a pupil of M. Laget, and M. Morère, a pupil of M. Révial; and among the women one only was found worthy of it, namely, Mlle. Marie Ciso, a pupil of M. Révial. The lady named last, to whom was also awarded the prize for Opéra Comique—the trial piece having been La Part du Diable—made a very strong impression on the judges. She is, in the first place, pretty, and elegant in her appearance and deportment. As to her vocal qualifications they are accuracy of intonation, gracefulness of expression, and careful finish in every detail. Her voice, however, trembles in the execution of passages, as though from fatigue, and knowing critics say that the “pose” of her voice is not all that might be desired. She is a good actress, and shows good taste in her dress, which goes a long way towards prepossessing an audience. But Mlle. Ciso can hardly be regarded in the light of a mere pupil, being already an artist of some experience. She is, no doubt, destined to take a prominent rank in her profession. Of the two male prize men I have named, the first, M. Caron, is a barytone verging on the tenor. He is well versed in the resources of his art, and sings with animation. His face is good, too, as regards expression. M. Morère is a tenor with a pleasant quality of voice, what you may call a pretty voice, sings with taste, and exhibits undoubted marks of talent. Another lady was deemed deserving of the first prize for opéra comique, besides the one I have mentioned, Mlle. Balbi. She appeared in a fragment of Le Cid. Her personal appearance is engaging, and her manner graceful, both in the highest degree, which, no less than a sweet voice (“soft and low”), are excellent things in woman. The latter excellence, specially distinguished by the poet, Mlle. Balbi hath; and, moreover, she sings true, with unexceptionable judgment, and her notes are of a pearly quality. As an actress she is also fully up to the mark. The second prize for women in this department had three claimants, Mlle. Reboux, who, in the part of Gertrude in the Maitre de Chapelle, sang and played delightfully; Mlle. Rolin, who showed herself in Les Porcherons a graceful and expressive singer, if not much of an actress; and though last, most emphatically not least, Mlle. Simon, who played in the Etoile du Nord and perfectly astonished her audience by her self-possession. She has good qualities, but betrays too much effort. The first man's prize for opéra comique was won in a canter by M. Capoul, the same who I have told you was engaged to appear at the Salle Favart. He approved himself a charming actor, and has a tenor voice of clear and resonant quality, and with that power of touching the feelings which the French mean when they talk of an organe sympathique. Evidently a fine career is open to this gentleman. The second prize man was M. Gerzé, a barytone of agreeable quality, very intelligent, with good expression, but with a good deal of hard work before him if he wishes to make the most of his abilities. So much for what was chiefly interesting in the vocal competition. Come we to the instrumental contest, merely the main results of which will suffice. The first man's prize for pianoforte playing was taken by M. Bernard, a pupil of M. Laurent, and G. M. Lavignac, instructed by M. Marmontel; the second man's prize was awarded to M. Emmanuel, another pupil of the master just named. Mlles. Lechesne and Blanc, pupils of M. Lecoupey, and Mlle. Peschel, pupil of M. Henri Herz, received the first woman's prize, and Mlle. Bessagnet, pupil of M. Farranc, and Deshoys, pupil of M. Coche, the second. Violoncello: first prize, Rabaud, pupil of M. Franchomme; second, Loys, pupil of ditto. Violin: first prize, Willaume, pupil of M. Massart, Mlle. Castellani, pupil of M. Alard, and Jacob, pupil of M. Massart; second prize, Lelong, pupil of M. Sauzax.

BERLIN.—Among the places of amusement still open, I may mention the Friedrich-Wilhelmsstädtisches Theater, at which M. Offenbach's operas are being performed. Then, too, there is Kroll's Theatre, where the “star” in the ascendant for the moment is a certain Herr Wack, who possesses a tolerable baritone, and has been favorably received in Auber's Zampa. Another of Auber's operas, Le Serment, has been revived at the above establishment. It was first introduced to a Berlin audience, years ago, at the old Königsstädtisches Theatre, but has never been performed since. The mode in which it was given the other evening was very far from perfect.—Herr Gustav Bock, the well-known musical publisher, lately had the Knight's Cross of the Order of Wasa bestowed upon him by the King of Sweden, and his Majesty of Prussia has just granted him the permission to wear it.—While visiting, a short time ago, the cemetery in which Ludwig Rellstab is buried, I saw the monument erected over his grave. It is six feet high, with a granite tablet, on which is the admirable medallion of the deceased, by Hagen, while beneath it is the inscription: “Lud. Heinrich Rellstab, born the 13th April, 1799, died the 28th November, 1860.”

Herr Wieniawski passed through this capital on his way to St. Petersburg. Professor van Boom also, of the Academy of Music at Stockholm, was here a short time; he has now left for Holland.

IVREA, NEAR MILAN.—(From a very enthusiastic and rare Correspondent.)—If the word triumph may be applied in affairs of the theatre without fear of ridicule, it never was more apropos than in the present case to express the success obtained last evening by the tenor Castellani, upon the occasion of his benefit. Over and above the opera (Chi dura vince) we heard a new singer, Mlle. Glenister, in the cavatina of Lucia, and a duet from Verdi's Masnadieri. This last piece was sung by the young lady and the before-named tenor. Mlle. Glenister was by all the auditors judged to be “unica” in her style, and those who have heard Persiani assure us that the young singer is not in the least inferior to that artist, and they maintain that in point of art it would be impossible to do more—taste, execution, intonation, perfect, all you find in her; and I confess that I do not remember having heard a singer who so nearly approaches Bossio. Besides her singing she has a certain ingenuous expression which alone infuses an irresistible grace into all she does. The demonstrations in favor of Mlle. Glenister were innumerable, and surpassed every limit. When she had finished her work she went to a box, in which she had scarcely appeared when the public commenced to anew to applaud her. The opera went off well. Mlle. Lotteri sang with more than common ability, as did also the baritone (Pieri), and the buffo (Tiraboschi). The tenor (Castellani) was clamorously applauded, and most deservedly, in all he sang. Besides the opera, Signor Castellani sang the Romanza “spirto gentil,” after which he was several times recalled. The duet from Il Masnadieri with Mlle. Glenister was also very successful, and the singers were called repeatedly before the curtain. Mlle. Glenister is an English girl about eighteen years of age.

DRESDEN.—Herr Merelli has taken advantage of his sojourn here to make frequent professional trips to the surrounding towns; thus, in Chemnitz he gave Il Barbiere, and in Magdeburg the same opera, La Cenerentola, and Il Matrimonio Segreto. The person who suffers the most from this business arrangement of the worthy manager, is the star of the company, Signora Trebelli, who is quite knocked up by the exertion. The company will give six more representations here, and then proceed to Lübeck, whence, after a short stay, Signora Trebelli will visit Vichy, where her attendance is commanded by the Emperor Napoleon. She then returns to Belgium, and after a short tour will arrive in Berlin on the 1st October. From Berlin she goes to Paris to fulfil her engagement there.

THE OPERA IN RUSSIA.—The Emperor of Russia has commissioned Tamberlik to get a superb company together—himself being superb number one. The great tenor has made a vast number of engagements, and the artists will depart for Warsaw at the close of our Italian opera season.—Brighton Gazette.

BARCELONA.—The Italian opera company, at present here, includes Mad. Lagrange, Mad. Lustany, Signore Naudin, Viani, and Atry. They have been doing very fairly.

BRESLAU.—The first concert given by Herr Bilse, Capellmeister, took place on the 4th inst. The novelties were two pieces by Herr J. Vogt. The whole affair went of very satisfactorily.

MANNHEIM.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of Herr Vincenz Lachner as Hofcapellmeister, was brilliantly celebrated on the 25th June. A silver laurel wreath and goblet were presented him by the members of the operatic company, the orchestra, and the chorus. In the evening all the musical societies surprised the respected composer with a serenade.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Our glorious land—land of the free.

J. W. Turner. 25

Another of the patriotic effusions elicited by the strife which still rages. The words are excellent and most happily wedded by the ready poet and musician, Mr. Turner. The compositions of this gentleman are numerous, and much appreciated by teachers for their correctness, simplicity and purity.

Blow, bugle, blow. Song. W. R. Dempster 50

Tennyson's famous Bugle Song, which could have found no composer more adequate to the task of providing a musical garment than the composer of the “Rainy day,” “May Queen,” and numerous other ballads which are permanently established among the best written to English words. The clarion notes of this Bugle Song will ring out far and wide and become forever coupled with Tennyson's sparkling rhymes.

Alma redemptoris. Quartet. Lambillotte. 40

Another capital number of the “Salute” collection for Catholic choirs. Singing Societies who are not shy of the Latin words, would hardly find short sacred pieces of a more pleasing character.

Instrumental Music.

Glory, Hallelujah and Hail to the Chief. Arranged for full Brass Band. B. C. Bond. 1,00

This is an arrangement for bands of the celebrated war song which everybody admires so much. It is easy of execution and new bands will find no difficulty in mastering it.

March du Vainqueur. Jaques Blumenthal. 25

Whoever knows Blumenthal's fine “Marche des Croates” and “March militaire”—and who has not at least heard of them—will expect something unusually fine under this title. Nor will he be disappointed. It is a noble march, full of manly joy in its remarkable melodies, and with a sombre religious strain in commemoration of the slain, for its trio.

La Fiorentina. Fantasia elegante. Duvernoy. 40

One of Duvernoy's best instructive pieces for pupils of about a year's practice.

Les Filles du Ciel Waltzes. Camille Schubert. 60

A ball in Paris would be thought dull without a Quadrille of Musard's and a set of waltzes by Camille Schubert. The dancing public of Paris have voted the above set one of their special favorites. It certainly equals in brilliancy and freshness of melodies the “Dance de Seville” sets, so extensively known here.

Books.

CONVENTION CHORUS BOOK. A collection of Anthems, Choruses, Glees and Concerted Pieces, for the use of Musical Conventions, Choral Societies, &c.

No more useful book for Musical Gatherings has been published, if indeed anything equal to it. The pieces it contains have hitherto been distributed through half a dozen or more large and expensive volumes, the purchase of which was impossible to persons of limited means. In this form they can be obtained at a trifling cost. Societies, Choral and Musical Clubs will at once provide themselves with a full supply of this valuable collection. Its contents will be found invaluable for practice.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

"Under the Cloud and through the Sea."

So moved they, when false Pharaoh's legion pressed Chariots and horsemen following furiously,—
Sons of old Israel, at their God's behest,
Under the cloud and through the swelling sea.

So passed they, fearless, where the parted wave,
With cloven crest uprearing from the sand,
A solemn aisle before,—behind, a grave,—
Rolled to the beckoning of Jehovah's hand.

So led he them, in desert marches grand,
By toils sublime, with test of long delay,
On, to the borders of that Promised Land,
Wherein their heritage of glory lay.

And Jordan raged along his rocky bed,
And Amorite spears flashed keen and fearfully:
Still the same pathway must their footsteps tread,—
Under the cloud and through the threatening sea.

God works no otherwise. No mighty birth
But comes by throes of mortal agony:
No man-child among nations of the earth
But findeth baptism in a stormy sea.
